MILITARY OBSERVERS

This historical study of the development of military observers within the United States Army focused upon three fundamental questions. First, who were these observers? For this study, an observer was an individual assigned for a specific purpose, and with the approval of the nation to which he was accredited, who analyzed and reported on a country's military activities. After a review of more than 30,000 biographies of West Point graduates from 1802 through 1975, 2,000 were identified as observers. Second, what did these officers observe? This information was extracted from a review of their biographical data. Lastly, what impact, if any, did their reports have? This proved more elusive as a direct cause and effect relationship between observation and implementation usually was not immediately apparent.

Chronologically, the development of military observers can be grouped into five distinct eras. During the first era from 1815 to 1865, military observers focused upon Europe as the source of military professionalism and learning. Several factors are significant. One, they tended to be both soldiers and scholars who accepted foreign institutions at face value. Two, their observation reports dealt with the concrete versus the abstract. And third, their observations institutionalized the concept of learning from foreign observation.

During the second era, from 1865 to 1885, observers traveled abroad seeking answers to many pressing Army problems and returned frustrated when their recommendations were not immediately implemented. As in the previous era, they continued to be the most talented men in the Army, and they continued to view European military forces uncritically. However, they differed, because they actually sought to change U.S. Army's structure and organization, a trend that would be fully developed in the following decades.

During the third era of military observation, from 1885 to 1919, observers concentrated upon the Prussian Army. Their reports were instrumental in the establishment of the War College and the general staff. Of greater significance was the creation of military attaches and their impact on the nature of military observers. Because of the requirement to station observers overseas permanently and the desire for better intelligence gathering, the U.S. Army established the Military Information Division (MID) 1885 and in 1889 placed attaches under its control. As a result, military observers were not solely information gatherers, but also intelligence collectors.

During the fourth period from 1919 to 1941, attaches continued to emphasize intelligence work while observers shifted to their own individual professional development. A number of Army officers were sent to foreign military and civilian schools, and their observations were circulated throughout the officer corps. These instigated changes in the curriculum of the Army War College and the Command and General Staff College. An increasing number of Army officers were sent overseas to advise and assist other countries in developing their own military forces and institutions. This assistance role also led to using military observers and attaches in diplomatic roles to verify compliance with treaties, elections, and conferences.

During the final period from 1941 through the present day, military observation as part of assistance and advise missions grew with missions such as the Korean Military Assistance Group (KMAG), Joint United States Military Aid Missions for Turkey (JUSMMT), and the Military Assistance command Vietnam (MACV). Observers and attaches became further integrated with the establishment of the Foreign Area Specialist Program.

Over the period of time, five different categories of observer missions emerged, each with a distinctive focus and expected result. First, were the branch or functional missions. Very common in the nineteenth century, observers in this category were normally went under the auspices of their branch chief to gather technical information or specific data to be employed within the observer's respective branch.

Second were missions in which observers were sent abroad for individual professional development, primarily by attendance at foreign civilian and military schools. These observers stimulated the introduction of new techniques and concepts, both within the officer's branch and throughout the Army.

Third were missions in which observation was not a primary consideration. During the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries officers frequently traveled to and from their posts in the Philippines and China and visited regions not seen by many Americans. Also included in this category were officers sent to assist and advise other nation's military forces, a mission that was predominant by the start of the 1970s. While the purpose of sending officers on such missions was not observation, the nature of their work gave opportunities for examination of foreign armies.

Fourth were missions in which observers viewed a foreign country's Army, its training, its officer education, its organization and its doctrine. Included in this category were the observer observations of the Crimean War, Russo-Japanese War, and General Mallory's observations of the Warsaw Pact in 1986.

The fifth category of observer mission was the grand mission. A grand mission was distinguished from others in the degree to which the observations influenced the Army. There have been only three such missions, the 1815 mission in which Major William McRee and Captain Sylvanus Thayer visited European military schools and institutions, the 1876 tour of Asia and Europe by Lieutenant Colonel Emory Upton, Major George A. Forsyth, and Captain Joseph P. Sanger, and the 1973 visit to Israel by Lieutenant General Orwin C. Talbott. Significantly all grand missions were sent during peacetime at the direction of senior Army leadership and addressed widely recognized problems.

From this study, several conclusions may be drawn. First, observers have always been selected on the basis of individual talent and ability. They were professionally competent and intellectually bright. Second, observations made in peacetime have had the greatest impact on the Army as an institution as opposed to those during wartime. Third, the utility of the observers' reports was directly related to who sent the observer and on what type of mission. Thus, grand, army, or branch observers proved most influential while individual or secondary missions had little direct impact. And lastly, the effectiveness of an observer's recommendations was directly related to an institution for evaluation and implementation. Though the U.S. Army may be entering a new era of military observation, and regardless of where observers are sent, who sends them, or to whom they report, categorizing observers by mission remains valid. The most intriguing aspect of this study, however, is the manner in which observers reflected the changing interests concerns and issues of the Army's senior leadership. In this, the history of military observers proved to be that of the Army's.

The major challenge in this study was the absence of a single source for identifying observers. Without a name, location, and time, analyzing observers is a time consuming and frustrating adventure. The list of observers included is by no means complete, but is intended as a starting point for further research.

(BIOGRAPHICAL DATA)

7 William McRee 1805, Engineer
As a Major, (Brevet Lieutenant Colonel), sent to Europe and France to examine fortifications, military schools and the operations of the Allied Armies then occupying France on the fall of Napoleon with Sylvanus Thayer from 1815 to 1817.

33 Sylvanus Thayer 1808, Engineer
As a Captain, (Brevet Major), sent to Europe and France to examine fortification, military schools and the operations of the Allied Armies then occupying France on the fall of Napoleon with William McRee from 1815 to 1817.

102 James W. Ripley 1814, Artillery
As a Brigadier General, on Special duty to Japan and Asia during 1860-61. He was instructed to return by way of the British overland mail route and visit and examine professionally the most important arsenals and military manufactories in Europe. It appears that the Secretary of War, Floyd dispatched him there to get him out of the country because Ripley's honesty was seen as a threat to contractors friendly to the Secretary. Made Brevet Major General on March 13, 1865.

155 Benjamin L.E. Bonneville Artillery/Infantry
As a Captain, in 1825 on a leave of absence, accompanied as the Secretary of General Lafayette on his return to Europe. On arriving at La Grange, in France, Bonneville became the guest of his father's old friend till the following year when he returned to the United States.

180 Richard Delafield 1818, Engineer
As a Major, a member of a Military Commission to the Crimea War from 1854 to 1856. His observations, entitled "Report on the Art of War in Europe, in 1854, 1855, and 1856," was published by order of Congress in 1960. He was Superintendent of the U.S. Military Academy from September 8, 1856 to March 1, 1861. Brevet Major General on March 13, 1863. During the Crimean War, in 1855-56, acting under the orders of the Secretary of War, Major Delafield, with Major Mordecai and Captain (subsequently Major General) George B. McClellan, as a Commission, proceeded to the theater of War in Europe to obtain information in regard to the military service in general, and the changes which had been made in warfare.

- 207 Henry Brewerton 1819, Engineer middle of January, 1828. Tyler was admitted into the French Artillery School of Practice, at Metz, where concluded "we had everything to learn in Artillery without any means of learning."

 He believed that the new system of French Material, recently adopted from the English, would entirely supersede the French Guibeauval. Accordingly, Tyler copied the new system at his own expense and presented his recommendation that it be adopted by the United States. While in Europe, Tyler also examined the Cavalry camp at Luneville; the Pontonnier School at Strasburg; the Armory of Klingenthal; the establishments and maneuvers of the French Army at Paris, and the Artillery School at Woolwich, England.
