CULTURAL RESOURCE INVENTORY
VOLUME II
ENVIRONMENTAL RESEARCH CENTER OF MISSOURI, INC.
MAY 1982
This Cultural Resource Inventory is presented in two parts: (1) Volume I Summary of Findings; and (2) Volume II Bibliography. In Volume I the methodological considerations involved in all processes of the investigation are discussed. The Corps Base Maps and computer record and programs are placed with the St. Louis District, Corps of Engineers, the Missouri Department of Natural Resources/Historic Preservation Program, and the Illinois Department of Conservation/Division of Historic Sites, and are considered sensitive information. The major values of the GREAT III cultural resource inventory report documents are in their potential use as planning tools.

GREAT III BIBLIOGRAPHIC ENTRIES

Introduction

The following document contains the bibliographic entries gathered during the GREAT III cultural resource inventory. The methodological considerations involved in the bibliography production are discussed in Volume I of this report.

The bibliography is divided into three major sections: Cultural Resource Management (CRM) reports, Archaeology, and History. These sections are subdivided by state (Illinois and Missouri) which are in turn subdivided by county. General archaeology references follow the archaeology sections and general history is included following the state/county subdivision in the history section. The bibliography is concluded with steamboat history references.

Annotation is included where the reference was available for observation, the title did not portray content, a previous annotation was available, and/or content was of specific interest in terms of the topic or area dealt with. CRM entries include only those which pertain to the GREAT III study corridor. History and archaeology entries will in many instances apply to larger regional, state, or county units. While all Missouri CRM reports were observed and entered, some Illinois CRM reports were not available for review. The areas which were surveyed as well as the cultural resources recovered through these investigations were, for the most part, available on Illinois Department of Conservation/Division of Historic Sites topographic index maps and files and have been included in the mapping and review components of the GREAT III cultural resource inventory. For data retrieval purposes through Mag Card file, the last name of author has been included with every entry even though the same individual may have authored several documents.

Review of Illinois archaeological materials was helped immeasurably by availability of a bibliography produced by Walter L. Brieschke (1970) and by the generous contribution by Dr. Jacobson of the Illinois State Museum of materials from his ongoing Illinois archaeology reference update project. Omissions and errors are, of course, the responsibility of the GREAT III cultural resource inventory investigators.

ARCHAEOLOGY ENTRIES
ALEXANDER COUNTY, ILLINOIS

Describes some of the wildlife in the area.

The food eaten by the Indians was course and gritty due to the preparation by grinding in stone mortars resulting in excessive wear on the teeth. Out of 5,390 teeth examined, 421 had caries, and 1,525 teeth showed the cusps worn away.

Relations between culture and environment are discussed in chapter one. Various sites in the Crab Orchard Basin, Mississippi River Bottoms, Big Muddy River Valley, and a rock shelter were excavated.

No descriptions, just says that one was found.

Evidence of Archaic, Black Sand and Hopewell occupations.

Hopewell occupation is represented by three mounds and a village site.

The Klunk Mound group is composed of fourteen mounds located on the top of the bluff north of Kamps-ville. The major part of this work is a site report of each ten mounds excavated.

"I postulate the following divisions within the Lower Valley Hopewell. Early Hopewell is characterized by the absence of any pottery except the Havana groups. Middle Hopewell sees the introduction of the fine Hopewell and cruder Pike groups with a continuation, in lesser percentages, of the Havana types. Late Hopewell is the period of the introduction of Baehr and Bluff types which begin quickly and definitely to replace the Hopewell and Havana groups" (p. 224).

"The chert effigy category is being discussed in this article partly as a vehicle by which to consider the widespread "fake" industry, along with my personal idea concerning appropriate methods to combat the evil" (p. 45). Included are some "so-called" originals from Illinois.

From this analysis a possible occupation during the Early and Middle ranges of Hopewell is postulated.

Analysis describes from two standpoints, all of the flint artifacts collected at the Snyders site, the exception of the Projectile points. "The two points are: (a) the techniques of chipping and trimming selected raw materials, and (b) the different geometrical forms of the artifacts. The semicircular scrapers found in the Snyders surface collections can be related to similar artifacts found at the Knight site and at the Sugar Camp Hill site, the Dillinger site, and the Raymond site in Southern Illinois. This strongly suggests their association with late Hopewell of late Woodland occupations...The functional descriptions presented in this paper are proposed as temporary evaluation. They are mainly intended to show that the purpose of the typological analysis of the chipped-stone material will lead to a more comprehensive portrayal of the economy and technological environment of archaeological data.

This is a progress report subject to later revision. Cultural horizons are discussed beginning with Archaic and continuing through Middle Mississippi. The results indicate that, "The most striking characteristics of the picture for Southern Illinois in general is the evidence of a mingling of Southeastern and more typically Northern cultures. The Massac sequence is Southeastern, the Jackson sequence is Southeastern and Northern, and the St. Louis sequence is Northern, with some traces of the Southeastern influences. It is perhaps significant that in this general area where these influences merged we get a continuous cultural development from Early Woodland through Middle Woodland and via Korando, through to Late Woodland and Middle Mississippi. In the other areas, the break between Middle Woodland and classic Middle Mississippi is noticeable." (p. 21).

Describes over thirty different ceramic artifacts

"Concerning the possible origin of form and design prevailing in our Cahokia pottery: This district seems to have been a veritable melting pot, or focal point for many ceramic traits. This component of the art, from its large diversity and multiplicity, reveals Cahokia as a cross-section of the general basic element of design used in America, excepting our Southwest section". I would think this movement into the Missouri Valley would have taken place in the sixteenth century." (p. 49).

Contains pictures of Cahokia and the Piasa bird.

Long, H.W.
A model of the Piasa bird was found in a French Museum. This "le Grande Geule" was used in 1640 at the town of Portiers as an offering to the devil to appease his wrath and end an epidemic. Marquette's party having fallen sick made their own "le Grande Geule" to ward off the devil. The similarity between "le Grande Geule" and the Piasa Bird lead to the conclusion that it was painted on the Alton bluffs by early French explorers.

Petroglyphs in Jackson county and the Piasa bird near Alton are discussed.

Small blade tools are described and an attempt to assess their functions is made. The comparative evidence is insufficient to demonstrate any relationship with other blade industries in the Eastern United States such as Poverty Point and Hopewell.

"Solid core drilling was used to provide guidelines for future excavations of Monks Mound at the Cahokia Site. The objective was to study, within reasonable limits of time and finances, the internal structure of the largest earthen mound in North America. The process is described along with a discussion of its problems and limitations as applied to similar archaeological situations. Radiocarbon dates indicate construction over approximately 250 years, from A.D. 900 to 1150. Evidence of construction stages is described and used to arrive at an estimate of labor figures and the necessary sustaining population of the Cahokia settlement. It is suggested that most of the mounds at the site were built after the completion of Monks Mound."

McGregor, J.C.

The Pool site is a Hopewell village located across McKee Creek from the Irving site, a Late Woodland village. The Irving Village was contemporaneous and existed after the end of the Pool Village. Some agriculture was practiced but hunting and gathering supplied the main food source. Widespread trade contacts to the south supplied them with their exotic pottery. There is evidence of a division of the population into social classes as shown by variable burial methods. Life at the Pool and Irving Villages was similar. The Havana-Pool-Irving sequence represents an elaboration and then gradual decline in material culture. In appendix A is a list by counties of sites surveyed and dug in 1950 and 1952 giving cultural affiliation and type of survey, test pit, surface collection, etc.

An important aspect of the site lies in the radiocarbon date obtained at the 25 foot level of 7922 B.C. +392 years, closing the gap between Paleo-Indian and Archaic and establishes the existence of Archaic east of the Mississippi River.

Fowler, M.L.

C14 dates from Modoc Rock Shelter are 15-16 ft. depth - 400 B.C.; 21-22 ft. depth - 6600 B.C.; 24-26 ft. depth - 8700 B.C.

Fowler, M.L.

Fowler, M.L.

A summary report combining the excavations of 1953 and 1956 and a previously issued preliminary report. On the basis of radiocarbon dates the existence of the Archaic in the Eastern United States can be extended back to 8000 B.C. Proposes the possible contemporaneity of Paleo-Indian and Archaic populations for the Eastern United States region rather than a sequence which has the Paleo-Indian stage as the predecessor of the Archaic. The Great Plains area is about the only place where cultural succession from Paleo-Indian to Archaic cultures holds. The Archaic stage in the Eastern United States was but one of several adaptations with which the early inhabitants of the New World made to differing ecological settings.

Fowler, M.L.
The site was excavated to a depth of 27.5 feet below the original ground surface. It was occupied immediately following the recession of the Valders glaciation. Following two periods of sporadic occupation the shelter was again occupied intensively. Radiocarbon dates indicate that the first occupation was between 8000 and 7000 B.C., the second occupation about 6200 B.C., and the intensive occupation until about 2000 B.C. The three periods are termed Initial Archaic, Localized Adaptation Period, and Specialized Adaptation Period, showing an increased utilization of the environment through time from foraging groups to exploitation of particular resources and finally to a hunting subsistence dependent on deer and waterfowl. After 2000, the rock shelter was sporadically utilized by Woodland and Mississippian peoples. Comparisons with other sites suggest that the trend at Modoc might have been more widespread. The seasonal cycle probably became firmly established in the Archaic cultures of the Central Mississippi River Valley area between 4000 and 3000 B.C.

Fowler, M.L. and H.D. Winters

The main cultural manifestations at Modoc is of the Archaic culture beginning at a depth of 5 feet down to 21.5 feet. The Archaic exhibits changes through time that indicate an increase in cultural complexity. The radiocarbon date which indicates early Archaic goes back to at least 7900 B.C., closes the gap between the Paleo-Indian and Archaic cultures. The early occupations of the site were during a time of cool, damp climate while the glacier was retreating in the North.

Bennett, J.W.

A progress report subject to later revisions. Cultural horizons are discussed beginning with Archaic and continuing through Middle Mississippi. The results indicate that, "The most striking characteristics of the picture for Southern Illinois in general is the evidence of a mingling of Southeastern and more typically Northern cultures. The Massac sequence is Southeastern, the Jackson sequence is Southeastern and Northern, and the St. Louis sequence is Northern, with some traces of the Southeastern influences. It is perhaps significant that in this general area where these influences merged we get a continuous cultural development from Early Woodland through Middle Mississippi. In the other areas, the break between Middle Woodland and classic Middle Mississippi is noticeable." (pp. 21).

The mounds of the Cahokia group correspond in form and situation with mounds which formerly existed on the site of St. Louis, and they are not at all of the same type as those nearest them in Illinois - an indication that when built they were all on the western side of the Mississippi or according to aboriginal ideas, of the Missouri River.

I would think that this movement into the Missouri Valley would have taken place in the sixteenth century".

"Solid core drilling was used to provide guidelines for future excavation of Monks mound at the Cahokia site. The objective was to study, within reasonable limits of time and finances, the internal structure of the largest earthen mound in North America. The process is described along with a discussion of its problems and limitations as applied to similar archaeological situations. Radiocarbon dates indicate construction over approximately 250 years, from A.D. 900 to 1150. Evidence of construction stages is described and used to arrive at an estimate of labor figures and the necessary subsisting population of the Cahokia settlement. It is suggested that most of the mounds at the site were built after the completion of Monks mound." (P-137).
