Short v. The Kingdom of The Netherlands
Is it Time to Renegotiate the NATO Status of Forces Agreement?

Steven J. Lepper, Captain

AFIT Student Attending: Georgetown University

AFIT/CI
Wright-Patterson AFB OH 45433-6583

Approved for Public Release IAW 190-1
Distributed Unlimited
ERNEST A. HAYGOOD, 1st Lt, USAF
Executive Officer

91-07329
Short v. The Kingdom of The Netherlands
Is it Time to Renegotiate the NATO Status of Forces Agreement?

Steven J. Lepper

Submitted in Partial Satisfaction of Requirements for the Degree of Master of Laws in International and Comparative Law

1 May 1991

Graduate Seminar: Extraterritoriality (LAWG 846-11)
Professor J. Fried
Table of Contents

I. Introduction .................................................. 1

II. Short and Soering: The Background to the NATO SOFA Problem ........................................... 4

A. Short v. The Kingdom of the Netherlands ........................................... 5

B. The Soering Case ........................................... 8

III. The United States Position: Reliance on "Black Letter" International Law ........................................... 11

A. A Brief History of the NATO SOFA ........................................... 11

1. The "Law of the Flag" ........................................... 12

2. Exclusive Receiving State Jurisdiction ........................................... 16

B. The Netherlands Violated the NATO SOFA's Text: Some "Jurisdictional" Arguments ........................................... 17

1. Judicial Jurisdiction Under the NATO SOFA ........................................... 17

a. Sending State Judicial Jurisdiction ........................................... 18

b. Receiving State Supervisory Jurisdiction ........................................... 20

2. Criminal Jurisdiction Under the NATO SOFA ........................................... 21

a. Exclusive Criminal Jurisdiction ........................................... 22

b. Concurrent Criminal Jurisdiction ........................................... 23

3. Summary of the NATO SOFA "Jurisdictional" Arguments ........................................... 27

C. The NATO SOFA After Soering ........................................... 28

1. The NATO SOFA: Immunity "Plus" ........................................... 29

2. The "Plus": The NATO SOFA's Duty to Surrender ........................................... 30

D. The Short Decision as a Violation of International Law ........................................... 33

1. Restriction of Sovereignty by Treaty: Are the NATO SOFA and the ECHR Really Inconsistent? ........................................... 33

a. Attacking the Premise ........................................... 34
b. Contrary International Decisions

   a. Pacta Sunt Servanda
   b. Conflict of Treaties Rules

E. United States Policy
   1. The NATO SOFA Negotiations: The Original U.S. Concerns
   2. The Death Penalty
   3. The Expansion of Military Criminal Jurisdiction

IV. The Dutch Position: The Role of Human Rights in International Law

A. Human Rights Generally: A Background
   1. The Human Rights Movement
   2. The European Human Rights System
   3. Capital Punishment and the ECHR

B. Is the Right Not to Face the Death Penalty Normatively Superior to the SOFA's Duty to Surrender?
   1. Normative Superiority as a Matter of International Law
   2. Jus Cogens and International Ordre Public
   3. Capital Punishment and Fundamental Rights
      a. Is the Abolition of Capital Punishment an International Norm?
      b. Is This Norm Fundamental?
      c. The Effect of This Norm on the United States

C. Is the Right Not to Face the Death Penalty Superior to the SOFA's Duty to Surrender as a Matter of Intertemporal Law?
Short v. The Kingdom of The Netherlands:
Is it Time to Renegotiate the NATO Status of Forces Agreement?

I. Introduction

The Berlin Wall has fallen; the "Cold War" is over. Not since World War II has Europe seen as much political and military change as has occurred during the past year. Certainly, almost everyone on both sides of the former "Iron Curtain" will agree that the changes have been for the better. Although the Soviet economy continues its painful entry into the world free market, its impoverished and hungry citizens now have what they have sought for hundreds of years: the hope of political and economic freedom. Meanwhile, the West watches anxiously as the Soviet Union is reborn. We hope for its success, knowing that the hardships the Soviets now endure ultimately will build a democratic society well worth the price.

As the end of the Soviet communist empire continues casting waves of uncertainty across Eastern Europe, Western Europe -- particularly the North Atlantic Treaty (NATO) alliance -- must temper its optimism with caution. The Soviet Union still represents a major military threat to world peace. As we support President Gorbachev's reforms, we must recognize that his domestic political coalition is a frail one and that not everyone in the Soviet Union shares his democratic vision. Until the turmoil subsides, vigilance must continue.

Despite the apparent consensus among the NATO nations that their alliance must still anticipate and be ready to parry Soviet military force, it is also becoming clear that significant change is inevitable. Indeed, the United States has responded to these developments by pledging to reduce the number of its troops in Western Europe.1

As the size and structure of NATO's military force changes, the question has arisen whether the conditions of its presence in Western Europe should also change. In particular, recent events have prompted suggestions that the entire matter of stationing foreign forces in NATO nations be reconsidered. One smaller aspect of that issue is the question whether the changes in Europe -- both recent ones and those that have taken place gradually over the past forty years -- compel reexamination and possible renegotiation of the NATO Status of Forces Agreement.

The thesis of the upcoming 1991 Brussels Congress of the Society for Military Law and Law of War (the Society) is that reexamination of the SOFA is certainly in order.

In its "background paper" designed to stimulate debate among its attendees, the Society recognized an evolving problem: "Sending states . . . are increasingly confronted with changed policies of host nations claiming that their national legislation should prevail over the rights and duties laid down in stationing agreements in situations where interests of the host nation are affected." Because the resulting difficulties are seemingly irreconcilable, it suggests that agreements like the NATO SOFA be reconsidered. The main purpose of this paper is to consider one aspect of that proposition and its bases. I will follow the Society's lead by examining the area of greatest divergence between the United States and its European allies: human rights. In that context, one recent case will be of particular interest.

At the end of 1990, the Dutch High Court enjoined its government from surrendering to the United States a member of the U.S. Air Force accused of murdering his wife. Although that may not look unreasonable at first glance, it actually involved considerable debate and diplomatic wrangling between the United States and the Netherlands. The crux of the problem was that the Dutch Court's decision resulted in the Netherlands' violation of the NATO SOFA. According to that treaty, the U.S. serviceman, Staff Sergeant (SSgt) Charles Short, should have been prosecuted by U.S. military court-martial for his offense. However, because that trial might have led to a death sentence, Dutch adherence to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) prompted its High Court to protect him from that possibility.

Although this case represents only a small part of the question whether the NATO SOFA ought to be reconsidered, it raises numerous international legal issues ranging from the binding nature of treaties to the status of human rights in international law. Thus, this narrow focus is actually quite broad. What follows is an attempt to examine the United States and Dutch positions in this matter and the arguments that either have been or could be used to support them. One of my goals is to demonstrate that at the heart of this single case could lie either the continued success of the NATO SOFA or its undoing.

This paper begins by examining the Short case in more detail. Then we will briefly consider the Soering case -- the recent decision from the European Court of Human Rights upon which the Dutch High Court relied heavily. The next two sections focus on the United States and Dutch positions respectively. The United States arguments come first because they are based on traditional "black letter" notions of international law. They are therefore much easier to understand. The Dutch position, in contrast, reflects the emergence of human rights as international norms. As a more contemporary and less well-settled body of jurisprudence, it is understandably controversial. The paper then concludes by considering whether these two positions can be resolved and, if so, how. Does the resolution require the NATO SOFA's renegotiation? Ultimately, that is the question I will try to answer.

3. Id. at 1.
II. Short and Soering:
The Background to the NATO SOFA Problem

The United States military tradition of stationing troops on friendly foreign soil is relatively new, dating primarily to World War I. The principle of peaceful military occupation, however, can be traced to the 18th century practice of peaceful transit of armies through the territory of friendly states, and the long-accepted naval practice of peaceful passage through their territorial waters and into their ports.

Since its first foreign ventures, one of the United States' primary concerns has been the extent to which members of its forces may be subject to the receiving state's criminal jurisdiction. In recent years, those concerns typically have been addressed in bilateral or multilateral status of forces agreements (SOFAs). The first among contemporary agreements was the "Agreement between the Parties to the North Atlantic Treaty regarding the Status of their Forces" or the "NATO SOFA". Both during and after the United States' NATO SOFA ratification process, some United States lawmakers voiced fears that subjecting American GIs to foreign criminal prosecution might lead to "cruel and inhuman punishment". Military authorities expressed concern that without exclusive jurisdiction over their troops, discipline would be impossible to enforce. Although some commentators have argued that the concept of shared jurisdiction incorporated in the NATO SOFA and similar agreements

1. See, S. Lazareff, Status of Military Forces Under Current International Law 8 (1971). Since Prussian territories were not contiguous, its forces had to pass through friendly States in order to move from one garrison to another. These forays were always conducted with the express permission of the sovereign of the State transited; its scope was generally very narrow, restricting the military force's size, the duration of its transit, and the conditions under which transit was authorized.
5. See Status of Forces of the North Atlantic Treaty: Supplementary Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on Foreign Relations, 83d Cong., 1st Sess. 7 (1953)(statement of Senator Bricker)[hereinafter cited as Supplementary SOFA Hearings]. In these hearings and others during the Japanese prosecution of Spec. 3 Girard, there was great concern that U.S. military personnel stationed abroad would not be accorded rights similar to those guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. To be tried without minimum due process guarantees was unthinkable to Senator Bricker and others. See also Wilson v. Girard, 354 U.S. 524, 77 S.Ct. 1409, 1 L.Ed.2d 1544 (1957); H.R. Rep. No. 678, 85th Cong., 1st Sess. 25 (1957)[hereinafter cited as SOFA Revision Hearings]. Generally, status of forces agreements deal with the problems arising from the stationing of the armed forces of one country in the territory of another. As an example, the NATO SOFA "defines the status of these forces when they are sent to another NATO country; it does not of itself create the right to send them in the absence of a special agreement to that effect." NATO Agreements on Status: Travaux Preparatoires, Naval War C. Int'l L. Stud. 3 (J. Snee ed. 1961)[hereinafter cited as NATO Travaux Preparatoires].
6. See King, Jurisdiction Over Friendly Foreign Armed Forces, 40 Am. J. Int'l L. 539 (1946). Colonel King argued that "the intervention of the courts of a foreign even if friendly country in the discipline of an has rendered these concerns "largely academic," they may have been resurrected recently by the apparent reluctance of some parties to enforce these treaties.

Within the past two to three years, increasing European interest in the international protection of human rights has led to what one recent article called "an ironic dilemma for an American military justice system that generally prides itself on its success in securing broad protections for the individual rights of its accuseds." Specifically, several European NATO allies have expressed or demonstrated their unwillingness to allow U.S. military personnel to face capital charges for offenses arising under the NATO SOFA. These nations are also parties to the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR), which the European Court of Human Rights recently interpreted to prohibit the extradition of persons accused of capital offenses. We will examine aspects of that case --- the Soering case --- in more detail in a moment.

The irony in this, of course, is that it sounds strangely like our long-held view that we must maximize our jurisdiction over our military forces abroad in order to avoid their exposure to possible "cruel and unusual punishment". In a sense, we are now "hoist by our own petard".

A. Short v. The Kingdom of the Netherlands

The facts of a recent case briefly illustrate this emerging problem. On 30 March 1988, Staff Sergeant Charles D. Short, a member of the United States Air Force stationed at Soesterberg Air Base in the Netherlands, was arrested by the Dutch Royal Marechaussee (military police) as a suspect in the murder of his wife, a Turkish national. At some point during his Dutch interrogation, SSgt Short admitted killing his wife, dismembering her, and placing her remains in plastic bags by a dike somewhere near Amsterdam. Although the NATO SOFA clearly vested criminal army would be destructive of that discipline and inconsistent with the control which any sovereign nation must have of its own army."

---

7. J. Snee & K. Pye, Status of Forces Agreements: Criminal Jurisdiction 9 (1957). In SOFA parlance, a "sending State" is the party stationing its troops within the borders of the "receiving State".

11. See, infra section II, notes 28-34 and accompanying text.

12. Serious Incident Report Message from 32d TFS/JA to HQ USAF/JACI (Mar. 31, 1988). Throughout this paper, I will refer to messages dispatched by one U.S. Government agency to another. This is the routine method by which information is transmitted between military units and State Department entities. The author has copies of all cited messages.
jurisdiction in the United States, the Dutch authorities refused to turn him over to his superiors at Soesterberg AB. Their rationale for not following this treaty to which both the United States and the Netherlands are parties was that to do so would subject SSgt Short to the risk of capital punishment. This, the Dutch said, would violate their domestic and international commitment to abolish the death penalty. Although the United States continued to assert that Dutch refusal to release SSgt Short violated its treaty obligations, those efforts were uniformly unsuccessful.

Of great interest is how the Dutch handled the case. Shortly after SSgt Short's arrest and confinement by local police, United States military authorities at Soesterberg Air Base requested his immediate surrender. The Dutch government held a preliminary hearing to consider the request. At this and subsequent proceedings, Short's Dutch defense counsel argued, first, that the United States had waived its primary right to jurisdiction, second, that it had no legal judicial authority in the Netherlands and, finally, that Netherlands law prohibits the surrender of any accused who may face capital punishment.

Although the District Court at The Hague acknowledged the United States' primary jurisdiction, it accepted the defense argument that his surrender would violate Dutch human rights law. Therefore, it ordered that Short not be surrendered until the government could obtain assurances from the United States that a possible death sentence would not be carried out. After this initial decision, the United States rejected numerous Dutch diplomatic efforts to obtain either a waiver of its primary jurisdiction or assurances that Short would not be either sentenced or put to death. United States military policy

13. See infra section III, notes 57-95 and accompanying text.
15. Although an in-depth discussion of the various Dutch judicial decisions that resulted in this conclusion is beyond the scope of this paper, I plan to address it in a future article. Essentially, although the Dutch criminal courts ultimately agreed that the United States did, indeed, have primary criminal jurisdiction over this offense and, therefore, that the Dutch could not prosecute him, the civil courts have continued to resist U.S. efforts to return him to its military control. The primary bases for its decision are, first, The Netherlands' adherence to the European Convention on Human Rights and, second, the recent opinion by the European Court of Human Rights in the Soering case. Both of these authorities state unequivocally that parties to the European Convention may not participate in any decision likely to result in the application of capital punishment.
16. Unlike the Soering case cited above and described below, this case never reached the European Commission or Court; it was handled entirely within the Dutch courts. How it got there and how it was handled should be issues of greatest U.S. interest and concern.
17. See Special Interest Case Update Message from 32d TPS/IA to HQ USARP/JACI (Apr. 22, 1988).
prevents waiver of jurisdiction\(^1\) and the Uniform Code of Military Justice prohibits giving such guarantees\(^2\).

While the district court decision was being appealed by the Dutch Ministry of Justice, a Dutch criminal court convicted Short of manslaughter and sentenced him to six years imprisonment\(^3\). Very shortly thereafter, the civil appellate court in The Hague reversed the initial district court decision, but did not address the criminal trial.\(^4\) In its decision, the appeals court again acknowledged that the SOFA allocates primary jurisdiction to the United States. However, instead of interpreting Dutch law and the ECHR as superceding the SOFA, it construed them as consistent: since the SOFA exempted Short from Dutch criminal jurisdiction, it also removed him from its civil id ECHR jurisdiction. Thus, the latter laws and treaty did not apply.

Obviously, the criminal and civil appeals court decisions conflicted. Both were appealed. The criminal appeals court reversed the trial court, holding that since the United States had jurisdiction, Dutch courts lacked authority to hear the criminal case.\(^5\) The Dutch High Court in The Hague reversed the civil appeals court, ruling that the Netherlands' obligations under the ECHR must prevail over conflicting SOFA allocations of jurisdiction.\(^6\) At that point, unless either decision was somehow reversed, the ultimate result would be that SSgt Short -- a brutal murderer -- would be a free man in the Netherlands. As it ultimately turned out, he was released to the U.S. military at the end of 1990. His surrender came after the United States Air Force assured the Dutch government that he would be tried only on non-capital charges.\(^7\) Although the immediate problem is gone, deep concerns remain about how future cases will be handled.

The opinion in this tangle deserving of the most attention is the Dutch High Court's decision. The Court divided its relatively meager analysis into three distinct parts. First, as a threshold matter, it considered whether the ECHR even applied to SSgt Short. Because he "reside[d] on the territory of the state"\(^8\) and the Dutch government exercised "actual power and

---

1. See infra section III, notes 147-68 and accompanying text.
3. See Message from CINCUSAF to USCINCUEUR (Oct. 18, 1988).
4. See Message from 32d TPS/JA to HQ USAF/JACI (Nov. 21, 1988).
5. See Memorandum from HQ USASAF/JACI to HQ USAF/JAC (Jan. 7, 1990).
7. Letter from Colonel Richard M. Suttle, U.S. Country Representative, to Mrs T.A.T. Krug, Public Prosecutor (Oct. 24, 1990). This highly-unorthodox guarantee was given only after an investigatory hearing under Article 32, ECHR, determined that SSgt Short's mental capacity at the time of his offense precluded his trial on capital charges.
8. See Short High Court Decision, supra section 11, note 14, at 7.
responsibility" over him, the Court held that it did.

This threshold decision joined the conflict between the ECHR and the NATO SOFA. Recognizing that the SOFA required SSgt Short's surrender and that, after Soering, the ECHR prohibited the extradition of anyone facing possible capital punishment, the High Court's second step was to search for a principle in international law that might resolve this impasse. Finding none, it finally resorted to its public policy to tip the scales in the ECHR's favor.

As we shall see throughout this paper, the High Court relied heavily on the Soering case. Although Soering dealt with matters that arose under an extradition treaty with provisions significantly different from the SOFA, the High Court considered it applicable. The Court also understood that its decision would force its government to violate the SOFA. It is this conflict between the United States and European views of human rights generally and of capital punishment in particular that has prompted the Society's call for the SOFA's reexamination. Having seen one result of this conflict, we will now consider how it began.

B. The Soering Case

In March 1985, Jens Soering, an 18 year old West German citizen, was an undergraduate student at the University of Virginia. While there, he fell in love with Elizabeth Haysom, a fellow student. Their relationship apparently became quite intense, described by psychiatrists later as a "folie a deux". This is a situation in which one partner is psychotic and the other "is suggestible to the extent that he or she believes in the psychotic delusions of the other." Miss Haysom was severely mentally disturbed and Mr. Soering was "stupefied" and "mesmerized" by her.

Apparently, Miss Haysom's parents, who lived nearby in Bedford County, disapproved of her relationship. What was her solution? She and Soering decided to kill them. On 30 March 1985, they rented a car in Charlottesville, Virginia, drove to Washington, D.C. to set up an alibi, and returned to the Haysoms' house. After a discussion during which the Haysoms repeated

---

27. Id.
28. See Soering, supra section II, note 10, at 1074.
29. Id.
their objections to the relationship, an argument ensued. Soering ended it quickly by killing both Mr. and Mrs. Haysom with a knife.\footnote{See \textit{id.} at \textit{160}.}

In October 1985, Soering and Elizabeth Haysom fled to the United Kingdom, where they were apprehended for check fraud in April 1986. During their detention by British authorities, an investigator from the Bedford County Sheriff's Department traveled to England and obtained Soering's confession to the murders. In June 1986, Soering was indicted for murder by a grand jury of the Circuit Court of Bedford County; the United States requested his extradition shortly thereafter.\footnote{See \textit{id.} at \textit{171}.}

The extradition process in the United Kingdom apparently was handled quite routinely, beginning with the issue of a warrant for Soering's arrest and a request, through diplomatic channels, for assurances from the United States that he would not be subject to the death penalty if convicted of murder. The United States - United Kingdom extradition treaty requires such assurances; without them, it gives the United Kingdom the discretion not to surrender an accused who might face a death sentence. In due course, the Attorney for Bedford County -- the official responsible for Soering's ultimate prosecution -- agreed. However, rather than guaranteeing that he would not face the death penalty, the attorney merely stated that he would make a representation to the judge at sentencing that "it is the wish of the United Kingdom that the death penalty should not be imposed or carried out."\footnote{See \textit{id.} at \textit{172}.} The British government considered that sufficient. Ultimately, the European Court of Human Rights disagreed.

As the United States extradition process continued, it encountered some opposition. First, the Federal Republic of Germany submitted its own extradition request. Although it maintained that it, too, had jurisdiction over the offense and the offender, the British Director of Public Prosecutions denied the request on the basis that Germany could not sustain the necessary prima facie case. Second, Soering petitioned the British courts not to extradite him to the United States. Instead, he wanted to go to West Germany, a country that also has abolished the death penalty. His request was also denied and on 3 August 1988, the Secretary of State ordered his surrender to United States authorities. Before the surrender warrant could be executed, however, Soering petitioned the European Commission of Human Rights. Having satisfied the ECHR's admissibility rules, Soering's complaint made its way to the European Court of Human Rights. On 7 July 1989, after a full hearing and in a lengthy opinion, the Court enjoined the United Kingdom from extraditing him to the United States.
The heart of the Court's decision is its analysis of the conditions in the prison in which Soering would be held in the event he received the death penalty. It concluded that those conditions would subject him to a phenomenon it called the "death row syndrome". It considered Soering's description of this syndrome as it might apply to him:

[The death row phenomenon consists of] the delays in the appeal and review procedures following a death sentence, during which time he would be subject to increasing tension and psychological trauma; the fact . . . that the judge or jury in determining sentence is not obliged to take into account the defendant's age and mental state at the time of the offense; the extreme conditions of his future detention on "death row" in Mecklenburg Correctional Center, where he expects to be the victim of violence and sexual abuse because of his age, colour and nationality; and the constant spectre of the execution itself, including the ritual of execution. 33

The Court limited its inquiry to the question whether Soering might be subjected to "inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment" contrary to Article 3 of the ECHR because it recognized, as we shall see later, that the ECHR itself does not prohibit capital punishment. 34 While the Sixth Protocol does specifically call for the abolition of the death penalty, it did not apply to this case because the United Kingdom had not ratified it. After considering all arguments, the Court decided that the ECHR does proscribe the inhuman and degrading "death row syndrome". The fact that Soering risked such treatment in the United States prevented the United Kingdom from extraditing him there.

We will consider other aspects of the European Court's rationale in more detail later. For now, it is sufficient to note that even without the Sixth Protocol, it found a way to prevent Soering's exposure to capital punishment. This Court's convoluted and sometimes-tortured reasoning occasionally lacked objectivity. That fact, however, supports even more the notion that opposition to the death penalty is more than a legal issue in Europe. It is also a moral issue and the Sixth Protocol merely adds legal reinforcement. Judging from the Short case, it also has become a pillar of Dutch public policy.

33. Id. at 1098.
34. Id. at 1096-97.
III. The United States Position: Reliance on "Black Letter" International Law

Jurisdictional conflicts between sending and receiving states are not new phenomena. In fact, a similar dispute almost forty years ago led to the negotiation of the NATO SOFA. With the common experience of World War II behind them, the NATO nations understood many of the problems both sending and receiving states might confront when military forces are stationed on foreign soil. The NATO SOFA is a reflection of their common attempt to anticipate and deal with those issues. Due primarily to the spirit of cooperation that has marked NATO's overall success, that treaty has remained remarkably noncontroversial.

The NATO SOFA is already a treaty of significant compromise. In the Short case, the compromise failed. Before considering whether the SOFA's failure here supports the proposition that it should be renegotiated, it is important to understand the treaty, its history and evolution, and its provisions. After that brief review, this section focuses on the SOFA provisions and principles involved both in Short and in two fundamental United States arguments: first, that the High Court violated the NATO SOFA and, second, that its violation was not justified under international law. Finally, it considers U.S. policy in anticipation of the Dutch argument that its SOFA violation was based on its public policy.

A. A Brief History of the NATO SOFA

Any analysis of criminal jurisdiction over visiting military forces must begin and end with the principle of territorial sovereignty. In this context, that fundamental principle states that the admission of a force in peacetime is always subject to the consent of the territorial sovereign and to the conditions it imposes. One of the first commentators on this subject, Chief Justice John Marshall, addressed it in The Schooner Exchange v. McFaddon. That case involved an attempt by the American owners of a ship to recover it after it had been captured by the French and appropriated to its use as a warship. In dismissing the suit, Marshall emphasized that "the jurisdiction of a nation within its own territory is necessarily exclusive and absolute;

-------------------
2. See generally, supra section II, note 7, and accompanying text.
3. See S. Lazareff, supra section II, note 1, at 8.
4. 11 U.S. (7 Cranch) 116 (1812).
it is susceptible of no limitation not imposed by itself."5 Nevertheless, when the vessel entered the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, it did so pursuant to a traditional waiver of that jurisdiction with respect to the public armed ships of a foreign sovereign.6

Although his classic formulation of territorial sovereignty established that it is "exclusive and absolute", Marshall also recognized that it may be self-limited. In fact, he described three situations in which nations had traditionally limited their territorial sovereignty: the immunity afforded foreign sovereigns, diplomatic immunity, and the immunity of foreign troops in transit with the territorial sovereign's consent.7 While his opinion is perhaps best known as one of the first authoritative expressions of the absolute theory of foreign sovereign immunity,8 its corollary principle of absolute immunity of visiting forces was also important. In fact, it was the basis of the rule that guided American foreign and military policy for almost 150 years thereafter: that U.S. forces abroad were subject only to "the law of the flag".9

1. The "Law of the Flag"

For quite some time after The Schooner Exchange, many scholars and international lawyers held the view that a military force "operating on foreign soil is in no way subject to the territorial sovereign and exercises an exclusive right of jurisdiction over its members."10 License to enter or cross a foreign nation necessarily carried with it an express or implied right to maintain military discipline free from the territorial

5. Id. at 136.
6. Id. at 145.
7. Id. at 137-40.
9. See e.g., S. Lazareff, supra section II, note 1, at 13.
10. See S. Lazareff, supra section II, note 1, at 12 (quoting A. Chalufour, Le statut juridique de Forces alliées pendant la guerre 1914-1918 (1927)(unpublished thesis)). In contrast, some commentators dispute whether international law ever recognized a State's exclusive criminal jurisdiction over its forces abroad. In the extensive hearings leading to the U.S. Senate's ratification of the NATO SOFA, some lawmakers argued that its formula for shared sending and receiving State jurisdiction reflected a departure from customary international law. See e.g., Supplementary SOFA Hearings, supra section II, note 5 at 56 (statement of Senator Bricker). They suggested that the United States would have more jurisdiction over its troops on foreign soil without a treaty because customary international law would then vest exclusive jurisdiction in their commanders. The United States Attorney General disagreed. In an often-cited opinion to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, see also SOFA Revision Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 9, he argued that customary international law never conferred exclusive jurisdiction to the sending State. Construing Chief Justice Marshall's opinion extremely narrowly, he stated that "The Schooner Exchange, ... which is the chief reliance of those who contend that the visiting forces are entitled to absolute immunity, stands for no such proposition." Supplementary SOFA Hearings, supra section II, note 3, at 38 (Department of Justice Memorandum of Law). While the Attorney General may have been correct -- Marshall's opinion may have been read too broadly -- the fact that the practice of the United States and other nations, and the writings of scholars accepted sovereign’s interference. This, in turn, was translated into two separate but equally important concepts: absolute immunity of individual military members from the criminal jurisdiction of the receiving State and the immunity of the sending State’s disciplinary processes from the receiving State’s "supervisory jurisdiction".

It is clear that one of Chief Justice Marshall’s fundamental assumptions in The Schooner Exchange was that the need to maintain discipline forms a cornerstone of military doctrine. Without the authority or ability to impose punishment within his unit, a commander would soon lose control; his "forces would cease to be an army and would become a mob." Indeed, universal recognition of this fact has been one of the few constants throughout this debate. It is perhaps the central theme of the "law of the flag" theory.

Exclusive sending state jurisdiction over its military forces evolved before and after The Schooner Exchange as a result of international practice. Since most of it was based on the brief transit of those forces through foreign territory, this concession from the receiving sovereign was almost always only implied. As the practice evolved to permanently stationing forces abroad, however, agreements and their jurisdictional arrangements became more formal. The earliest of these agreements arose during wars. In World War I, "a series of agreements concluded by France granted exclusive jurisdiction to the military tribunals of the armed forces of the Allied Powers in France over the members of those forces." After the war, the United Kingdom continued to exercise exclusive criminal jurisdiction over its forces in Egypt and, together with the United States, negotiated immunity from receiving state jurisdiction during World War II. In recognition of this absolute immunity as a principle of international law is sufficient proof that it did exist. See generally The Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. 677, 20 S.Ct. 290, 44 L.Ed, 320 (1900).

11. See e.g., King, supra note 6, at 31.
12. Id.
13. See supra notes 43-64 and accompanying text.
14. See generally id. at 140.
15. King, supra section II, note 6, at 18.
16. See The Schooner Exchange v. McFadden, supra section III, note 4, at 139.
18. Supplementary SOPA Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 41 (Department of Justice Memorandum of Law). In his argument that international law never supported the "law of the flag" theory, the Attorney General distinguishes these agreements by suggesting that they recognized the status of British and American forces as occupation powers in complete control over the territory they occupied. That should be distinguished from the status of a force as an invited guest during peacetime. In the latter situation, he argued, international law does not accord the sending State the same prerogatives.
19. See S. Lazareff, supra section II, note 1, at 23.
20. See e.g., Supplementary SOPA Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 42 (Department of Justice Memorandum of Law). In his submission to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, the Attorney General conceded that during World War II, the United States was not the only allied power to obtain exclusive jurisdiction over widespread practice, some scholars continued to regard exclusive jurisdiction as a necessary characteristic of stationing forces abroad.

As the absolute theory of sovereign immunity began to give way to the restrictive theory, the scope of "the law of the flag" also began to narrow. Courts and writers began limiting its formerly infinite breadth, whittling away at its edges.

Despite such attempts to interpret more narrowly the exclusivity of sending state jurisdiction, the United States continued to apply the broader "law of the flag" concept in its foreign affairs. Thus, as mentioned above, in World Wars I and II the United States insisted upon and generally received the right to discipline its troops exclusive of receiving state criminal jurisdiction and free from its interference.

While some saw this insistence as a departure from generally accepted concepts of international law, others considered it consistent with the still-viable "law of the flag".

Faced with the need to maintain an effective security apparatus in Europe following World War II, the NATO nations recognized the need for a treaty that established the rights and obligations of visiting forces. To that end, the Brussels Treaty powers -- France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Belgium, and the United Kingdom -- signed the "Status of Members of the Armed Forces Abroad. While we insisted on such rights in the United Kingdom, see (exchange of notes), the United Kingdom itself obtained the same rights in Belgium, China, Ethiopia, and Portugal.

21. See e.g., King, supra section II, note 6.
22. Thus, Oppenheim, in his international law treatise, acknowledged that:

Whenever armed forces are on foreign territory in the service of their home state, they are considered extraterritorial and remain, therefore, under its jurisdiction. A crime committed on foreign territory by a member of these forces cannot be punished by the local civil or military authorities, but only by the commanding officer of the forces or by other authorities of their home state.

To this restatement of the theory of exclusive jurisdiction, he added an important qualification:

This rule, however, applies only in case the crime is committed, either within the place where the force is stationed, or in some place where the criminal was on duty; it does not apply, if, for example, soldiers belonging to a foreign garrison of a fortress leave the rayon of the fortress, not on duty but for recreation and pleasure, and then and there commit a crime. The local authorities are in that case competent to punish them.

23. Oppenheim, supra section II, note 2, at 670. See also C. Hyde, International Law 432 (1922).
24. See supra section III, notes 16-21 and accompanying text.
27. The original NATO SOFA signatories were Belgium, Canada, Denmark, France, Iceland, Italy, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, Norway, Portugal, the United Kingdom, and the United States.
Forces of the Brussels Treaty Powers" agreement in 1949. To many, this treaty signaled an end to the concept of exclusive sending state jurisdiction. Although it recognized continued sending state jurisdiction over members of its military force, it also subjected those members to prosecution in the courts of the receiving state. While this particular treaty never entered into force, it "allowed its . . . members to define a common attitude on the subject, an attitude which allowed them to go to the London negotiations on the Status of the NATO Forces with a common approach." Of course, that approach advocated shared jurisdiction.

Although the United States delegation to the NATO SOFA negotiations continued to adhere to the "law of the flag" theory

27. See Supplementary SOFA Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 45.

28. Barton notes that in "contributions which have been made in recent years to the subject of the liability of members of a visiting force to criminal proceedings in a local court for an offense against the local law, writers have assured their readers that almost all of the Western European states are firmly committed to the view that under international law there is no such liability. To support this contention reference is made to the jurisdictional agreements concluded by the Governments of Belgium and France during the First World War, to the writings of British, French, and Netherlands international lawyers, and, for confirmation of British state practice, to a statement of the Attorney-General in the House of Commons. . . . According to such a view it would be a foregone conclusion that any arrangement between Western European states for the visit and sojourn of their armed forces in one another's territory would make provision for the absolute immunity of members of those forces from criminal jurisdiction in the local courts.

Contrary to this supposition, the multilateral Agreement concluded in the form of a treaty between . . . Belgium, France, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom . . . provided that members of a visiting force would, without exception, be subject to the exercise of criminal jurisdiction by the local courts." Barton, supra section II, note 3, at 205.

29. See Supplementary SOFA Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 45. Article 7(2) of that agreement provided:

Members of a "foreign force" who commit an offense in the "receiving state" against the laws in force in that state can be prosecuted in the courts of the "receiving state".

When the act is also an offense against the law of the "sending state," the authorities of the "receiving state" will examine with the greatest sympathy any request, received before the court has declared its verdict, for the transfer of the accused for trial before the courts of the "sending state."

Where a "member of a foreign force" commits an offense against the security of, or involving disloyalty to, the "sending state" or an offense against its property, or an offense against a member of the force to which he belongs, the authorities of the "receiving state" where the offense was committed will prosecute only if they consider that special considerations require them to do so.

The competent military authorities of the "foreign force" shall have, within the "receiving state," any jurisdiction conferred upon them by the law of the "sending state" in relation to an offense committed by a member of their own armed forces.

30. S. Lazaroff, supra section II, note 1, at 45.
in principle, its initial draft conceded an allocation of jurisdiction not significantly different from that of the Brussels Treaty. This draft and the ultimate agreement thus established a formula for sharing criminal jurisdiction over the members of visiting forces between the sending and receiving states. In a moment, we will consider its contours.

2. Exclusive Receiving State Jurisdiction

The United States' ratification of the NATO SOFA marked the end of its adherence to the notion of exclusive sending state jurisdiction. As a result, it appears that the United States no longer seriously considers the "law of the flag" theory to be a viable principle of international law.

During the ratification process, United States legislators understood that the SOFA would replace exclusive jurisdiction in the NATO states, however, many contended that the "law of the flag" would continue where no status of forces treaty existed. The United States Attorney General disagreed. In his often-cited and comprehensive memorandum to the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, he examined customary international law and concluded that in the absence of a SOFA, U.S. military forces would be subject to the receiving state's exclusive criminal jurisdiction. Although his was just another opinion among many on both sides of this debate, it was particularly persuasive. Ultimately, it not only secured the NATO SOFA's ratification, it also helped prevent later Senate efforts to withdraw from it.

The principle of territorial sovereignty formed the basis for the Attorney General's view that the sending state would possess no jurisdiction over its troops in the absence of a contrary agreement. "All exemptions from territorial jurisdiction," he said, "must be derived from the consent of the..."

31. See Summary Record of a Meeting of the Working Group on Status, MS-R(51) 4 (Jan. 31, 1951), reprinted in NATO Travaux Preparatoires, supra section II, note 5, at 64. "Commenting on Article VI of the draft prepared by his Delegation, the United States Representative drew the attention of the Working Group to the following points. Article VI [dealing with jurisdiction over the visiting forces] was based on the principle that the jurisdiction of the receiving State applied to 'foreign forces and civilian personnel,'... This principle, on which the United States draft was based, differed from international law, which provided that -- in the absence of any special agreement -- the sending State retained the right of jurisdiction over its forces stationed outside the national territory. The international law on the subject was largely inspired by the decision of Chief Justice Marshall in the case of The Schooner Exchange v. McPadden..."

33. See generally Barton, supra section III, notes 57-85 and accompanying text.

34. See generally Barton, supra section III, note 1, at 364-5.

35. See e.g., Supplementary SOFA Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 2.

36. See id. at 38.

37. See SCFA Revision Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 20 (Department of State memorandum).
In a contemporary world that views states as equals and regards their sovereignty highly, this view carries great weight. Although the NATO SOFA and similar treaties have made it a moot issue, it is safe to say that, without them, this is the view that would prevail today.

B. The Netherlands Violated the NATO SOFA's Text: Some "Jurisdictional" Arguments

The NATO SOFA represents the most recent innovation in the progress of extraterritorial military criminal jurisdiction. As a treaty of significant compromise, it has until recently also successfully occupied the middle ground between the prior "law of the flag" and exclusive receiving state theories of jurisdiction. Cases like Short, however, suggest that this evolution is not yet complete.

In Short, we saw that U.S. and European views of capital punishment differ. We shall now see exactly how that divergence affects the NATO SOFA and vice versa. Following is a discussion of the language and concepts at the core of the NATO SOFA compromise, their jurisdictional framework, and how each conflicts with the Dutch High Court's Short decision. Together, they form the basis of the United States' argument that the High Court violated this treaty -- a treaty that for forty years has been "black letter" international law.

1. Judicial Jurisdiction Under the NATO SOFA

The Restatement (Third) of The Foreign Relations Law of the United States recognizes that international law limits states' jurisdiction.

38. Supplementary SOFA Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 50 (quoting The Schooner Exchange v. McFadden, 11 D.S. (7 Cranch) 116, 143 (1812))

39. Finally, it is interesting to note that, despite this contemporary view that sending State jurisdiction is an exception to the rule of territorial sovereignty, an amicus curiae brief filed by a Dutch attorney to the Short court of appeals argued that the "law of the flag" theory still prevails. See Amicus Brief for the United States, Short v. The Kingdom of the Netherlands, Gerechtshof (Aug. 29, 1988). This attorney was retained by the United States to present the Dutch law that supported United States jurisdiction. Apparently, his surprising reliance on exclusive sending State jurisdiction as the rule the SOFA modified was, indeed, a reasonable Dutch interpretation of international law. The court of appeals agreed with the argument and the High Court did not expressly reject it. See Short High Court Decision, supra section II, note 14.

In fact, the Dutch representative to the NATO SOFA negotiations argued against the Italian view that sending State jurisdiction ought to be characterized as an exception to the receiving State's right of jurisdiction. The Dutch representative "regarded the rule of the right of jurisdiction of the receiving State to be an exception to the principle of the right of jurisdiction of the sending State; military acts fell normally within the competence of the military authorities. In his opinion, this was the rule adopted by international law." Summary Record of a Meeting of the Working Group on Status (Juridical Subcommittee), MS(T)-R(S1) 2 (Feb. 3, 1951), reprinted in NATO Travaux Preparatoires, supra section II, note 5, at 94. Thus, while the United States has conceded that it may no longer exercise exclusive jurisdiction over its troops abroad, apparently the States in which they are stationed do not uniformly agree.
exercise of three types of jurisdiction: prescriptive, enforcement, and adjudicative. Adjudicative or judicial jurisdiction, our focus here, is the state's authority to "subject persons or things to the process of its courts." Traditionally, one of those limits held that a state could not exercise its jurisdiction beyond its borders. Today, however, there are many exceptions.

In the context of extraterritorial exercise of jurisdiction, judicial jurisdiction assumes two different forms. The first and most common focuses on a court's power to decide issues concerning matters or parties outside its territorial reach. As a rule, state courts may adjudicate only those offenses committed within the state. As a corollary, that reach extends only to violations of that state's criminal law; it is generally agreed that states do not enforce the penal laws of other states. More important for this discussion, however, is a second form of judicial authority: the ability of a state's courts to conduct trials within another state. Although the United States and other nations have, throughout history, exercised this aspect of judicial authority extraterritorially, it is widely accepted today that the sovereignty of other states prohibits that practice. The only recognized exception is the military court-martial conducted pursuant to a status of forces treaty.

a. Sending State Judicial Jurisdiction. The NATO SOFA establishes its concept of shared jurisdiction over visiting forces in the first paragraph of Article VII:

1. Subject to the provisions of this Article,

   (a) the military authorities of the sending state shall have the right to exercise within the receiving state all criminal and disciplinary jurisdiction conferred on them by the law of the sending state over all persons subject to the military law of that state;

   (b) the authorities of the receiving state shall have jurisdiction over the members of a force or civilian component and their dependents with respect to

------------------------
40. Id.
41. Id. at 421(b).
42. See The Lotus Case (France v. Turkey) 1927 P.C.I.J., ser. A, No. 10 (acknowledging that while the territorial character of criminal law is fundamental, many States have exceptions that extend the reach of their criminal laws).
44. See supra section III, notes 34-39 and accompanying text.
45. See Restatement, supra section III, note 43, at sec. 422 n. 5.
offences committed within the territory of the receiving state and punishable by the law of that state.46

This clearly recognizes the rights of both sending and receiving states to punish military members for violations of their respective criminal laws. More important, however, is the fact that paragraph 1(a) grants the sending state the right to exercise that authority within the borders of the receiving state. This has been interpreted, during the negotiations47 and through subsequent practice, to allow sending states to convene courts-martial within the receiving state. Those who advocated continuing U.S. exclusive jurisdiction over its military abroad probably did not regard this express grant of sending state judicial jurisdiction as significant because it did not change U.S. practice up to that point. In this respect, it is arguable that Article VII merely codified customary international law. However, those who recognized that the exercise of judicial jurisdiction within the borders of another state is a substantial intrusion into its territorial sovereignty must have appreciated its importance. At least one author did.

In the first of his three articles during this period on the status of visiting forces, a British international law scholar, Dr. G. P. Barton, discussed this customary practice as it existed prior to the SOFA.48 To enforce military law, visiting forces traditionally carried their courts with them. At the same time, many Western nations also operated what were known as "consular courts". In "non-Christian states", these courts often exercised complete civil and criminal jurisdiction. . . over the privileges, life, and property of their countrymen."49 Needless to say, the latter courts were extremely unpopular among receiving states and were considered, even at that time, to be contrary to the principles of international law.50 As a result, they were eventually eliminated.51 In contrast, 46. NATO SOFA, supra section II, note 4, at art. VII, para. 1.

47. See Summary Record of a Meeting of the Working Group on Status (Juridical Subcommittee), MS(J)-R(51) 4 (Feb. 16, 1951), reprinted in NATO Travauz Preparatoires, supra section II, note 5, at 100. The parties appeared to take for granted that sending State military authorities could, under the Agreement, conduct courts-martial within the borders of the receiving State. Removing all doubt, this subcommittee extended the definition of "military authorities" to include civilian judicial authorities "who might be brought within the territory of the receiving State for the application of the present Agreement."
49. L. Oppenheim, supra section II, note 2, at 688.
50. See id.
51. See Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 12, 77 S.Ct. 1222, 1228, 1 L.Ed.2d 1148 (1957). courts-martial survived, apparently resting on firmer foundations.52

Although it is now well-settled that the United States or any other sending state may convene military courts-martial in the territory of consenting receiving states, that authority clearly has limits. The portion of Article VII quoted above suggests that one such limit is the receiving state's concurrent judicial jurisdiction. Not only does that provision allow the sending state to try its military members within the receiving state, it vests the same authority in the latter's courts. The conflict inherent in this overlapping jurisdiction is resolved by the rest of Article VII, which further allocates to each court the types of offenses it can adjudicate. This is the concept of shared criminal jurisdiction that we will examine shortly. Another possible constraint is the receiving state's ability to supervise sending state courts. As we shall now see, that is really not a limit at all.

b. Receiving State Supervisory Jurisdiction. The fact that sending state courts-martial operate on foreign soil only because its forces are permitted to be there raises the additional question whether their jurisdiction may also be limited by the receiving state or its courts. It is an important issue because the Short case raises it.

Barton concludes that a receiving state's courts have no "supervisory jurisdiction" over sending state military courts. He defines that jurisdiction by example:

52. See L. Oppenheim, supra section II, note 2, at 669. Barton thus concluded that customary international law supported this extraterritorial exercise of sending State judicial authority:

The consent of a state to the presence in its territory of the armed forces of friendly foreign State implies an obligation to allow the service courts and authorities of that visiting force to exercise such jurisdiction in matters of discipline and internal administration over members of that force as are derived from their own law.

Nevertheless, he also admitted that it was, indeed, a significant intrusion into the sovereignty of the receiving State:

The right of service courts and authorities of a foreign state to exercise their jurisdiction in the territory of the local state comprises a significant exception to the sovereignty of the latter state over its territory.

Barton, supra section II, note 48, at 410-11. The fact that courts-martial flourished supports the idea that Article VII's establishment of sending State judicial jurisdiction is merely a codification of customary international law. This conclusion is supported by the writings of other international law scholars of Barton's and earlier eras. See L. Oppenheim, supra section II, note 2, at 669; C. Hyde, supra section III, note 27, at 432. Thus, the operation of United States military courts-martial in the Netherlands is based, first, on customary international law and, second, on the NATO SOFA. Both, in turn, depend on Dutch consent to the presence of United States forces. In this case, the extraterritorial exercise of United States military judicial jurisdiction rests on solid international legal foundations.
If the Swiss [sending state] courts-martial were recognized as inferior judicial tribunals by English [receiving state] law, and if Y [a member of the Swiss visiting forces] could show some excess of jurisdiction or other irregularity in the proceedings of the court martial trying him, it would appear that the writs of prohibition or certiorari would be available as an effective means of preventing the apprehended wrong. By exercising jurisdiction in these ways the English courts would be supervising the exercise of the powers given to the service courts and authorities of the visiting force in matters of discipline and internal administration by the law of the state to which they belong.53

In other words, supervisory jurisdiction is one court's power to limit another's exercise of authority. Within a single state, superior courts routinely assert that power over inferior courts.54 In the international context, however, Barton suggests that such a relationship between courts of different states would violate the sovereignty of the state whose courts' authority was thus limited.55 As between them, he concludes that receiving state consent to allow visiting force courts-martial "effectively implies an obligation to secure the immunity of the visiting forces from the supervisory jurisdiction of the local courts."56 Logically, visiting forces' courts-martial should operate independently; any other conclusion would allow receiving State courts to protect foreign military personnel from prosecution, violate the sending state's sovereignty, and undermine the SOFA's allocation of criminal jurisdiction.

The applicability of this principle to Short is obvious. By basing its refusal to surrender SSgt Short on the possibility that he may face the death penalty, the High Court limited the exercise of a court-martial's authority in exactly the manner Barton and reasonableness condemn. It anticipated a military court's judgment and substituted its own.

2. Criminal Jurisdiction Under the NATO SOFA

Because concurrent judicial jurisdiction does not mean that a receiving state court has supervisory jurisdiction over a sending state court, it necessarily does mean that each body has its own sphere of authority. That notion is the basis for the SOFA's second area of shared jurisdiction: criminal jurisdiction.
jurisdiction. In SOFA parlance, the term criminal jurisdiction encompasses the other forms of jurisdiction recognized by the Restatement -- enforcement and prescriptive -- as well as the other aspect of judicial jurisdiction: the power to adjudicate violations of criminal law.\textsuperscript{57}

Article VII defines two types of criminal jurisdiction. First, receiving and sending states enjoy exclusive jurisdiction over acts violating the criminal laws of one but not the other.\textsuperscript{58} Second, when a military member violates the laws of both states, the criminal jurisdiction of each is concurrent with the other and the SOFA further identifies which state has the primary right to prosecute.\textsuperscript{59} By defining the boundaries between the receiving and sending state courts in terms of exclusive and primary concurrent jurisdiction, the SOFA reinforces the principle that neither has authority over the other. Only one court has the independent power to prosecute any one case at any one time.

\textbf{a. Exclusive Criminal Jurisdiction.} The NATO SOFA still recognizes the concept of exclusive jurisdiction. While it is not applied nearly as broadly as the United States exercised it before and during World War II, the SOFA nevertheless acknowledges that sending and receiving states each have special interests codified in their criminal laws.\textsuperscript{60} Article VII, paragraph 2, establishes the right of each to pursue its interests:

2. (a) The military authorities of the sending state shall have the right to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over persons subject to the military law of that state with respect to offences, including offences relating to its security, punishable by the law of the sending state, but not by the law of the receiving state.

(b) The authorities of the receiving state shall have the right to exercise exclusive jurisdiction over members of a force or civilian component and their dependents with respect to offences, including offences relating to the security of that state, punishable by its law but not by the law of the sending state.\textsuperscript{61}

Thus, when an act violates the law of one state but not the other, the offended state has the exclusive right to prosecute and punish the offender.

\textsuperscript{57} See Restatement, supra section III, note 43, at sec. 401.
\textsuperscript{58} See infra section III, notes 60-67 and accompanying text.
\textsuperscript{59} See infra section III, notes 68-85 and accompanying text.
\textsuperscript{60} For a discussion of the notion that agreements such as the SOFA allocate jurisdiction as a function of prevailing State interests, see Barton, supra section III, note 2, at 357.
\textsuperscript{61} NATO SOFA, supra section III, note 4, at art. VII, para. 2.
One question that arose during the Senate Foreign Relations Committee's NATO SOFA hearings was whether any receiving state's laws were considerably different from the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ).\textsuperscript{62} The committee's obvious concerns were that not only would these laws be unfamiliar to the average U.S. serviceman, they would form the basis for extensive receiving state exclusive jurisdiction. The State Department Legal Adviser's reply was that, because the UCMJ has a "clause which really incorporates into our military code all crimes of the locality in which the troops are operating,"\textsuperscript{63} it is unlikely that a particular act will violate only receiving state law. Although military courts have since determined that not every violation of local law is also an offense under the UCMJ, almost forty years of experience has demonstrated that the scope of exclusive receiving state jurisdiction is, indeed, quite narrow.\textsuperscript{64}

Despite some concern prior to its ratification, the NATO SOFA has not significantly undermined discipline within U.S. visiting forces.\textsuperscript{65} Since most purely-military offenses have no counterparts in receiving state criminal laws, the sending state retains exclusive jurisdiction over them.\textsuperscript{66} This, combined with the fact that the sending state retains a sort of residual jurisdiction to prosecute violations of military discipline arising out of concurrent jurisdiction offenses,\textsuperscript{67} means that commanders still exercise considerable punitive authority.

In the Short context, the allocation of exclusive criminal jurisdiction is of little direct importance. SSgt Short's crime -- murder -- is clearly a violation of the criminal laws of both the sending and receiving states. How the SOFA allocates the authority to prosecute such a crime is the subject of Article VII's next paragraph.

\textbf{b. Concurrent Criminal Jurisdiction.} When an act violates the laws of both the sending and receiving states, it is subject to neither's exclusive jurisdiction. Rather, it is governed by a \textsuperscript{63} Id.

\textsuperscript{64} See e.g., J. Snee & K. Pye, supra section II, note 7, at 32.

\textsuperscript{65} See SOFA Revisions Hearings, supra section II, note 5, at 15 (statement of General Lauris Norstad, Supreme Commander, Allied Powers, Europe).

\textsuperscript{66} Obviously, most non-military criminal codes address such offenses as AWOL, desertion, or conduct unbecoming an officer. These are examples of offenses that would fall to the sending State's exclusive jurisdiction to prosecute.

\textsuperscript{67} See NATO SOFA, supra section II, note 4, at art. VII, para 8. This provision allows the sending State to prosecute a member of its force "for any violation of rules of discipline arising from an act or omission which constituted an offence for which he was tried by the authorities of another Contracting Party."
formula that seeks to balance the interests of each state in the offense and the offender. Recalling the discussion of supervisory jurisdiction, this formula recognizes that although both states have jurisdiction to prosecute the offense, only one may practically do so. It is contained in Article VII, paragraph 3:

3. In cases where the right to exercise jurisdiction is concurrent the following rules shall apply:

(a) The military authorities of the sending state shall have the primary right to exercise jurisdiction over a member of a force . . . in relation to

(i) offenses solely against the property or security of that state, or offenses solely against the person or property of another member of the force or civilian component of that state or of a dependent;

(ii) offenses arising out of any act or omission done in the performance of official duty.

(b) In the case of any other offense the authorities of the receiving state shall have the primary right to exercise jurisdiction.

This provision gives the receiving state the primary right to exercise jurisdiction in all but two situations. The sending state has the primary right, first, when the offense is directed against sending state property or security or when its victim is another member of the visiting force or persons accompanying it. These are known as inter se offenses. The second category consists of offenses committed in the performance of official military duties.

This was the area of greatest compromise for the United States. Until the SOFA entered into force, its troops were prosecuted under the UCMJ for almost all offenses. Faced with the certainty of losing this privileged status, this formula emerged from the negotiations as the one most capable of protecting the interests of all parties. Since each NATO nation would likely be both a sending and a receiving state, the SOFA had to address concerns in both areas. As we have already seen, the parties' primary sending state concerns were to maintain military discipline and, therefore, to maximize jurisdiction over their own forces. As receiving states, their efforts to take away the special privileges that traditionally cloaked visiting forces pulled in exactly the opposite direction.

68. NATO SOFA, supra section 11, note 4, at art. VII, para. 3.
69. See e.g., Stanger, Criminal Jurisdiction over Visiting Armed Forces, Naval War C. Int'l L. Stud. 90 (1957).
70. See generally, NATO SOFA Hearings, supra section 111, note 62, at 26.
71. See e.g., id. at 5.
Article VII's formula represents a middle ground that generally preserves the military's ability to prosecute offenses most likely to prejudice good order and discipline while it gives the receiving state authority over offenses affecting its public order.72

The official duty exception reflects traditional military concern that its official operations must not be subject to the influence of forces outside the chain of command. It elicited considerable debate during the SOFA negotiations, primarily because it was perceived by some as having the capacity to transform shared jurisdiction back into exclusive sending state jurisdiction.73 Although most attempts to limit the definition of "official duty" were not incorporated into the treaty itself, subsequent practice has proved this exception to be fairly narrow.74 In practice, the determination by sending state officials that an offense arose out of official duty creates a rebuttable presumption to that effect.75 This exception to the receiving state's general primary right of jurisdiction has caused few problems during the SOFA's history. However, some of those problems, like Wilson v. Girard, created substantial controversy.76

The inter se exception recognizes the sending state's greater interest in prosecuting offenses committed entirely within its own military community.77 This concept seems to have evolved from the customary right of military forces to exercise exclusive jurisdiction on its ships and within its military installations.78 Although the SOFA's formula eliminates the distinction between crimes committed within or outside bases, it still defers to the sending state when the offender is a member of its military and the victim is military, a member of its civilian component, or a dependent.

In addition to the textual commitment of certain cases to the primary jurisdiction of either the sending or receiving state, the SOFA contains a clause that allows both parties to change this formula on a case-by-case basis. Recognizing that applying the SOFA formula mechanically may not accurately account for the interests of parties in particular cases, the negotiators included Article VII, paragraph 3(c):

If the state having the primary right decides not to exercise jurisdiction, it shall notify the authorities

72. See e.g., id.
73. See generally, Stanger, supra section III, note 69, at 222.
74. See J. Snee & K. Pye, supra section II, note 7, at 47.
75. See id. at 51-52.
76. See id. at 43. Professors Snee and Pye describe the Girard case, supra section II, note 5, as one of the most notorious divergence of views on what constitutes "an offense arising out of an act or omission done in the performance of official duty."
77. See e.g., Stanger, supra section III, note 69, at 185-89.
78. See id. at 186.
of the other state as soon as practicable. The authorities of the state having the primary right shall give sympathetic consideration to a request from the authorities of the other state for a waiver of its right in case where that other state considers such waiver to be of particular importance.79

This allows either the sending or receiving state to waive its primary right if it considers the other's prosecution motives to be more important.80 The United States military's experience in Europe suggests that many receiving States will waive their primary right unless they have particular, important reasons for asserting them.81 The United States, in contrast, rarely waives its primary right.82 This is due in part, perhaps, to the fact that its primary right is already narrowly limited to cases in which it always has important prosecution interests.83

In many NATO countries where U.S. forces are stationed, this formula has been modified. For example, the Netherlands and the United States agreed to the following expression of intent regarding the waiver of primary concurrent jurisdiction:

The Netherlands authorities recognizing that it is the primary responsibility of the United States authorities to maintain good order and discipline where persons subject to United States military law are concerned will, upon the request of the United States authorities, waive their primary right to exercise jurisdiction under Article VII, except where they determine that it is of particular importance that jurisdiction be exercised by the Netherlands authorities.84

If the basic Article VII formula allocates general primary concurrent jurisdiction to the receiving state, this "Netherlands Formula" shifts it de facto to the United States.85 Although practice supports this observation, it is only because the spirit of cooperation between these two states has been particularly 79. NATO SOFA, supra section II, note 4, at art. VII, para. 3(c).

80. See Stanger, supra section III, note 69, at 243.
81. See Parkerson & Stoehr, supra section II, note 8, at 50. For example, 1988 Department of Defense statistics show that the Netherlands waived 97.8% of its primary concurrent jurisdiction cases involving U.S. military personnel.
82. See Parkerson & Stoehr, supra section II, note 8, at 48.
83. Another reason why the U.S. almost never waives its primary right is because the "sense of the Senate", as part of its resolution giving advice and consent to the NATO SOFA treaty, is interpreted by U.S. military authorities as a requirement to maximize U.S. jurisdiction. See id.
85. See generally Stanger, supra section III, note 69, at 243-44.
strong. It is clear that this "blanket waiver" is meaningless if the Netherlands expands its view of the cases it considers "of particular importance."

3. Summary of the NATO SOFA "Jurisdictional" Arguments

Article VII's concurrent jurisdiction formula assigns the primary right to prosecute to the state with the presumed greater interests in doing so. If those interests weigh more heavily in favor of the other state in a particular case, the waiver provision allows the primary right to be reassigned.

The Short case arose under Article VII's inter se exception. Thus, its mechanical application vests the primary right to prosecute SSgt Short in the United States. The U.S. is presumed to have greater interests in cases of this type. Should that presumption have prevailed against the Netherlands' deeply-held concerns about capital punishment? Clearly, the SOFA text gives the United States the right to make that decision. First, as matters of both law and practice, the interests of the state without the primary right to prosecute are considered only in the context of Article VII's waiver provision. In this particular case, the Dutch government twice requested a waiver of the primary right from the United States. Both were refused. The United States considered its interests paramount and, under the rules of the SOFA, maintained its presumption. The goals of uniform and predictable justice are important ones, especially for a nation whose forces in the absence of a SOFA would be subject to many diverse foreign legal systems. They are advanced only if the SOFA is enforced.

A second reason why Dutch concerns about capital punishment should not automatically take precedence is rooted in Article VII's basic concept of shared jurisdiction. As we have already seen, one of Article VII's most important concessions is its recognition of the sending state's "right to exercise within the receiving state all criminal and disciplinary jurisdiction . . . over all persons subject to the military law of that state." Again, this means that military courts should be able to operate within the receiving state free of its supervisory jurisdiction. If that were not the case, jurisdiction would not truly be shared -- the sending state's exercise of jurisdiction would be subject to the receiving state's indirect control. Certainly, one of the factors the receiving state may consider when deciding whether to waive its primary right is the sentence an offender might receive

---

86. See supra section III, notes 77-78 and accompanying text.
87. NATO SOFA, supra section II, note 4, at art. VII, para. 1(a).
in the sending state's court. However, it must recognize that once it has waived that right, its lack of supervisory authority over that court places any trial outcome -- including sentence -- beyond its control. When Article VII gives the primary right to the sending state in the first instance, the receiving state has nothing to waive and the result is the same. Since Article VII vests the primary right over SSgt Short's offense in the United States, its implied assurance that this jurisdiction may be exercised without Dutch interference makes sentence irrelevant.

C. The NATO SOFA After Soering

We have just seen how the SOFA ought to have influenced the Short decision. Indeed, the High Court's opinion and the Dutch Advocaat-Generaal's particularly well-reasoned and persuasive brief conceded many of these points. Nevertheless, the Court declined to follow them. In section IV, we will consider the Society's suggestion that public policy and the fundamental status Dutch law accords the ECHR might have greatly affected its decision. In fact, the Advocaat-Generaal's recommendation that SSgt Short not be surrendered was based almost squarely upon those grounds.

As the role of human rights in European law has grown stronger, perhaps another reason for the High Court's opinion was that European regard for the SOFA has become correspondingly weaker. Unfortunately, its brief and narrow decision sheds little light on this question. Even if that factor was not part of its unpublished reasoning, it is clear that recent events -- particularly the Soering Case -- at least potentially undermine

88. Contra Parkerson & Stoehr, supra section II, note 6, at 52. These authors argue that, at least under the German SOFA supplement, "officials in the host nation who are responsible for the administration of justice may not when making waiver decisions be guided by whether a U.S. military court might impose the death sentence in particular cases." I find this position unreasonable. Waiver has long been understood as an exercise of discretion. Although the SOFA itself commits certain offenses to the exclusive or primary concurrent jurisdiction of the sending or receiving State, it places no binding constraints on the exercise of waiver.

89. See Whitley v. Aitchison, 26 I.L.R. 196 (Fr. Ct. of Cassation 1958), reprinted in W. Leech, C. Oliver & J. Sweeney, The International Legal System 469, 472. Where "the authorities of the State which has the right of primary jurisdiction have, at the request of the other State, waived that right, their decision is final, and the criminal courts of the State concerned can no longer exercise jurisdiction over facts in respect of which there has been a waiver."

90. See Opinion of Advocaat-Generaal Strikwerda, Short v. The Kingdom of the Netherlands, 29 I.L.M. 1375, 1379 (1990) [hereinafter cited as Advocaat-Generaal's Brief].
the SOFA's authority in this area. Indeed, it is quite likely that those events will form the basis for future SOFA assaults.91

After Soering, there are two particular areas where the SOFA is likely to be narrowly construed or misinterpreted. First, because Soering considered criminal immunity irrelevant to the issue of surrender, some domestic courts may regard the SOFA as merely conferring criminal immunity and thus consider it entirely inapplicable. Note, however, that the Short High Court did not do that. Second, Soering held that the ECHR prevails over extradition treaties. States that have abandoned capital punishment will thus be tempted to equate SOFA and extradition treaty surrender obligations and find, by analogy, that Soering should apply similarly to both. We shall now see that neither of these propositions is correct.

1. The NATO SOFA: Immunity "Plus"

As we have seen, the NATO SOFA lies somewhere between the two extreme "law of the flag" and exclusive receiving state sovereignty theories of visiting forces jurisdiction. Having just examined some of the Article VII language involved in the current controversy, we have also seen that the SOFA truly is or at least was intended to be a compromise. In particular, its notions of exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction incorporate mutually favored aspects of both theories. Although some scholarly attention has been devoted to defining the status of visiting forces in the absence of agreements like the SOFA, relatively little has addressed how the nature of that status changed after the SOFA -- particularly Article VII's allocation of jurisdiction -- entered into force.

Perhaps one reason why the nature of Article VII has not been examined more thoroughly is that a situation like Short never raised it. Those who have studied the NATO SOFA and its operation have generally concluded that it confers a limited immunity upon members of visiting forces.92 To the extent that they are subject to the sending state's exclusive or primary concurrent jurisdiction, they are immune from receiving state prosecution.93 This explanation apparently has been considered satisfactory because it accurately describes the mechanics of the SOFA process: whenever an offense is committed by a member of a visiting force, the sending and receiving state authorities determine whose right to prosecute prevails. The accused would then be considered immune from prosecution by the state without 91. For an interesting analysis of the Soering decision and its likely future effects, see Lillich, The Soering Case, 85 Am. J. Int'l L. 128 (1991). Although he did not consider the effects it might have on the U.S. military abroad, it is clear that Short is one of the many progeny Soering will spawn.

92. See e.g., J. Snee & K. Pye, supra section II, note 7, at 61 (analogizing immunities enjoyed by members of visiting forces with diplomatic immunity); Stanger supra section III, note 69, at 189, 224.
93. See Stanger, supra section III, note 69, at 158 n. 4.
jurisdiction. Indeed, the Dutch criminal and civil courts of appeals reached this conclusion in their Short decisions.94

Recall that in Soering, the European Court ordered the United Kingdom not to extradite Jens Soering to the United States because he faced the risk of capital punishment. In its analysis, the Court recognized that British courts could not prosecute the young man because the murders he allegedly committed occurred outside its criminal jurisdiction.95 Nevertheless, his immunity from British prosecution was considered irrelevant to the question whether he should be extradited. Although the Court acknowledged the British argument that its decision would "leave criminals untried, at large and unpunished,"96 the additional facts that the United Kingdom exercised control over Soering, had the discretion to deny extradition,97 and was obligated to protect his human rights under the ECHR prevented it from extraditing him. The question this conclusion raises is obvious: Will European states now also regard the SOFA as irrelevant?

Although the Dutch High Court acknowledged SSgt Short's immunity from its criminal jurisdiction, it did not end its analysis there.98 To its credit, it also recognized its absolute SOFA duty to surrender SSgt Short to U.S. authorities. Indeed, that is the very conflict the court attempted to resolve. Thus, it is important to recognize that although it accurately describes the allocation of criminal jurisdiction between sending and receiving states, viewing the SOFA exclusively in terms of criminal immunity does not address whether or to what extent the state without jurisdiction is obligated to surrender the accused to the state with jurisdiction.

2. The "Plus": The NATO SOFA's Duty to Surrender

Once the sending and receiving states have determined how Article VII allocates jurisdiction in a particular case, there is the additional matter of transferring the accused if he is in the other's custody. Typically, this is not a problem; the surrender is generally performed very informally, usually between the states' law enforcement authorities.99 Although the process is easy, the underlying obligation to surrender forms the difficult crux of the Short case.

95. See Soering, supra section II, note 10, at 1076.
96. Id. at 1070.
97. See id. at 1077.
98. See Short High Court Decision, supra section II, note 14, at 6-7.
99. In fact, the Netherlands Supplement to the NATO SOFA allows the United States to retain custody of military members subject to Dutch exclusive or primary jurisdiction. See Netherlands Supplement, supra section III, note 84, at annex, para. 3; Stanger, supra section III, note 69, at 254.
As we saw earlier, part of the basis for the High Court's decision not to surrender SSgt Short was its interpretation of Dutch domestic public policy as established in its approach to extradition. It compared its opposition to capital punishment to the death penalty exception in the extradition treaty between the United States and the Netherlands:

In view of the great importance that must be attached to the right not to undergo the death penalty, that balancing [of our interests in complying with either the SOFA or the ECHR] cannot turn out otherwise than in favor of Short. This also accords with the thought which forms the basis of the practice followed by the state, which is natural for states in which the death penalty is not known, when concluding extradition treaties with states where that penalty is known, of including therein a proviso such as is set forth in Art. 8 of the Extradition Act, as also occurred in Art. 7 of the Extradition Treaty with the U.S.100

Those who are familiar with concepts of extradition will readily conclude that status of forces agreements are definitely not extradition treaties and that, beyond its value as evidence of Dutch public policy, this analogy is somewhat misplaced. Indeed, the Advocaat-Generaal's brief acknowledged the differences.101 The danger after Soering is that European nations will be more likely to regard extradition treaties and the SOFA as imposing equivalent duties to surrender.

The concept of extradition in customary international law was often regarded as a matter "of imperfect obligation"102 because, in the absence of treaty or domestic statute, the law imposed upon the requested state neither a duty to surrender nor a duty not to surrender. Today, extradition between states without a treaty is purely a matter of reciprocity or courtesy.103 Even with a treaty, the obligation between parties to turn over an accused is not much clearer. Indeed, most treaties contain so many exceptions and grant the requested state so much discretion that any duty of surrender that might exist is far from definite. One particularly relevant and common exception pertains to capital punishment. A good example is the following provision in the European Convention on Extradition:

If the offence for which extradition is requested is punishable by death under the law of the requesting Party, and if in respect of such offense the 100. See Short High Court Decision, supra section II, note 14, at 10.

101. See Advocaat Generaal's Brief, supra section III, note 90, at 1379-80. The brief goes on to say that although the duty to surrender is unqualified, this distinction between the SOFA and the U.S.-Netherlands extradition treaty is irrelevant. Under Soering, any act by the state that exposes someone to capital punishment violates the ECHR.
103. See, id.
death-penalty is not provided for by the law of the requested Party or is not normally carried out, extradition may be refused unless the requesting Party gives such assurance as the requested party considers sufficient that the death-penalty will not be carried out.\textsuperscript{104}

As the Dutch High Court pointed out, a similar provision exists in the extradition treaty between the Netherlands and the United States.\textsuperscript{105} Against this background of uncertain duties and the exceptions that often consume them, it would not be difficult to regard the NATO SOFA's duty to surrender as equally weak. If, despite the Advocaat-Generaal's opinion to the contrary, this was the High Court's view, it is not surprising that the strength of Dutch public policy overpowered its obligation to enforce the SOFA. Again, the flaw in this approach is that the SOFA is not an extradition treaty.

Whereas many extradition treaties begin with an overall rule of surrender followed by numerous exceptions and qualifications, Article VII, paragraph 5(a), of the NATO SOFA simply states:

5(a) The authorities of the receiving and sending states shall assist each other in the arrest of members of a force or civilian component or their dependents in the territory of the receiving state and in handing them over to the authority which is to exercise jurisdiction in accordance with the above provisions.\textsuperscript{106}

Thus, when Article VII assigns jurisdiction to one state, this clause creates an unqualified duty of surrender in the other.\textsuperscript{107} There are no exceptions and, as the

\textsuperscript{104} European Convention on Extradition, Dec. 13, 1957, art. 11, Europ. T.S. No. 24
\textsuperscript{105} See Short High Court Decision, supra section II, note 14, at 10.
\textsuperscript{106} NATO SOFA, supra section II, note 4, at art. VII, para. 5(a).
\textsuperscript{107} In addition to the Advocaat-Generaal's brief, United States federal court decisions interpreting this and similar SOFA provisions persuasively support this conclusion. Holmes v. Laird is a good example. 459 F.2d 1211 (D.C. Cir. 1972). See also Williams v. Rogers, 449 F.2d 513, 521 (8th Cir. 1971). In 1972, two U.S. servicemen fled back to the United States from West Germany, where they had been assigned and where they had committed offenses under German law. In an effort to prevent their surrender to West German authorities under the NATO SOFA, both sought judicial protection in a U.S. district court. The District Court for the District of Columbia denied their petition and the court of appeals affirmed.

The appellants' principal argument was that their return to Germany would subject them to a trial without the constitutional safeguards available in U.S. courts. The court dismissed it as irrelevant and based its decision to surrender them, \textit{inter alia}, upon its NATO SOFA duty to do so. Although it recognized that under domestic U.S. law the Constitution would prevail over any contrary treaty, it held that in this case it did not conflict with the NATO SOFA. Thus, while "American officials having custody of appellants are fully subject to constitutional commands, it must be remembered that the contemplated surrender \textit{is the precise response required} of the United States by its treaty commitments to the Federal Republic." Id. at 1218 (emphasis added). The SOFA's "obligation to surrender", the court held, is subject to "no further authorization." Id. at 1219 n. 59.
Advocaat-Generaal admits, the surrendering state has no discretion. It is the absolute nature of this duty to surrender that makes this conflict between the SOFA and the ECHR seemingly irreconcilable.

D. The Short Decision as a Violation of International Law

1. Restriction of Sovereignty by Treaty: Are the NATO SOFA and the ECHR Really Inconsistent?

Relying on two principal arguments, the Advocaat-Generaal concluded that the SOFA and ECHR are irreconcilably inconsistent. First, he conceded that the NATO SOFA requires the Netherlands to surrender SSgt Short to U.S. authorities. He agreed that the United States had the primary right to prosecute SSgt Short and, consequently, that the Dutch government had no choice but to surrender him to his superiors at Soesterburg Air Base.

His second argument was that the ECHR also applied and that it prevented SSgt Short's surrender. Article 1 of the ECHR provides that the "High Contracting Parties shall secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in Section I of this Convention." The European Commission, he asserted, has interpreted this to include anyone under a party's "actual authority and responsibility." Although the SOFA gives the United States primary criminal jurisdiction over Short, the Advocaat-Generaal argued that this did not divest the Netherlands of its secondary concurrent jurisdiction. Because it still retained this residual jurisdiction, he considered SSgt Short to be within its "actual authority and responsibility" and, therefore, subject to the ECHR's protection. Thus, the Soering court's injunction that no one may be extradited on capital charges applies here despite the admitted fact that the SOFA's duty to surrender is not extradition.

In its opinion, the Holmes court echoed the concerns Congress expressed during its ratification hearings. It said that "[t]o Americans, steeped in a long and unique tradition of criminal-trial fairness, the prospect of a foreign prosecution under less protective standards is disturbing. That is the more so where the accused did not tread on foreign soil by choice, but rather in consequence of military assignment in the service of his country". Despite its misgivings, it nevertheless held that the NATO SOFA's duty to surrender was binding upon it. Although the High Court in Short also recognized that its refusal to surrender SSgt Short would violate the SOFA, its consideration of this duty in the context of extradition seemed to accord it far less weight.

108. See Advocaat-Generaal's Brief, supra section III, note 90, at 1380.
109. See id. at 1381-82.
110. Id. at 1381-84.
111. Id. at 1391 (quoting European Convention, supra section II, note 9, at art. 1).
112. Id. at 1392.
113. Id.
a. Attacking the Premise. The Advocaat-General's opinion is well-researched and reasoned. Because the High Court did not discuss as fully the bases of its rulings that the ECHR applies to SSgt Short and that this conflict exists, we can only surmise that it accepted his conclusions and rationale. Despite the apparent logic of his position, it has two possible problems. Either of them, if corrected, might allow the ECHR and SOFA to be read consistently.

The Advocaat-Generaal's key premise was that the Netherlands retains a sort of residual criminal jurisdiction even after the state with the primary right has attempted to exercise it. First, this view conflicts with the idea we considered earlier that the SOFA renders a member of the visiting force immune from receiving state jurisdiction unless the sending state waives its primary right.

A second and more fundamental problem is that his premise is too limited. Earlier, we considered that viewing the SOFA only in terms of the immunity it may confer fails to account for the duty to surrender. Although he acknowledges that duty and admits that it is unqualified, he does so only before and after deciding that the ECHR applies to Short. He does not consider it as he determines whether SSgt Short is within the Netherlands' "actual authority and responsibility." Had he considered in this context both Dutch criminal jurisdiction over Short and its duty to surrender him, he might have found that the ECHR does not apply.

The Advocaat-Generaal cites Serge Lazareff's book, The Status of Military Forces Under Current International Law to support his proposition that the Netherlands enjoys some residual jurisdiction over SSgt Short. Lazareff does contend that in its exercise of unlimited territorial sovereignty, a receiving state enjoys "a general right of jurisdiction over members of a [visiting] force, on the assumption that a sovereign state could not accept not to punish an offence committed on its territory, lest it be a violation of its sovereignty." However, the fact that the SOFA limits such "general" receiving state rights suggests that it somehow also limits its territorial sovereignty.

Our examination of exclusive receiving state jurisdiction, "law of the flag", and immunity supports a view that allocation of authority between sending and receiving states is a zero-sum task. In other words, to the extent that one sovereign allows another to exercise jurisdiction within its borders, no matter how narrow, its territorial sovereignty, exercise, or both are equally restricted. We have already seen that this notion of "restrictive sovereignty" is not revolutionary. Indeed, the fact that otherwise "exclusive and absolute" territorial sovereignty may be self-limited is the rationale Chief Justice Marshall gave for his inability to attach a foreign warship in The Schooner Exchange. Also, the principle that receiving state courts have no supervisory jurisdiction over sending state courts-martial is based, at least in part, on the idea that they are authorized acts of visiting sovereigns. Finally, this phenomenon is apparent in the context of the NATO SOFA's Article VII: to the extent that an accused is subject to the criminal jurisdiction of the sending state, he is immune from prosecution from the receiving state, and vice versa.

Against this background, it is reasonable to argue that a state which signs a treaty with an unconditional duty to surrender places yet another restriction on its sovereignty. Under the zero-sum analogy, adding the duty to surrender to the constraints already imposed by the sending state's primary right should limit even further the receiving state's otherwise-plenary territorial jurisdiction. Together, they carve out an area over which the receiving state's discretion and authority no longer extend. The Dutch appeals courts, by holding that the Netherlands' lack of criminal jurisdiction also deprived it of jurisdiction under the ECHR, recognized that this case fell within that area.

b. Contrary International Decisions. Decisions of several international tribunals, including the European Commission of Human Rights, support this view. Despite the Advocaat-Generaal's conclusion that the Commission has expanded the scope of ECHR protection, these cases demonstrate that the convention does not apply to situations in which its parties have no independent authority or discretion.

117. "In game theory, designation or of a situation, competition, etc. in which a gain for one must result in a loss for another or others." Webster's New World Dictionary 1653 (2d College ed. 1974).

118. See generally id; Stanger, supra section III, note 69, at 91. Conceivably, two states could exercise jurisdiction simultaneously or consecutively with respect to an individual offender. However, the NATO SOFA has rendered that extremely difficult. See NATO SOFA, supra section II, note 4, at art. VII, para 8. This provision prevents an accused, who has been tried and acquitted or convicted in the courts of either State, from suffering prosecution again at the hands of the other. This makes the zero-sum analogy even stronger.

119. See supra section III, notes 3-9 and accompanying text.

120. See supra section III, notes 111-12 and accompanying text.
In a 1975 case, Hess v. United Kingdom, the Commission considered whether it could order the United Kingdom to release Nazi war criminal Rudolf Hess from Spandau Allied Prison in Berlin. After World War II, the four allied powers -- the United States, United Kingdom, France, and the Soviet Union -- agreed to administer the prison on a rotating basis and to require unanimous agreement before effecting any changes. Although three of the four parties agreed that Hess should be released, the Soviet Union's veto continued his imprisonment. This arrangement, the Commission decided, gave the United Kingdom the right to participate in the prison's joint administration. However, even during the United Kingdom's annual three-month supervision of the prison, the four-power agreement constrained its discretion and prevented it from unilaterally releasing Hess. Because it was bound by this agreement, the Commission rejected the application as a matter not "within the jurisdiction of the United Kingdom within the meaning of Article 1 of the Convention."122

The European Commission dealt similarly with another case involving the question whether the Federal Republic of Germany was responsible for the decisions of the Supreme Restitution Court, an international tribunal established in West Germany after World War II to adjudicate war claims.123 Although Germany was a member of the tribunal, the Commission held that the ECHR did not apply because that country's discretion in matters before that court was limited by its agreement with its other members. As support for its decision, the Commission pointed to the Salem Case in the United States-Egyptian Mixed Arbitral Tribunal of 1932.124 Faced with a similar issue, that tribunal held that Egypt was not responsible for the decisions of the Mixed Courts established by agreements between Egypt and foreign nations to hear cases involving foreigners:

The Arbitral Court has already pointed out that this jurisdiction was instituted and is continued not only through the will of the Sovereign Egyptian State, but by conventions concluded with the capitulatory powers. Both Parties, by executing these Conventions . . . made a sacrifice of their sovereignty; the capitulatory powers resigned a part of their jurisdictional prerogatives on Egyptian territory by waiving for a time the civil jurisdiction of their consuls; the

122. Id. at 47.
Egyptian Government resigned likewise a part of their jurisdictional sovereignty by undertaking to let themselves be judged in civil cases.

The responsibility of a state can only go as far as its sovereignty; in the same measure as the latter is restricted, that is to say as the state cannot act in a free and independent manner, the liability of the state must also be restricted. 1

The Hess case addresses one more important conflict of treaties concern. The Commission recognized that an issue justiciable under the ECHR might arise if, after entering the ECHR, a member state also became party to an international agreement that limited its discretion in a manner inconsistent with its prior obligations. In other words, it considered that the ECHR might prevail over a later conflicting treaty. It agreed, however, that the four-power prison agreement was concluded well before the ECHR and understood that, despite the conflict, "unilateral withdrawal from [the prison] agreement [would not be] valid under international law." 2

Thus, the Commission did not demand that the conflict be resolved in favor of the ECHR. Note here that the Netherlands ratified the NATO SOFA on 18 November 1953 and the ECHR on 31 August 1954.

Since the Advocaat-Generaal and the High Court relied heavily on the Soering case, the question remains whether it has changed this restrictive sovereignty principle. It has not. The European Court in Soering was just as conscious of the United Kingdom's conflicting treaty obligations as was the European Commission in the two cases above. We have already seen that states have far more discretion not to surrender an accused under an extradition treaty than under the NATO SOFA. 3

Recognizing the extent of that discretion, the European Court stressed in its opinion that the United States-United Kingdom extradition treaty allowed the British government not to surrender Soering unless it received adequate assurances that he would not face capital punishment. 4

Although denying the United States' request would frustrate the objectives of extradition and allow Soering's 125. Id. at 198, v. The Federal Republic of Germany, supra section III, note 123, at 296. These opinions are clear. Where international agreements place situations outside a particular state's discretion, international tribunals, including the European Commission, have consistently considered them also outside its authority. When that state's later actions are consistent with those agreements but inconsistent with the ECHR, the Commission has decided that the ECHR does not apply.

126. Hess v. United Kingdom, supra section III, note 121, at 74.

127. 199 F.3d. at 59 n. 1.

128. See supra section III, notes 102-08, and accompanying text.

129. See Soering, supra section III, note 39, at 1077-78, 1100. "The decision by a Contracting State to extradite a fugitive may give rise to an issue under Article 3." Id. at 1160 (emphasis added).
considerable crimes to go unpunished,\textsuperscript{130} the United Kingdom could avoid that, too, by surrendering him to West Germany. The European Court thus held that the United Kingdom, faced with all these options under its extradition treaties, must select one consistent with its ECHR obligations.\textsuperscript{131}

Soering and the cases above teach the same lesson: when a state has the discretion to act in a manner consistent with the ECHR, it must do so. When, as in Soering, a state like the United Kingdom has the right to refuse to extradite someone facing the death penalty, the ECHR requires it to exercise that right. When, as in Hess, the state's discretion is limited by an earlier agreement, the ECHR does not apply because the matter is not within the state's "actual authority and responsibility". The SOFA's allocation of jurisdiction and duty to surrender clearly put Short into this latter category. It is a category in which both the SOFA and ECHR can still peacefully coexist.

Because the SOFA limits the Netherlands' discretion not to surrender SSgt Short, ample precedent supports construing the ECHR as not applicable to his case. After Hess and \textit{X v. Federal Republic of Germany}, that is one way the two treaties can be read consistently. It is also one reason why the SOFA's renegotiation should not be considered inevitable. Are there any others?

Putting the restrictive sovereignty argument aside, it appears that everyone who has assumed that the SOFA and ECHR both apply and conflict has also concluded that international law offers no solution. In particular, the Advocaat-Generaal, the Dutch High Court, and the Society inquired to varying degrees whether the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties\textsuperscript{132} offers an answer. All agreed that it did not.\textsuperscript{133} In the Hess case, we discovered one pre-Vienna Convention suggestion that a state should not be held accountable for its actions inconsistent with

\begin{itemize}
  \item \textsuperscript{130} Id. at 1100.
  \item \textsuperscript{131} Id. at 1101. All this boils down to the fact that the ECHR and the U.S.-UK extradition treaty were not really inconsistent at all. This fact was not lost on the Society. It acknowledged that it "must be stressed that in the Soering case there was no obligation to put the individual at the disposal of the U.S. judicial authorities. Moreover the bilateral extradition treaty also provided for the possibility for the extraditing state to request a guarantee that the death penalty would not be carried out. The issue of possibly conflicting treaty obligations was therefore not at stake." Society Background Paper, supra section II, note 3, at 13.
  \item \textsuperscript{133} Of these three inquiries, the most superficial was the High Court's. Its opinion jumped almost directly from discussing the treaty conflict to deciding how it could be resolved under its own public policy and domestic law. Its opinion devoted very little analysis to the question whether the Vienna Convention might \end{itemize}
the ECHR when a prior treaty limits its discretion. Perhaps another look at the Vienna Convention or customary international treaty law will reveal something equally enlightening to support the United States' position.134

a. Pacta Sunt Servanda. In 1969 at Vienna, the United Nations Conference on the Law of Treaties adopted the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties. It took eleven years for the treaty to enter into force and, to this date, it still has not been ratified by the United States. Despite this fact, the President acknowledged in his letter transmitting it to the Senate for ratification that it "is already generally recognized as the authoritative guide to current treaty law and practice."135 Thus, although the United States may not take advantage of the convention's dispute resolution system in situations like this, it does recognize the persuasive and legal authority of its rules.

Perhaps the most widely recognized and accepted principle of international treaty law is the concept of pacta sunt servanda. It is codified at Article 23 of the Vienna Convention and states that "[e]very treaty in force is binding upon the parties to it and must be performed by them in good faith."136 Unfortunately, starting our inquiry here offers no hope of resolving this conflict. The Advocaat-Generaal came to the same conclusion when he confronted this principle at the end of his analysis. Since both the ECHR and SOFA are treaties, pacta sunt servanda does nothing more than remind us that both are "binding" and "must be performed . . . in good faith." Indeed, that is the dilemma.

b. Conflict of Treaties Rules. Greatest hope for a solution lies in the Vienna Convention's conflict of treaties rules. During its preparatory work, the International Law Commission understood that the proliferation of treaties they were witnessing would someday likely result in intentional and unintentional conflicts.137 Among the rules it drafted to deal provide a solution. Its failure to discuss the issue might have been due to the fact that the Advocaat-Generaal directed considerably more effort to that area. In the discussion that follows, we will use his brief as a springboard to our consideration of the international treaty law aspects of this problem.

134. By its terms, the Vienna Convention does not apply to the two treaties here. Article 4 of the Convention states that it "applies only to treaties which are concluded by states after the entry into force of the present Convention with regard to such states." 63 A.J.I.L. at art. 3. Nevertheless, the convention's character as codification of customary international treaty law gives it persuasive and independent legal authority.

136. See supra section III, note 132, at art. 23.

with them was one based on the principle pacta tertiis non nocent: "in the relations between a state that is a party to both conflicting treaties and the a state that is a party only to the earlier treaty, the earlier treaty prevails." 138 In describing its customary law basis, the Commission said that this principle "can hardly be open to doubt, as [it is] the assumed basis of law upon which many revisions of multilateral treaties . . . have taken place." 139 Another draft rule codified the principle lex posterior: "as between a state party to both conflicting treaties and a State party only to the later treaty, the later treaty prevails." 140

When the time came to formally adopt the Vienna Convention, the Commission proposed that both rules be applied only to conflicts arising out of successive treaties relating to the same subject matter. In its final draft to the Law of Treaties Conference, it commented that these principles should be thus limited to avoid any risk that the rule codifying lex posterior might be misinterpreted as allowing "the conclusion of a treaty incompatible with obligations undertaken towards another state under another treaty." 141 In other words, it wanted to avoid the negotiation of later, inconsistent treaties. Clearly, its goal was to maintain the integrity of pacta sunt servanda. Unfortunately, limiting lex posterior in this way also limited pacta tertiis non nocent, a principle already in accord with that objective. In their limited form, both are now part of Article 30 of the Vienna Convention. 142

The Advocaat-Generaal concluded that since the ECHR and SOFA do not relate to the same subject matter, Article 30's codification of pacta tertiis non nocent does not apply. However, he ended his discussion there. He did not inquire whether the underlying principle might apply independently of the Vienna Convention. If he had, he might have determined that it should.

Clearly, the watered-down Article 30 does not apply to this situation. However, pacta tertiis non nocent should. The Vienna Convention does not address every possible treaty issue that might arise. The lacunae must, therefore, be filled by customary international law. The Commission recognized the strong basis of pacta tertiis non nocent in customary international law. We have

----------------------
138. Id. at 46.
139. Id.
140. Id. An almost identical provision is codified at Article 30 of the Vienna Convention.
142. Article 30, paragraph 4(b) states that when "the parties to the later treaty do not include all the parties to the earlier one . . . as between a state party to both treaties and a state party to only one of the treaties, the treaty to which both states are parties governs their mutual rights and obligations." Vienna Convention, supra section III, note 132, at art. 30, para. 4(b).
also seen its application in the Hess case.\textsuperscript{143} After determining that Article 30 did not apply, the Advocaat-Generaal also referred to customary law. His analysis, however, focused only on the concept of lex posterior. After correctly concluding that it also does not apply here, his inquiry ended. It ended too soon.

One aspect of Article 30, paragraph 4(b), is that parties to a later treaty may not deprive earlier treaty partners of their rights without their consent.\textsuperscript{144} That is also the purpose of the customary pacta tertiis non nocent.\textsuperscript{145} The only difference between them is that Article 30 is artificially limited. While Article 30's terms prevent it from resolving this conflict, its underlying principle survives in customary international law. It should be applied here. If applied, it would render the ECHR inapplicable to the extent that it conflicts with the earlier SOFA.\textsuperscript{146}

E. United States Policy

As we saw in section II and will see again in section IV, the crux of the High Court's decision was that Dutch ordre public demanded that it protect SSgt Short from the risk of capital punishment. Just as the Netherlands has its own ordre public based upon its domestic and international human rights obligations, the United States has public policy concerns underlying its objection to the Short decision and its likely reluctance to renegotiate the NATO SOFA. Although the High Court performed a ritualistic "balancing" of its ECHR and NATO SOFA obligations, its approach left little doubt that the former would prevail. The Society's focus is similar. Both appear to be concerned about whether the NATO SOFA is still consistent with the Netherlands' interests. If this were a treaty about to be signed or if the issue was whether the Netherlands ought to remain a party to it, such a one-sided debate might be acceptable. The fact is that this treaty has been in force for almost forty years. Therefore, any discussion of its "reexamination" and possible renegotiation ought to take into account the interests of its other parties. In the context of the Short case, the other relevant party is the United States.

\textsuperscript{143} See supra section III, notes 120-27, and accompanying text. There, the European Commission recognized the conflict between the four-power prison agreement and the ECHR. It deferred to the earlier four-power treaty, but added that it probably would not have done so had the ECHR been concluded first.

\textsuperscript{144} See 1969 Conference, supra section III, note 141, at 36.

\textsuperscript{145} See Draft Convention, 1964, supra section III, note 137, at 40.

\textsuperscript{146} In the lex posterior context, it might be argued that the Netherlands violates its obligations to its ECHR partners by deferring to the SOFA in this way. That certainly is true, but the ILC was careful to add to its codification of both the lex posterior and pacta tertiis non nocent principles that they apply "in the relations between a state that is party to both treaties" and a state that is party only to the later or earlier treaties, respectively. In the Short situation, the relations are between the Netherlands and the United States. Thus, the SOFA -- the earlier treaty to which both are parties -- applies to the exclusion of the ECER. No other state is involved.
Thus far, we have considered all the legal arguments supporting the United States position. Since we will be examining Dutch public policy in section IV, a comparable analysis of United States public policy is an appropriate way to end this section.

1. The NATO SOFA Negotiations: The Original U.S. Concerns

The SOFA's relatively smooth operation today stands in distinct contrast to the controversy it generated during and immediately after its negotiation. Recall that throughout World War II the United States held sacred the fundamental principle that its military forces, wherever deployed, were subject to its exclusive criminal jurisdiction. Given the United States' favored status, none of its allies disputed that claim. However, after the war some of the Western European nations that were to become the members of NATO, faced with the prospect of having foreign troops on their soil for the foreseeable future, insisted that jurisdiction over them be shared.

Just as strongly as NATO's European alliance considered shared jurisdiction necessary to preserve its own public order from the possible excesses of foreign troops, the United States balked at the prospect of losing any measure of control over its forces. While the rest of the treaty drew only passing notice during its Senate ratification hearings, Article VII raised considerable concern. After a long history of maintaining exclusive jurisdiction over its troops -- a history that included its recent victory in the largest war on Earth -- the NATO SOFA would subject its military men and women to the courts of another nation. To some in Congress, that idea was unthinkable.

At the NATO SOFA negotiations, the primary United States concerns were that its military members should not be exposed to \[\text{147. See supra section III, notes 10-13 and accompanying text.}\]

\[\text{148. See Barton, supra section II, note 3, at 200.}\]
\[\text{149. See id. at 205-7.}\]
\[\text{150. See generally Supplementary SOFA Hearings, supra section II, note 5.}\]
\[\text{151. In the ratification hearings, the SOFA's primary opponent appeared to be Senator Bricker. His objection to the treaty focused on its jurisdictional provisions. His opposition was reflected in the reservation he proposed:}\] \[\text{The military authorities of the United States as a sending State shall have exclusive jurisdiction over the members of its force or civilian component and their dependents with respect to all offenses committed within the territory of the receiving state and the United States as a receiving state shall, at the request of a sending state, waive any jurisdiction which it might possess over the members of a force or civilian component of a sending state and their dependents with respect to all offenses committed within the territory of the United States.}\]

\[\text{id. at 3.}\]
the risk of cruel and unusual punishment at the hands of foreign criminal laws and judicial systems and that discipline must be maintained.\textsuperscript{152} Maximizing U.S. jurisdiction over our military members abroad would satisfy both. The interests of our European allies have obviously changed significantly over the past forty years; however, it is fair to say that ours have not. Although we do not worry about cruel and unusual punishment in most of Europe, as the predominant sending state within NATO our concerns about uniform treatment remain essentially the same and the SOFA's formula still meets them. Thus, it is also fair to conclude that the United States would probably be reluctant to renegotiate it.

It is unclear exactly how the NATO SOFA would be changed to accommodate Europe's human rights concerns. Two likely possibilities would be either to specifically prohibit capital punishment in cases arising under the SOFA or to further limit the jurisdiction of sending states whose laws still provide death penalties. For the following reasons, both probably would meet United States opposition.

2. The Death Penalty

Earlier, we saw briefly the irony the Short case represents. It is now the United States' allies who worry that it will subject its citizens to cruel and unusual punishment. A critical question in any debate about changing the NATO SOFA to prevent capital punishment is whether it is something the United States is willing to give up. Although a similar debate over the death penalty rages within the United States, it is clear that most of its criminal justice systems -- including the military's -- still consider it important.

Although there are federal crimes for which death is a possible punishment,\textsuperscript{153} under the U.S. federal-state system most criminal law is defined and enforced by the individual states. The federal government, which would negotiate any NATO SOFA amendments, has become involved in the capital punishment debate primarily through its judicial decisions. In the 1972 case Furman \textit{v. Georgia}, the U.S. Supreme Court went so far as to invalidate Georgia's death penalty statute.\textsuperscript{154} The Court's ruling that this statute was unconstitutional had the added effect of striking down death penalty statutes in all other states then permitting capital punishment.\textsuperscript{155} Although the Furman decision struck a strong blow against the death penalty, the most significant aspect of following events was the haste with which these states corrected their statutes' constitutional

\begin{footnotes}
\footnote{152. See supra section II, notes 3-7.}
\footnote{153. See, e.g., 21 U.S.C. sec. 848 (1988).}
\footnote{154. \textit{Furman v. Georgia}, 408 U.S. 238 (1972).}
\footnote{155. See \textit{Spradling & Murphy, Capital Punishment, the Constitution, and the Uniform Code of Military Justice}, 12 \textit{A.F. L. Rev.} 415 (1980).} \end{footnotes}
defects and thereby reestablished their capital punishment schemes.156

The states that retain capital punishment today do so despite constant challenges and opposition. Their persistence is evidence of the death penalty's perceived value. The military has encountered and overcome similar obstacles. Its capital punishment provisions are contained in the Uniform Code of Military Justice (UCMJ), a federal statute,157 and the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1984, an Executive Order.158 They were revised most recently in 1984 after the U.S. Court of Military Appeals struck down the previous Manual's death penalty provision in United States v. Matthews.159 Although no military member has been executed under the UCMJ since 1961,160 it appears that the armed forces, like the states, want to keep this option available.

3. The Expansion of Military Criminal Jurisdiction

Any suggestion that the NATO SOFA should be changed to limit U.S. jurisdiction over capital crimes would run headlong into the current trend expanding military jurisdiction within the United States. For eighteen years -- between 1969 and 1987 -- military court-martial jurisdiction was limited. Outside of the United States, it was and continues to be constrained by the many SOFAs to which the U.S. is a party. In its 1969 opinion in O'Callahan v. Parker,161 the U.S. Supreme Court held that the Constitution further limited court-martial jurisdiction over military personnel to crimes that are "service connected". Specifically, it ruled that a serviceman's off-base sexual assault on a civilian with no military connection could not be tried by court-martial.162 In 1987, however, the Court reversed O'Callahan in Solorio v. United States.163

The Solorio Court held that the only requirement for court-martial jurisdiction is that the accused must have been "a member of the armed services at the time of the offense charged."164 The basis for the Court's expansion of military jurisdiction was its recognition that Congress is responsible for determining what courts-martial may consider and that Congress had determined that the accused's military status was the only

---

156. See id. at 416.
159. 16 W.J. 354 (C.M.A. 1993).
163. Id.
164. Id. at 451, 97 L.Ed.2d at 378, 107 S.Ct. at 2933.
relevant jurisdictional factor. The Court also recalled that George Washington seems to have shared this view. Since 1987, all military members, wherever located, have been subject to the UCMJ. The only limits now are those imposed by the allocations of jurisdiction in agreements like the NATO SOFA.

One of the objectives of the Uniform Code of Military Justice is to provide uniform criminal standards for U.S. military members everywhere. This goal, however, is achievable only if the UCMJ is enforced against as many military members in as many situations as possible. That, of course, is also an objective of status of forces agreements. The fairness that the relationship between uniformity and maximizing jurisdiction seeks to achieve would be jeopardized by prohibiting capital punishment or curtailing U.S. jurisdiction under the NATO SOFA. Unless the death penalty is abolished entirely under the UCMJ, either of these suggestions might cause a fairness problem of constitutional proportions: all military members except those in Europe would risk death for capital crimes.

---

165. See id. at 440, 97 L.Ed.2d at 371, 107 S.Ct. at 2927; Burns v. Wilson, 346 U.S. 137, 97 L.Ed. 1508, 73 S.Ct. 1245 (1953).

166. In a General Order dated February 24, 1779, President Washington stated that "all improper treatment of an inhabitant by an officer of soldier being destructive of good order and discipline as well as subversive of the rights of society is as much a breach of military, as civil law and as punishable by the one as the other." Id. at 444 n. 10, 97 L.Ed.2d at 374 n. 10, 107 S.Ct. 2930 n. 10 (quoting 14 Writings of George Washington 140-141 (J. Fitzpatrick ed. 1936)).

167. Although all military members within the U.S. are subject to the UCMJ, they may not actually be tried by court-martial for every serious offense. Military authorities still share jurisdiction with local authorities and, depending on the nature of the offense, the case may be tried by either.

IV. The Dutch Position:
The Role of Human Rights in International Law

Having just examined the arguments the United States has or could have made against the Short decision, we turn our attention now to the Dutch concerns that support it. As I observed in section I, the United States position is based in large part on well-accepted principles of black-letter international law. In contrast, we shall see here that the Dutch view is a bit more controversial. It is controversial because it is based on the emerging jurisprudence of human rights -- a body of international law in its infancy when the NATO SOFA entered into force.

Much of section III focused on how -- procedurally and substantively -- the Netherlands violated the NATO SOFA. It also argued that a narrower reading of the ECHR was not only in order, but that it would have avoided the violation of either treaty. Given the strong basis of those propositions in international law, two of the few remaining arguments supporting the Dutch position are either that the norms embodied in the ECHR are superior to the SOFA's or that the latter treaty is no longer binding in cases like Short. Together, they form the basis of the Society's proposal that the SOFA be revised.

This chapter explores both of these arguments. It begins by briefly introducing the European human rights system as established under the ECHR. It, of course, is the foundation of the Dutch position. Next, we will consider the status of that system and its enumerated rights in international law. In that context, there are three relevant questions: Has opposition to capital punishment reached the level of jus cogens? If not, can it be considered as a higher norm in some sort of hierarchy of international norms? Third, what is its role and effect as a principle of Dutch public policy? Unfortunately, the Dutch High Court's decision provided little analysis. Therefore, the answers to these questions are derived from arguments that were made to the Court, the Society's propositions, and my attempts to fill in the gaps. Finally, we shall examine the treaty law principle of "changed circumstances" to determine whether this evolving human rights law justifies the High Court's avoidance of the NATO SOFA.

A. Human Rights Generally: A Background

After Short, it is clear that the Netherlands considers visiting forces members subject to the ECHR. Also, the Society contends that during the 37 years both the NATO SOFA and the ECHR have been in force, they have evolved in opposite directions. To resolve this resulting conflict, it concludes that the SOFA must be reconsidered. This argument reflects the increasing role of human rights law in Europe. To better understand the Dutch perspective, it is necessary to understand its European human rights context.

1. The Human Rights Movement

The appearance of human rights in international law occurred primarily as a result of the "atrocities committed against humanity by the fascist powers during the Second World War." Before and during that war, various groups and individuals shocked by those heinous acts began the process that ultimately resulted in the adoption of the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR). Having opened the floodgates, this declaration ultimately led to the many treaties now governing human rights.

To supplement the individual human rights treaties that have been negotiated under the auspices of the United Nations, some states have united on a regional basis to improve the conditions of their people. In addition to the European regional system that we shall examine in a moment, the Americas and Africa have also established frameworks in which human rights have been established and enforced.

The speed and vigor with which the international community has pursued the establishment of international human rights law has even led some to question whether it is progressing too fast. Whereas most of the rights that have been proclaimed by the United Nations or by human rights treaties have evolved from man's pursuit of liberty, the world is now approaching the point where its thirst for new rights is almost insatiable. This, together with the reality that many states parties to many of these human rights treaties have abysmal human rights records, has strained the system's credibility. Perhaps these are reasons why the United States has been reluctant to ratify many of the human rights treaties that have been negotiated.

Despite the United States' "unilateral stance on the subject of human rights," it is sensitive to its own record and the compliance records of other nations. This is nowhere more evident than in its foreign policy. Overall, it is fair to say that the United States and the Netherlands feel equally

2. Id.
7. See id.
strong about the importance of human rights. Their only differences, perhaps, lie in their definitions of what those fundamental rights are and in how they manifest their concern.

2. The European Human Rights System

Dutch human rights law and policy is based primarily on the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR).8 That treaty, which the Netherlands signed on 4 November 1950 and ratified on 31 August 1954,9 is one of the cornerstones of the European Community. It is also widely considered to be the world's most effective regional human rights enforcement system.10 Although its success has been attributed mainly to the homogeneity of its Western European parties,11 their common World War II experiences no doubt also contributed greatly to their resolve.

The ECHR is divided into two primary parts. First, it lists the rights and freedoms its contracting parties must secure for "everyone within their jurisdiction".12 The quoted language is extremely important because it defines the scope of the ECHR's protection. In section III, we saw how the Dutch High Court's broad construction of that text brought SSgt Short within its ambit.13 Second, it establishes a structure within which those rights and freedoms may be enforced.14 While the ECHR's enumerated rights and freedoms are similar to those found in other major human rights documents, its enforcement system distinguishes the European model from all others.

The ECHR established two organs and incorporated a third to form the nucleus of its enforcement mechanism. The European Commission of Human Rights, the European Court of Human Rights, and the pre-existing Committee of Ministers -- the governing body of the Council of Europe -- work independently but in concert to consider and act upon state and individual complaints of human rights violations. The Commission is the first body to receive them. If it regards a state or individual petition "admissible", it investigates the underlying allegations and establishes its findings in its report to the Committee of Ministers. Judging the admissibility of a complaint is an important aspect of this process because it is the threshold that separates frivolous from substantial petitions. Although there are several requirements complaints must satisfy, the two most important are, first, that the state or individual complainant must have exhausted all

8. See supra section II, note 9.
9. See id. at 222 n. 1.
11. See id.
12. European Convention, supra section II, note 9, at arts. 1, 2-17.
13. See, supra section III, notes 110-13, and accompanying text.
14. European Convention, supra section II, note 9, at arts. 19-56.
domestic remedies and, second, that the individual complainant must claim to be a victim of a human rights violation committed by one of the ECHR's parties. The Dutch High Court in Short no doubt considered that SSgt Short might satisfy both criteria if it decided to surrender him to U.S. authorities.

If, after the Commission's investigation, the parties are unable to settle their dispute informally, the Commission submits its final report to the Committee of Ministers. The ECHR then provides the Commission and any interested state party a three-month period during which they may refer the matter to the European Court of Human Rights. If the matter is referred to the Court, it decides whether the ECHR was violated; otherwise, the Council of Ministers renders final judgment.

3. Capital Punishment and the ECHR

Ironically, when the ECHR entered into force on 3 September 1953, it did not prohibit capital punishment. In fact, listed first among the document's protected human rights is a "right to life" provision that specifically allows the death penalty: "Everyone's right to life shall be protected by law. No one shall be deprived of his life intentionally save in the execution of a sentence of a court following his conviction of a crime for which this penalty is provided by law." Since the NATO SOFA entered into force less than two weeks earlier -- 23 August 1953 -- this was the view of capital punishment presumably shared by much of Western Europe during its negotiation.

During the SOFA negotiations, it was already apparent that sending state courts-martial might sentence offenders to death for certain offenses. Although neither international nor European law prohibited capital punishment, some European receiving states had either formally abolished it or discontinued the practice of execution in peace, war, or both. Thus, hope was expressed that sending states would not carry out death sentences

15. Id. at art. 26.
16. Id. at art. 25.
17. Indeed, the Dutch Advocaat-Generaal concluded that the Netherlands would commit a "tort" against SSgt Short if it turned him over to the United States. See Advocaat-Generaal's Brief, supra section III, note 90, at 1387.
18. European Convention, supra section II, note 9, at art. 31.
19. Id. at art. 31.
20. See id. at 222 n. 1.
21. Id. at art. 2 (emphasis added).

49
In deference to these states, the final treaty contained Article VII, paragraph 7(a):

7. (a) A death sentence shall not be carried out in the receiving State by the authorities of the sending State if the legislation of the receiving State does not provide for such punishment in a similar case.\(^4\)

Under this compromise, the NATO allies understood that when the sending State has jurisdiction to prosecute, it has the right to impose any sentence its laws deem appropriate. Until Short, no objection to the imposition of a death sentence had ever been sustained; the SOFA limits only its execution within a receiving State whose laws do not allow "such punishment in a similar case."

Although the ECHR originally allowed capital punishment, the 1983 Sixth Protocol calls for its abolition. It states simply that "the death penalty shall be abolished. No one shall be condemned to such penalty or executed."\(^5\) To date, many European NATO nations, including the Netherlands, have signed or ratified it. Does this development support the Society's argument that Western Europe's view of human rights has changed sufficiently to warrant corresponding changes in the SOFA? Should the SOFA no longer require receiving states to surrender members of visiting forces who risk execution under sending state law? These are the questions we will now consider.

B. Is the Right Not to Face the Death Penalty Normatively Superior to the SOFA's Duty to Surrender?

1. Normative Superiority as a Matter of International Law

The first of the Society's two principal arguments favoring reevaluation of the NATO SOFA is that the "influence of international agreements with relation to human rights within the legal system of states [has] increase[d] steadily."\(^6\) Not only has its influence increased, but many argue that the stature of international human rights law has also grown. One particular

---

23. See e.g., Status of Forces Agreement -- Norwegian Note on the Death Penalty under Article VI of the Draft, MS-5(S1) 10, (Feb 16, 1951), reprinted in NATO Travaux Preparatoires, supra section II, note 5, at 383.

24. NATO SOFA, supra section II, note 4, at art. VII, para. 7(a).

25. See European Convention, supra section II, note 9, Sixth Protocol at art. 1.

view that has recently become prominent, albeit controversial, is that some international human rights norms are actually superior to other international laws.27

The basic idea that international law ranks some norms ahead of others is not a new one. Its most widely-accepted form is the familiar principle of jus cogens. Codified at Article 53 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties, it contemplates that treaties at variance with certain universal "peremptory norms" are automatically void.28 Such norms are "rules from which states are not competent to derogate at all by a treaty arrangement, and which may be changed only by another rule of the same character."29 In other words, they take precedence over all other international laws.

Professor Weil of the University of Paris argues that jus cogens is gradually leading to the further "graduated normativity" of international law.30 Historically, international norms created either by treaty or custom were equally binding. "There was no distinction . . . to be made between one legal norm and another."31 However, the principle of jus cogens, "with its distinction between peremptory and merely binding norms",32 has now led to the question whether there is also a hierarchy among non-peremptory norms. Professor Meron suggests that there may be such a hierarchy within international human rights law and describes two possible levels: "fundamental rights" and "ordinary rights".33

The concept of fundamental rights is an international transplant from domestic law. National constitutions commonly describe these rights that government may not abridge. Also common are domestic rights of lesser status. United States law provides good examples of both. On the one hand, the U.S. Constitution gives greatest deference to fundamental rights. Any government interference with them is subject to "strict scrutiny" by the courts.34 On the other hand, the abridgement of rights not regarded as fundamental -- in other words, ordinary rights -- is reviewed under a much less stringent standard.35 Although this same dichotomy may exist in international law, the problem is that it is not nearly so well-defined. Since there is no

27. See Meron, On a Hierarchy of International Human Rights, 80 Am. J. Int'l L. 1 (1986).
28. See Vienna Convention, supra section III, note 132, at art. 53.
31. Id. at 421.
32. Id.
33. Meron, supra section IV, note 27, at 5.
35. Id.
The constitutional or legislative process by which some rights are classified as "fundamental" and others as "ordinary", the distinction is blurred. Meron suggests a couple of ways to distinguish fundamental from ordinary international human rights. One necessary but insufficient attribute of fundamental rights is that they are obligations erga omnes. A second characteristic, closely related to the first, is that they "must be firmly rooted in international law". Meron adds that "mere claims or goals, important as they may be, would not qualify." On the surface, these standards seem rather straightforward. Their problem, he also admits, is that they suffer the same plight as the standards defining peremptory norms: How does the international community determine whether a particular norm satisfies them? Unfortunately, there appears to be no definite answer.

Assuming that rights can be considered peremptory, fundamental, or ordinary, the next challenge is to determine the consequences of such a classification. We have already seen that jus cogens makes peremptory norms superior to all others. Thus, in conflicts between peremptory and other norms, the former will always prevail. Does the same result obtain when fundamental rights conflict with either ordinary rights or other international norms? As regards "other international norms", some authorities say that the answer is yes. In 1983, the Institute of International Law convened at Cambridge to discuss, among other matters, the relationship between human rights and extradition. The conferees' consensus appeared to be that customary international law has evolved to the point where "the duty to protect human rights . . . justifies nonextradition." One conferee narrowed this slightly by defining human rights as "basic rights of the human person" -- in other words, fundamental human rights. All the arguments in section III aside, it appears that there is some support for the proposition that some human rights fall short of "peremptory" status but still supersede other international norms. The crucial question for our purposes is whether SSgt Short's right not to suffer capital punishment supersedes the 37. See Meron, supra section IV, note 27, at 8-9. In other words, they are obligations owed by every state to all other states. See also Restatement, supra section III, note 43, at sec. 702, comment c.

---

38. Id. at 11.
39. Id.
40. Id. at 18.
41. Id. at 22.
42. See supra section IV, notes 28-29, and accompanying text.
44. Id. at 214.
45. Id. at 234 (statement of H. Mosler).
Netherlands' SOFA duty to surrender him. The Dutch answer, of course, is that it does.

2. Jus Cogens and International Ordre Public

If the right not to face capital punishment were a peremptory norm, the Short case would not have triggered such a dispute. That right clearly would have taken precedence over the SOFA duty to surrender and the case would have closed without comment. The fact that that did not happen strongly suggests that the jus cogens principle does not apply here. To determine where the right not to face capital punishment does fit, it is useful to consider why it is not a peremptory norm.

In addition to the idea that peremptory norms supercede all norms of lesser importance, jus cogens sometimes also refers to international ordre public or the principle that there are public policies states may never violate. The international ordre public consists of principles and rules the enforcement of which is of such vital importance to the international community as a whole that any unilateral action or agreement which contravenes these principles can have no legal force. The reason for this follows simply from logic; the law cannot recognise any act either of one member or of several members in concert, as being legally valid if it is directed against the very foundation of law. Although the scholars who have linked jus cogens and ordre public admit that there are some differences, the critical similarity is that both are concerned with principles that form the "foundation of [international] law." Is the right not to face the death penalty such a principle? Most agree that it is not.

The Society itself acknowledges that capital punishment has not achieved that exalted status. The Restatement (Third) goes much farther, stating that not only is capital punishment not considered a violation of a peremptory norm, it has not even been "recognized as a violation of the customary law of human rights." It cites Article 6 of the Covenant on Civil and Political Rights as authority for this conclusion. Article 6 states that capital punishment may "be imposed only for the most serious crimes in accordance with the law in force at the time of 46. See Meron, supra section IV, note 27, at 19; H. Mosler, The International Society as a Legal Community 17-19 [1980].

47. H. Mosler, supra section 77, note 43, at 18.
the commission of the crime. It thus recognizes that many states have not abolished the death penalty. Finally, even the Soering Court agrees. We have already seen that the European Convention allows capital punishment under conditions similar to the Covenant's. The Sixth Protocol abolishing the death penalty has yet to be fully accepted by all European Community members. Both of these factors led the Court to conclude that capital punishment per se does not violate the Convention.

The Restatement suggests two qualifications of peremptory norms: they must be "recognized by the international community of states as a whole" and their peremptory character must be accepted. It appears that neither is satisfied here. The right not to face capital punishment is not a peremptory norm.

3. Capital Punishment and Fundamental Rights

The second and final step in our hierarchy analysis focuses on the question whether capital punishment violates a "fundamental" right. Since we have already seen that it does not violate a peremptory norm, the right not to face the death penalty could not be superior to any other international norms unless it can be considered fundamental. That is why this is the final step.

It is also a very difficult step. One of our underlying assumptions thus far has been that the right not to face capital punishment is an international norm at some level. We just saw that this assumption may be incorrect. The Restatement asserts not only that capital punishment violates no peremptory norms, but also that it is inconsistent with no international laws. Before considering whether this is a fundamental right, we must first determine whether it is even a right.

a. Is the Abolition of Capital Punishment an International Norm? Basic international law state that its two primary sources are treaties and custom. Clearly, the Sixth Protocol establishes the right not to face capital punishment as a matter of treaty law within the European Community. The Soering Court suggests that it may also be rooted in European customary law.

In its amicus curiae brief to that Court, Amnesty International argued that there is a "virtual consensus in Western European legal systems that the death penalty is, under current circumstances, no longer consistent with regional standards of justice." The Court agreed, but held that the European Community's articulation of that premise was embodied in the Sixth Protocol. If a particular state -- like the United Kingdom -- did not ratify that protocol, it would not be bound by that customary law. Perplexing though this holding may be, it appears at least to affirm that the abolition of capital punishment is a European norm -- an example of a "special" or regional custom binding at least among the states party to the Sixth Protocol. Among these states, then, the right not to face capital punishment is a right arguably guaranteed by both treaty and custom. However, this merely raises another preliminary question: What is the role of regional norms in international law?

The International Court of Justice considered a similar question in the Asylum Case between Colombia and Peru. Colombia sought a judgment compelling Peru to grant safe exit to a Peruvian political opposition leader to whom the Colombian Embassy in Lima had given asylum. One of its arguments was that the practice of diplomatic asylum had become a customary regional norm of international law. The Court ultimately found that the practice had not crossed the customary law threshold. If it had, however, the Court suggested that it would have governed the parties' relationship.

The Court's suggestion was implied in the test it used to determine whether diplomatic asylum was customary law. The test, derived from Article 38 of the Statute of the ICJ, states that the "party which relies on a custom . . . must prove that [it] is established in such a manner that it has become binding on the other party." This is done, in turn, by proving that the rule "is in accordance with a constant and uniform usage" by the other party (practice) and that this practice is the expression of the invoking party's right and the other party's duty (opinio juris). Applying this test to the facts in the Asylum Case, the ICJ found the parties' practice inconsistent and their obligation considered more a matter of political expediency than of duty. Applying the same test to the right not to face capital punishment in Europe, it seems that among the states that have adopted the Sixth Protocol, it is a right based both on treaty and regional customary law.

---

56. Soering, supra section II, note 10, at 1097. Although the European Court did not employ the term "customary" law, its discussion suggested that that was the context in which it was examining this question.
57. Id.
58. For an excellent discussion of the distinctions between "special" and "general" custom in international law, see D'Amato, The Concept of Special Custom in International Law, 69 Am. J. Int'l L. 211 (1965).
59. Asylum (Colombia v. Peru), 1950 I.C.J. 266.
60. Id. at 276.
61. Id.

55
b. Is This Norm "Fundamental"? Recall Professor Meron's two-part test. Two attributes of a "fundamental" right are its erga omnes character and the fact that it is firmly rooted in international law.² Within the European Community, the right is erga omnes as a matter of treaty -- all Community members can enforce it against one another. The strength of its roots presents a more difficult problem. Certainly, many European Community nations feel strongly that capital punishment is wrong. The Netherlands is certainly in that camp. However, the Soering Court suggests that its roots are deeper in the Sixth Protocol than in regional custom. The problem is that no one really knows how firmly these rights must be fixed for them to be considered fundamental. If the right not to face capital punishment does not qualify now, it is only a matter of perhaps a very short time before it will. The Dutch, I think, have a good argument that it is fundamental now.

c. The Effect of This Norm on the United States. Assuming, arguendo, that this right is fundamental in European international jurisprudence, can it then be said that it outranks the SOFA duty to surrender? We have already considered the thesis of the Institute of International Law that fundamental human rights supercede the duty to extradite.³ Is that also true when those rights are defined only in regional customary or treaty law? The Netherlands could argue that it is.⁴

Whether norms are recognized only regionally or generally, their binding effect on states within the region is equally strong. The Soering decision is ample proof of that. The Dutch might say that whether this norm binds the United States is irrelevant because its conduct is not at issue here.⁵ Since SSgt Short was in Dutch custody, only the Netherlands' decision to surrender him is relevant and this norm limits its discretion. It might add that its violation of this norm could subject it to criticism and, possibly, sanctions from its European Community partners. The standard they would apply is this regional norm. The Dutch High Court has already acknowledged that the SOFA also

62. See supra section IV, notes 37-38, and accompanying text.
63. See supra section IV, notes 43-45, and accompanying text. As a matter of hierarchy of international norms, extradition and the SOFA duty to surrender are identical. Although we have already seen some differences between them, neither could reasonably be considered "fundamental" in the sense that we have defined that term.
64. On the one hand, remember that the opposing norm -- the SOFA's duty to surrender -- is also regional in scope. On the other hand, the underlying concept pacta sunt servanda is part of general international law and it is that principle that is arguably at stake here.
65. In the Asylum Case, Colombia sought to apply a regional customary norm to regulate Peru's conduct and the ICJ held that the norm was not sufficiently customary to bind Peru. See supra note and accompanying text. Here, however, the Netherlands is not seeking to enforce a regional rule against the United States. It merely recognizes that the rule applies to itself.
imposes an obligation, but concluded that it is not of equal stature. The fundamental character of SSgt Short's right not to face capital punishment must prevail.

Despite the appeal of this argument, especially from a human rights perspective, it fails to consider that the United States is involved in this matter. Although its conduct is not at issue, the question of another state's authority over one of its nationals is. The treatment of one state's nationals by another has always been a concern of international law. An equally persuasive argument, then, might be that the validity of the Netherlands' acts concerning SSgt Short are subject to the law in force between it and the United States. Customary international law would apply unless a special agreement or custom existed between them. Since regional European norms do not bind the United States and a special treaty relationship -- the NATO SOFA -- does exist, the United States could just as effectively argue that this "special" or regional custom cannot supercede the SOFA.

C. Is the Right Not to Face the Death Penalty Superior to the SOFA's Duty to Surrender as a Matter of Intertemporal Law?

1. The Temporal Element of International Law

In section III, we saw one example of intertemporal law when we examined the relationship between earlier and later treaties. Article 30 of the Vienna Convention on Treaties allows two or more treaty partners to change their mutual obligations by subsequent treaty. Among parties to both treaties, the later one temporally supersedes the earlier one. Whereas norms in a hierarchical relationship are ranked according to their character, in a temporal relationship they are ranked by time. The presumption is that more recent norms supercede older, inconsistent ones.

This intertemporal relationship among treaty norms and among customary norms is relatively well established. Just as newer treaties may modify older ones, modern state practice may change

---

66. Although the Dutch High Court did not use this framework to compare the SOFA's duty to surrender and SSgt Short's right not to face capital punishment, its holding captured the essence of the distinction between them. It said that "in view of the great importance that must be attached to the right not to undergo the death penalty, that balancing [between that right and the SOFA duty to surrender] cannot turn out otherwise than in favor of Short." Short High Court Decision, supra section II, note 14, at 10.

68. See D'Amato, supra section IV, note 58. Professor D'Amato argues that the I.C.J in the Anglo-Norwegian Fisheries case, established this rule. It upheld Norway's unilateral delimitation of its fisheries jurisdiction because it was reasonable "in light of general customary practice," and the UK had no special agreement or custom defining a contrary relationship with it.

69. See Vienna Convention, supra section III, note 132, at art. 30. Note, however, that no individual party or group of parties may conclude a subsequent treaty binding on a state party to the earlier treaty but not the later one.
old customary international laws. Similarly, the Restatement (Third) acknowledges that later custom may supersede earlier inconsistent treaties and vice versa. In this relationship, however, treaties clearly have stronger effects. The Restatement accepts the principle that customary law and law made by international agreement have equal authority as international law. Unless the parties evince a contrary intention, a rule established by agreement supersedes for them a prior inconsistent rule of customary international law. . . . A new rule of customary law will supersede inconsistent obligations created by earlier agreement if the parties so intend and the intention is clearly manifested.

Thus, intent to supersede earlier international law is presumed in a treaty whereas it must be expressed in a new customary rule.

This concept of intertemporal law raises two relevant questions. First, has the ECHR -- specifically its Sixth Protocol -- superseded the NATO SOFA? Second, has the customary human rights law that arguably has evolved from the ECHR modified the SOFA's duty to surrender in capital cases? The first question can be disposed of quickly. Since the United States is not a party to the ECHR or its Sixth Protocol, Article 30 prevents either treaty from affecting its SOFA relationship with the Netherlands. The second question, however, is much more difficult.

2. The Temporal Relationship Between Capital Punishment and the SOFA's Duty to Surrender

Recall that the right not to face capital punishment is arguably a European regional norm that binds all Sixth Protocol parties. It is also a right the Dutch High Court clearly considers "fundamental". Its hierarchical superiority over the SOFA's duty to surrender, the Dutch might contend, makes this latter duty no longer enforceable. A similar temporal argument might also be made.

Although many European nations had already abolished capital punishment before the NATO SOFA entered into force, we have seen that if it crystallized into a customary regional norm at all, it did so only recently. In addition to being later in time, temporal superiority also depends on the "clearly manifested"

71. Id. (emphasis added).
72. See supra section IV, note 25, and accompanying text.
73. See supra section I, note 102, and accompanying text.
74. See supra section II, note 102, and accompanying text.
75. See supra section IV, notes 55-60, and accompanying text.
intention of the parties that the new customary norm supersede the old treaty. This is where the difficulty lies. The United States obviously is not a party to this new customary regional norm. Also, until Short, it is doubtful whether anyone even anticipated much less intended that the Sixth Protocol should supersede the SOFA. Nevertheless, every practice must begin somewhere and the Dutch might argue that the temporal superiority of the right not to face capital punishment is now clearly manifest.

The fact that the United States is not a party to this new customary norm poses greater problems here than it did when we confronted it in subsection B. There, I suggested that it might not matter because the "fundamental" nature of the right not to face capital punishment limited the Netherlands' actions regardless of its relationship with the United States. Assuming here that this right and the duty to surrender are equal in stature, to say that a new regional custom displaces an earlier nonregional treaty would be to undermine the entire pacta sunt servanda principle. Such a precedent would allow any group of nations to avoid its treaty obligations merely by conjuring up a contrary customary rule. It is therefore difficult to comprehend that this temporal argument would carry much weight in international legal circles. It is probably not worth pursuing further.

D. The Relationship Between Domestic and International Law

Just as jus cogens and international ordre public define legal principles deemed vital to the international community as a whole, domestic ordre public or public policy is a set of principles fundamental to the domestic legal order. We have already determined that the right not to face capital punishment has probably not risen to the jus cogens level. Therefore, it is neither a peremptory norm nor an element of the international ordre public. The Society argues, however, that Dutch adherence to the ECHR and other human rights agreements has created a body of domestic law that in the Short case ran counter to its SOFA obligations. It raises the question whether that body of domestic law has become such a part of the Dutch domestic ordre public that its national judges may ignore contrary international laws or obligations.

The relationship between domestic and international law is a reciprocal one. According to the most widely-accepted view,

---

76. See Restatement, supra section III, note 43, at sec. 102, comment j.
77. See supra section IV, notes 46-53, and accompanying text.
78. See Society Background Paper, supra section I, note 3, at 6-7. Ordre Public and public policy are slightly different concepts with slightly different origins. However, the differences are so slight as to be insignificant. Therefore, I will follow the lead of other authors by treating them as equivalent concepts and by using the term "public policy" to refer to both. See Note, The Traditional View of Public Policy and Ordre Public in Private International Law, 11 Ga. J. Int'l & Comp. L. 591 (1981).
international law is part -- in most cases, a superior part -- of the domestic law of each and every nation. As we shall see, that generally is the position shared by the United States and the Netherlands. More controversial, however, is the proposition that domestic law might prevail over contrary international law. That is the basis of the ordre public argument.

This idea that domestic public policy has a role in international law is one we have already briefly examined. Recall our discussion of the "Netherlands Formula." This supplement to the NATO SOFA between the United States and the Netherlands establishes a blanket Dutch waiver of primary jurisdiction under Article VII. The waiver effectively gives the United States primary jurisdiction unless the case is "of particular importance" to the Netherlands. In other words, the United States has primary jurisdiction over most cases unless Dutch public policy concludes otherwise. We also saw it at work in the United States' refusal to waive its primary right in Short. Its principal rationale was that its military policy prevented such a waiver.

That domestic law plays a role in international law and vice versa seem to be two facts of international life. What is of concern to the Dutch position in Short and in its future as a NATO partner is the extent to which it can rely on its public policy to insulate it from future cases like this. We have already looked at United States policy. We shall now explore how Dutch policy drove its decisions.

1. Domestic Public Policy in International Law

Throughout its history, public policy is a concept that has generated considerable controversy. Although traditionally used as a conflict of laws principle allowing courts not to give effect to foreign law repugnant to domestic morality and social order, the Society suggests that it now may also govern the "extent [to] which public international law is applied by national authorities." In either application, the Society has recognized the common concern that "whether a particular foreign rule falls under the ban is a matter of opinion, which can easily become a matter of whim." Because public policy is so subjective and amorphous and because it has been abused by result-oriented courts, many Western judges and scholars have

---

79. See supra section III, note 34, and accompanying text.
80. See supra section II, notes 10-20, and accompanying text.
81. See generally Note, supra section I, note 3, at 592.
82. See id. at 592.
83. Society Background Paper, supra section I, note 3, at 7.
84. Id. at 7 (quoting Carter, Rejection of Foreign Law, 55 Brit. Y.B. Int'l L. 225 (1984)).
85. See Note, supra section I, note 3, at 592.
called for its elimination, restraint, or revision.87

Although the Society recognizes that any use of public policy in public international law must necessarily be very limited, it also suggests that the doctrine is awfully attractive to states otherwise faced with the unpalatable application of distasteful international legal principles. It notes that states are beginning to employ public policy-type arguments more frequently "whenever issues of major concern to their national legal order arise."88 One needs only to look at two bases of the public policy concept to see why the Society considers it relevant and applicable to cases like Short.

"The earliest and most enduring use of public policy is to reject morally repugnant law."89 This observation during a 1981 symposium on conflicts of law at the University of Georgia reflects the most basic reason why public policy as a factor of judicial decisionmaking will never be entirely eliminated. Its author also noted, however, that this basis has become less important in recent years because international law has addressed and corrected the most repugnant domestic laws and practices. Nevertheless, capital punishment remains and the Society and the Dutch High Court no doubt would argue that public policy is a tool whose domestic use must therefore also continue.

Another common purpose of public policy is the prevention of injustice to parties before courts.90 Courts using public policy in this manner seek to avoid unjust results by refusing to apply unjust laws. Obviously, the High Court resolved its dilemma in Short -- to deliver or not to deliver Short to U.S. authorities possibly to face death -- by refusing to enforce the NATO SOFA. As we shall see in a moment, this aspect of public policy played an important role in that decision.

Clearly, most states -- including the Netherlands and the United States -- have concepts of ordre public or public policy. These fundamental, nonderogable principles often influence courts not to give effect to contrary laws. We will consider later whether states ought to invoke public policy against international laws, particularly against their own treaties. The point here is that they apparently do. It remains now to examine how these principles were applied in Short.

2. International Law in Domestic Public Policy: The Netherlands' Ordre Public

We have already seen that human rights play important legal and moral roles in the public order of Europe. Recognizing that 37. See generally id.; Society Background Paper, supra section 1, note 3, at 7.

38. Society Background Paper, supra section 1, note 3, at 8.
40. Id. at 633.
other European nations likely share its concern, of interest here is the extent to which these principles have been incorporated in the public policy and domestic law of the Netherlands.

Most U.S. lawyers are familiar with two prevailing schools of thought regarding the efficacy of international law in domestic law. The "monist" view contends that there is only one system of law "of which international and domestic law are no more than two aspects." Accordingly, international law is superior to domestic law and, when they conflict, the former will prevail. The "dualist" view, however, regards the two kinds of law as distinct and separate. When they conflict, domestic law generally will prevail over international law. Although the dualist state recognizes that its failure to abide by its international obligations may give rise to international responsibility, its constitution typically makes such a result unavoidable. From a public policy standpoint, then, it seems that the dualist state would be far more likely than monist states to invoke domestic law and public policy as bases for avoiding unattractive international laws or obligations. The Netherlands, however, defies that conclusion.

In this scheme, the Netherlands is generally considered to be a monist state. Articles 65 and 66 of its Constitution have been interpreted to require that self-executing international agreements supersede all contrary domestic laws. Its courts agree. Indeed, case law that has developed since the ECHR entered into force has required Dutch courts to examine all Netherlands laws for compatibility with the convention. The result of this systematic review is that most of the ECHR's provisions are now considered to be superior to domestic law.

What about public policy? Arguably, states that place international agreements above their own domestic laws should find it difficult to impeach them with something as amorphous as domestic public policy. It is also arguable that there can be no contrary public policy since any agreement a state enters into is presumed to be in its best policy interests. These, however, are the Society's points. When it ratified the NATO SOFA, the Netherlands considered the treaty consistent with its public policy. That changed with the development of its public policy against capital punishment. If this policy shift had been due solely to a change in domestic attitudes or law, the High Court might have turned SSgt. Short over to U.S. military.

92. Id.
93. Id.
94. See, e.g., Restatement, supra section III, note 41, at sec. 115(1)(b).
96. Id. at 89-90.
authorities. As it was, the fact that Dutch public policy was also based on its adherence to the ECHR gave it overwhelming force.

It is clear that the High Court relied heavily on two levels of public policy in its refusal to comply with the NATO SOFA. First, it identified its duty to conform to international public policy:

In the case at hand, consideration should be given in this balancing to Short's interest, on the one hand, in not suffering any violation of his right, guaranteed by the [ECHR] in connection with the Sixth Protocol, not to be exposed to the death penalty . . . and the State's interest, on the other hand, in fulfilling its obligations toward the U.S. derived from the NATO Status [of Forces] Agreement, as well as the international interests which are involved in a more general way in a proper compliance with the NATO Status [of Forces] Agreement. In view of the great importance that must be attached to the right not to undergo the death penalty, that balancing cannot turn out otherwise than in favor of Short.

In the High Court's view, international public policy mandated that priority be given to SSgt. Short's human rights interests. It articulated its view of domestic public policy by pointing to its extradition treaties. Its government's standard practice is to require requesting state assurances that fugitives to be surrendered will not be subject to capital punishment. But domestic and international public policies, as the Court perceived them, required it to defer to the ECHR.

Recalling Soering and our earlier discussion of Europe's views of human rights, this result is not surprising. I also pointed out above, however, that these views are significant changes from the pre-Sixth Protocol views of capital punishment. It is clear from this evolution and from the fact that the Netherlands and other European nations regard their international obligations as superior to domestic law that it is only a matter

97. The High Court declined to consider whether Article VII of the NATO SOFA "operates directly" (is self-executing) because it considered that factor irrelevant. See Short High Court Decision, supra section II, note 14, at 9. Nevertheless, its recognition that the SOFA is a treaty the Netherlands is bound to follow suggests that it would consider it superior to any conflicting domestic law.

98. The most revealing statement in the entire Short decision was the High Court's focus on the domestic and international policy interests at hand: "What [is] at issue . . . is the question of whether, based on all the circumstances of the case, and balancing the interests involved -- including the national and international interests which are involved with complying with both treaty obligations -- the treaty obligation in question [the NATO SOFA duty to surrender] forms such a weighty obstacle for the State to fulfill its obligation toward the citizen in question [obligations under the ECHR], that fulfillment of its obligation toward that citizen cannot be demanded of it and thus cannot be ordered." Id. at 9-10.

99. Id. at 12.

100. Id.
of time before the Short public policy rationale results in more cases like Short.

E. Arguments in International Treaty Law: The Vienna Convention on Treaties and Customary International Treaty Law

Having considered in section III how international treaty law might resolve this conflict, it now remains to determine how it might regard the Society's proposals. We have seen that there are at least two legitimate alternatives to the High Court's outright rejection of the SOFA -- alternatives with fairly solid foundations in international law. However, both would lead to a result contrary to perceived Dutch domestic and international public policy. The Society has pointed to changed circumstances and public policy as reasons why the SOFA must be reexamined and, ultimately, renegotiated. International treaty law addresses both concepts. We will examine them here.

1. Changed Circumstances

Whereas the principles of pacta tertiis non nocent and lex posterior are rules of treaty conflict resolution, changed circumstances generally apply only in treaty suspension or termination. Article 62 of the Vienna Convention defines the concept and its effects:

1. A fundamental change of circumstances which has occurred with regard to those existing at the time of the conclusion of a treaty, and which was not foreseen by the parties, may not be invoked as a ground for terminating or withdrawing from the treaty unless:

(a) the existence of those circumstances constituted an essential basis of the consent of the parties to be bound by the treaty; and

(b) the effect of the change is radically to transform the extent of obligations still to be performed under the treaty.101

The International Law Commission translated this article into five conditions for treaty termination or suspension:

"(1) the change must be of circumstances existing at the time of the conclusion of the treaty; (2) that change must be a fundamental one; (3) [it] must also be one not foreseen by the parties; (4) the existence of those circumstances must have constituted an essential basis of the consent of the parties to be bound by the treaty; and (5) the effect of the changes must be

101. Vienna Convention, supra section III, note 132, at art. 62.
radically to transform the scope of obligations still to be performed under the treaty." 102

Although the Vienna Convention applies these criteria only to treaty termination or suspension, they are also relevant to treaty renegotiation. On the one hand, if changed circumstances fall short of this standard, they will not justify termination or suspension of a particular treaty. They may, however, form a purely optional basis for its revision. On the other hand, where they are sufficient to terminate or suspend a treaty, the changed circumstances will also compel the parties to renegotiate it if they consider their relationship worth maintaining. Does the NATO SOFA fall into the second category? Have the circumstances changed sufficiently to compel renegotiation?

The United States would argue that they have not. Assuming, arguendo, that the ECHR's Sixth Protocol is a fundamental change of circumstances that satisfies the second criterion above, it is doubtful that any other criteria apply. First, the change must also be "of circumstances existing at the time of the conclusion of the treaty." As we saw earlier, the NATO allies understood during the SOFA negotiations that some European receiving states had abolished the death penalty. 103 Hence, Article VII, paragraph 7(a), provided that death sentences would not be carried out in such states. 104 The Sixth Protocol really goes no farther than that. The only change it imposed was that abolition of capital punishment became an international obligation instead of a purely domestic one. Although that change has now rendered adherence to the SOFA more difficult, the United States might contend that it does not make it impossible.
It is arguable, therefore, that the Sixth Protocol is really not a change at all.

The United States might also argue that the third, fourth, and fifth criteria are similarly inapplicable. They raise the questions whether the Sixth Protocol's abolition of capital punishment in Europe was a foreseeable prospect and whether the absence of such an obligation was an assumption underlying the SOFA parties' consent. Because the SOFA and ECHR were negotiated almost simultaneously, it would be difficult to argue that the former did not contemplate the latter. 105 Also, despite the fact that the Sixth Protocol is relatively new, it is extremely unlikely that the SOFA's parties did not anticipate its development -- they had already taken into account the domestic abolition of the death penalty.

Despite all this, the Dutch might still persuasively argue that circumstances have changed sufficiently to compel the SOFA's renegotiation. Although it may be true that the SOFA parties

103. See supra section IV, notes 21-24, and accompanying text.
104. See supra section IV, note 24, and accompanying text.
105. See supra section IV, notes 21-24, and accompanying text.
considered and accommodated domestic views of capital punishment, the Dutch could contend that they could not have foreseen that the right not to face death would rise to the level of a "fundamental" regional human right or become an element of the Netherlands' public order. In other words, Europe's view of capital punishment has changed. There would be little doubt that if the right not to face capital punishment had become a peremptory norm during the past forty years, it certainly would supersede a contrary treaty. That is the principle codified in Article 64 of the Vienna Convention. 106 Using this analogy, it could be said that the change in the depth with which this right is now felt in Western Europe is a fundamental change -- a change that might warrant the SOFA's suspension.

Besides its controversial basis, the main problem with this argument is that the Dutch themselves probably would not accept it. Neither the Dutch High Court nor its Advocaat-Generaal even remotely considered the possibility that changed circumstances might terminate the Netherlands' participation in the SOFA. Nevertheless, the Society suggests that the fact that the Short case arose at all is sufficient reason to reexamine the SOFA. 107 That, it seems, is the proper conclusion. It is clear that the circumstances surrounding the SOFA have changed to some extent. Though they are probably insufficient to warrant the SOFA's suspension, they can certainly be used as a basis for its voluntary reexamination.

2. Reliance on Domestic Law or Public Policy as a Reason for Treaty Violation

Implied in the principle pacta sunt servanda is one of the Vienna Convention's most basic rules: parties "may not invoke the provisions of its internal law as justification for its failure to perform a treaty." 108 Presumably, this means that a state may not invoke its domestic public policy either. However, as we saw earlier, this is still an area of considerable debate.

Although it acknowledges that international law does not sanction it, the Society suggests that, as a practical matter, "states already invoke defenses like 'public order'" to avoid specific treaty obligations they do not like. 109 In law, it is clear that neither the Vienna Convention nor customary international treaty law allows a state to rely on domestic law or policy to avoid its treaties. Thus, there seems to be no legal justification for the Society's call for SOFA reevaluation. As a matter of fact, however, it is hard to dispute its argument.

106. Vienna Convention, supra section III, note 132, at art. 64.
107. See Society Background Paper, supra section 1, note 3, at 5-6.
108. Vienna Convention, supra section III, note 132, at art. 27.
Whether "legal" or not, we have already seen that public policy is and will continue to be of fundamental importance to individual states.

The United States certainly stands upon firm legal ground when it demands Dutch compliance with the SOFA. However, is it being hypocritical when it refuses to recognize the important roles public policy and domestic law play in its own treaty relations?

The United States has long been regarded by many states as an often-reluctant treaty partner. Although it always takes its international treaty obligations seriously, its status as a dualist state occasionally compels it to violate them. Recall that a dualist state regards international and domestic law as separate regimes. When they conflict, domestic law will prevail. While the United States rarely goes that far, it does maintain that although international agreements are regarded as part of United States law, they can be enforced domestically only if they are self-executing, not contrary to the Constitution, and not inconsistent with any later federal statute. In other words, United States policy as expressed in acts of Congress supersedes inconsistent international agreements. Its international obligations are not thereby relieved, but domestic courts will nevertheless refuse to enforce prior treaties over later inconsistent domestic laws.

The United States might violate its international obligations when they conflict with its Constitution or later domestic statutes, but it understands and expects that it may be held responsible by its treaty partners. No doubt the Dutch High Court realized that as well. Indeed, the credibility of international law would suffer greatly if states that violate their treaties are not held accountable. It is in that context that public policy should not be regarded as a legal excuse for treaty breach. The United States, as part of the international community, has a right to be outraged about the Netherlands' SOFA violation in Short. Given its own background, however, its indignation cannot be righteous.

---

110. See supra section IV note 90, and accompanying text.
111. See Restatement, supra section III, note 43, at sec. 111.
112. See id.
113. See id. at sec. 115.
114. See id.
115. See id.
V. Conclusion

Professor Richard Lillich recently wrote that "[l]ike the proverbial pebble thrown in the pond, Soering will cause ripples for some time to come." Certainly, the same can be said for Short. Indeed, as we have seen, Short is both one of Soering's "ripples" and a pebble in itself. It is very likely that other, like-minded European nations will consider it a precedent upon which they can rely to advance their own human rights concerns.

A. Resolving the Arguments: Is the Short Decision Valid in International Law?

One of this paper's primary objectives was merely to examine both sides of this complex problem. In that regard, one of the questions we considered is whether the Short precedent is valid in international law. Although both the United States and the Netherlands have some good arguments supporting their positions, my conclusion is that it is not.

Both states agree that the Dutch High Court decision resulted in violation of the NATO SOFA. Section III explored the nature and extent of that breach in detail. That conclusion having been reached, the debate in sections III and IV then focused primarily on the question whether this breach was legally justified. Again, in my view it was not.

Although it was not actually advanced in Short, the primary United States argument might be that the ECHR and SOFA really are not inconsistent treaties. The SOFA, as the earlier agreement, limits the scope of the later ECHR's application. Since the Netherlands had no discretion over visiting force members over whom it exercised no criminal jurisdiction, it could not regard them as subject to the ECHR's protection. This concept of restrictive sovereignty has been affirmed by the European Commission on Human Rights in at least two cases. Add to this argument the fact that customary international law prevents states from enforcing later obligations inconsistent with prior treaties and it is clear that only something quite extraordinary could justify this violation.

The Society argues that both the fundamental nature of human rights and the Netherlands' ordre public are extraordinary. Certainly, the Dutch could argue persuasively that the right not to face capital punishment has become a "fundamental" regional norm. As such, the courts of the states within that region may be bound to give it precedence over such "ordinary" norms as exist in the NATO SOFA. This, however, is essentially the same type of approach the United States takes when its courts are constrained to give effect to its Constitution or later legislation when either conflicts with its international obligations. Since the United States is not bound by that regional custom or treaty, all this boils down to an attempt to justify this SOFA violation by reliance on "domestic" law. It has no basis in international law.

1. Lillich, supra section III, note 91, at 128.

B. Goals and Possible Solutions

Despite the conclusion that Short has a very weak basis, if any, in international law, the fact remains that its practical foundation is quite strong. Indeed, the Society admits that "although there is no purely legal justification available, in practice states already invoke defenses like 'fundamental change of circumstances' and 'public order' in a political sense. The development of such a defense in law might take some time."

Even though the United States might stand on solid legal ground, as a practical matter future situations like Short are likely to end in the same way. How can it move beyond this impasse?

A major assumption running throughout this paper is that the United States and the Netherlands considered the entire Short fiasco unacceptable. It is therefore unlikely that either will ever want to face it again. Some sort of change is necessary. To determine what sort of change both states might accept, it is first necessary to identify their goals. We have already considered many of them.

1. The Mutual Goal of Maintaining a Strong Alliance

The one apparent constant in this dilemma is that both the United States and the Netherlands recognize the SOFA's value as a tool that has effectively managed sending and receiving state relations for forty years. The United States particularly understands that, but for the SOFA, it would enjoy no criminal jurisdiction over its troops abroad. The Netherlands probably would admit -- and our other European NATO allies presumably would agree -- that the relationship the SOFA has established has been equally beneficial for them. Therefore, it would be in everyone's best interests to keep that treaty intact. It is in the United States' interest to resist a formal SOFA change because any permanent modification would probably reduce, not increase, its jurisdiction abroad.

To protect this interest of maintaining friendly relations, each side could adopt the extreme measures of giving in fully to the other. In other words, the United States could consent to a SOFA provision abolishing capital punishment or the Netherlands could discontinue its objection to death sentences in these cases. The mutual anxiety and intransigence that surrounded Short indicate that neither alternative is likely. The Society suggests that the SOFA itself provides a potentially acceptable interim solution. Its jurisdiction waiver provision could be invoked by one state to request the other's waiver of its primary right where the prosecution interests of the former are "of particular importance." Unfortunately, this idea's success is just as remote. Recall that the Dutch twice attempted to secure the United States' waiver of its jurisdiction over SSgt. Short. Both requests were denied. As things stand, it appears that the United States will continue to maximize its jurisdiction.

2. Society Background Paper, supra section 1, note 3, at 14.

Assuming that neither side will compromise its policies to accommodate the other's, the question remains whether some sort of external standard could be applied objectively to situations like this. Certainly, the NATO SOFA's jurisdictional formula already provides one such standard. We have already seen, however, that it fails to account for the European aversion to capital punishment. It is precisely in cases like Short that the treaty would still create an impasse. Resort to European public policy would no doubt raise equally strong U.S. objections. The amorphous nature of any standard based on the receiving state's public policy would essentially render any decision totally within its discretion.

2. Accommodating the Unilateral Goals of Human Rights and Military Discipline

If it has done anything, this paper hopefully has made clear the fact that any acceptable solution must accommodate not only the mutual objective of maintaining a strong alliance, but also the unilateral European goal of human rights and United States goal of maintaining military discipline. None of the above options does that. Taking all these factors into account, it seems that the most practical approach for sending and receiving states is merely to continue handling situations like Short on a case-by-case basis.

Not only is this solution practical, it can also be flexible if coupled with the sending and receiving states' willingness to compromise. As we have seen, it is not so much the SOFA's language as each state's own internal policies and concerns that have led to this impasse. These policies and concerns vary among our NATO allies. It is therefore unnecessary to permanently modify the SOFA's allocation of jurisdiction when this easier, less drastic option is available. Continuing the case-by-case approach will allow the United States, when it negotiates jurisdictional matters with nations less devoted to the abolition of capital punishment, to compromise less and to rely fully on the SOFA as it is currently written. When, however, it deals with states like Germany, Italy, and the Netherlands, compromise will probably be necessary.

--------------------
3. Id.
Finally, the success of any solution, especially one based on compromise, will also ultimately depend on the access both the sending and receiving states have to all the facts of a case. Part of the problem in Short was the fact that the Dutch courts refused to allow United States authorities to conduct their own investigation. Ultimately, after the High Court's decision, the U.S. Air Force was permitted to hold a formal hearing, in which SSgt Short was found mentally unsuitable to face capital charges. Much of the two-year delay could have been easily avoided if the Dutch courts had allowed the United States to exercise its treaty rights.

C. How the "Case-by-Case" Solution Should Work

Having advocated compromise, full and fair disclosure, and dealing with situations on a case-by-case basis instead of modifying the SOFA, it still remains to be determined what kind of compromise is appropriate and how all these factors should fit together.

Today, when a case comes to the attention of either the sending or receiving state, the other is typically informed immediately and both set upon the task of determining to whom the SOFA allocates primary jurisdiction. In all but potentially capital cases, this will continue unchanged. When a member of the visiting forces has committed a capital crime under inter se or official duty circumstances, the SOFA vests primary jurisdiction in the sending state. Its first challenge to securing that jurisdiction will be to overcome whatever concerns the receiving state may harbor regarding capital punishment.

After Short, it is unlikely that receiving states like the Netherlands will allow the United States to take custody of a capital offender. However, in the interest of full and fair disclosure, they should allow the sending state to conduct a full inquiry -- even a pretrial hearing -- to determine, first, whether charges should even be brought and, second, what those charges will be. In the Short case, such a first step might have resulted in non-capital charges. Certainly, that would have avoided all these problems.

If, after the investigation, the sending state intends to charge the offender with a capital offense, it should use all the arguments available -- hopefully, some raised in this paper will help -- to secure his custody. Again, this will be easier in some receiving states than in others. In states that refuse to surrender the offender, the sending state is faced with the same choice that faced the United States in Short: to forego capital punishment and prosecute the military member or to allow him to remain in a state which, like the Netherlands, punished a murder with a six year sentence. This is where compromise comes in.

4. See supra section II, note 25.

In my view, the goals of military discipline and justice are advanced only by allowing the sending state to maximize its jurisdiction. Although the SOFA allocates such jurisdiction in only a limited number of cases, the supplementary agreements the U.S. has negotiated with most receiving states allow it to widen that scope considerably. Comparing this dominant concern that it prosecute its own members with the fact that it has not executed a single person since the early 1960s, it is clear that the death penalty itself is not as critical to the U.S. military’s maintenance of discipline as is its ability to punish its own. It is equally clear that if deterrence is a cornerstone of discipline, capital punishment would enhance discipline far less than a six-year sentence would destroy it. All things considered, when faced with a situation like Short, the U.S. compromise ought to be that it will forego capital punishment so that it may punish the offender appropriately.

D. Some Closing Thoughts

Some would say that asking the United States to compromise is tantamount to advocating its retreat in the face of a clear violation of international law. That certainly is not my intent, nor is it what my proposal actually does. Rather than condoning such clear violations of the NATO SOFA, my proposal merely suggests that rather than abrogating or forcing its allies to withdraw from the treaty as a result of cases like Short, the United States ought to accept the reality of the underlying European human rights concerns. Those concerns are only going to become stronger in the future and only a practical solution will prevent opening the door to SOFA modifications in this and possibly other areas. The United States’ dual goals of maintaining a strong NATO alliance and maintaining military discipline are served, not by clinging to a punishment option that has not been used in almost thirty years, but by recognizing the deep roots of the Netherlands’ position and by maximizing its jurisdiction in spite of them. Before giving its assurances that the death penalty either will not be given or will not be executed, the United States certainly should argue its position strenuously. By thus registering its objections, it preserves its view that even the request for such assurances violates the SOFA. However, lest we think that the Netherlands and like-minded receiving states will be persuaded by our arguments, we must always remember Short.

5. This, of course, assumes that the receiving state will even exercise jurisdiction. Recall that although the Netherlands initially prosecuted SSgt Short and sentenced him to six years imprisonment, its court of appeals reversed on the ground that it did not possess primary jurisdiction. See supra section II, notes 21-22, and accompanying text.
The "Cold War" has ended and, hopefully, it will never return. I and many other men and women in uniform attribute our success to the enduring strength of our principles of human rights and democracy. Throughout our history, we have assumed that when those principles change, they should only get better. Whatever our government might officially say about cases like Short, we must recognize that Europe, by abolishing capital punishment, has advanced that one-way ratchet of human rights yet another notch. My proposal merely recognizes that it is unlikely that it will back off of its new position. With that in mind, our only options are to stand firm or compromise. Although it is arguable that by standing firm, the United States is defending principles of international law, only by compromising will we achieve the goals of unity and justice that NATO represents.