ARMY POLICIES AND PRACTICES: A SUMMARY OF REGULATIONS, LETTERS, PAMPHLETS AND CIRCULARS THAT IMPACT ON ARMY FAMILIES

OVERVIEW

Army-wide policies are formulated and promulgated primarily through Army Regulations (ARs). The ARs contain missions, responsibilities, policies, and administrative procedures necessary to ensure uniform compliance with those policies.

In addition to regulations, various other publications provide information that is not directive but can influence policy. "White Papers" have been published at Department of the Army to formalize the leadership's philosophy on key issues. Among these are "White Papers" on the Light Infantry Division, The Army Family, and Leadership.

Headquarters, Department of the Army (HQDA), letters have been used as an interim method to announce policy changes that impact numerous publications. As an example, an HQDA letter was published to announce that the term "dependent" would no longer be used except where required as a legal term. As a result, as various regulations were updated, the term "family member" or "spouse" was substituted for "dependent."

Other publications include DA Pamphlets (DA Pam) and Training Circulars (TC). These publications are basically "how to" in nature. The annual Army Family Action Plan is an example of a DA Pam.

While ARs are generally applicable to the entire Army, major commands (MACOMs) can publish their own regulations or supplement ARs. This supplementation rule holds true down to the unit level.

METHOD

Since Army Regulations are the basic policy documents, they were reviewed in detail for policies that concern families. Within ARs, a numbering system is used to control the regulations. As examples, all 600 series regulations deal with personnel, and all 700 series regulations deal with logistics. AR 310-2 gives a complete description of the DA publication system. The entire 600 series of ARs was reviewed for this document. Other ARs were selected after reviewing regulation subject lists and titles. Applicable regulations were then grouped into one of three categories: a) ARs that addressed some aspect of families; b) ARs that did not mention families, but did deal with subjects that impact families; and c) ARs that were reviewed, but were not applicable to family programs.

Each regulation that dealt with families was then formatted to concisely present the major policies and other key information. Policies were described with the following data:

- Publication number
- Title
- Date
- Distribution
- Supplementation
- Purpose
- Policies

The publication number and name serve to identify the publication. The date indicates the date published or the last time the publication was updated, whichever is later.

The distribution indicates to what level the regulation is sent. Distribution A is for publications containing information applicable at company (or similar organizational) level; Distribution B is for publications containing information applicable at brigade, regiment, group, battle group, and battalion level; Distribution C means the publication contains information applicable to installations and activities, and to commands down to and including headquarters of divisions; Distribution D is for publications containing information applicable to HQDA, major commands, and installations and activities immediately subordinate to HQDA and major commands; and Distribution E is for publications containing information applicable to HQDA and to headquarters of major commands. The distribution level indicates at what level the policy can be expected to affect families and be implemented.

Distribution levels A through E are defined as follows:

A - Publication contains information applicable at company and similar organizational level

B - Publication contains information applicable at brigade, regiment, group, battle group, and battalion level

C - Publication contains information applicable to installations and activities and to commands down to and including headquarters of divisions and comparable commands
D - Publication contains information applicable to Headquarters, Department of the Army, major commands and to installations and activities immediately subordinate to Headquarters, Department of the Army and major commands.

E - Publication contains information applicable to Headquarters, Department of the Army Staff and to headquarters of major Army commands.

The supplements to ARs are issued by HQDA agencies, major Army commands, and subordinate elements when and as permitted, to publish instructions required by their headquarters or subordinate elements to implement ARs. For new or revised regulations published after 1 July 1982, supplementation is prohibited without prior approval from a regulations proponent. Whether a supplement is permitted, required, or prohibited without prior approval provides a direction for additional study of specific policies.

The purpose of a regulation is always stated in the first paragraph. The purpose statement can be so general as to not fully define what the regulation does or so detailed as to leave no doubts as to its purpose. Most purpose sentences in this paper are verbatim or a slight paraphrase in the case of unusually long purpose paragraphs.

The policies that are listed for each regulation that addresses family matters are those policies that are family specific. Most of the regulations contain numerous other policies that do not directly impact families. The policies as listed are general and the regulation would need to be studied for very specific details. Some regulations are listed that do not specifically mention family matters, but the policies do impact families. These were listed as a separate category of publications.

INITIAL CONCLUSIONS

The Army system of publications is the key documentation system of policies toward families. The actual impact on a family in a small unit at some isolated installation hinges on whether people know about the policy and whether it is considered important enough to worry about. The review of the regulations uncovered hundreds of policies directly impacting families, yet most are insignificant and do not have a great impact. There are some major policies that do have significant impact. These policies warrant further study. The regulations considered critical to families have an asterisk (*) beside the pub #. This designation is subjective and open to debate.
One other aspect of Army policies and practices needs to be addressed. While policies are promulgated through ARs and other publications, funding is also important in the implementation process. As an example, AF 608-10, says it is Army policy to provide child care on installations. If the money is not in the budget, however, child care will not exist as required by regulation. In FY85, the budget for Army Family Programs totalled $1,348,200,000 and rose to $1,847,000,000 in FY87. This would seem to provide a clear indication of support for family policies, if the money budgeted was indeed spent as intended.

Although possibly obvious, it should nonetheless be noted that no Army Regulation specifically addresses family policies. This defusion of family policy regulations might contribute to a lessening of knowledge about family policies and their promotion.
