ABSTRACT (Maximum 200 words) Designed as a research tool to aid in the understanding of Sino-Soviet rivalry in the Pacific region, these chronologies reflect the tenor of Chinese and Soviet interaction with countries in the Asian area. Early volumes cover these interactions with Japan, the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, the Democratic Republic of Korea, and the Republic of Vietnam, in the political, military, economic, scientific, or cultural fields. To reflect more accurately the nature of the Chinese and Soviet interactions, the country coverage was expanded in later issues to include Laos, the country coverage was expanded in later issues to include Laos, Kampuchea, Burma, India, Bangladesh, Pakistan, and the ASEAN nations (Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, and Thailand). Trends observed in the exchanges among the nations are summarized beginning with the January - June 1979 volume. Starting with the July - December 1982 issue, documentary appendixes have been added. Beginning with the January - June 1982 volume, matrices of Asian countries' interactions with China and the USSR were added. Sources are provided for each entry in all issues.

Dear Reader:

This product was prepared by the staff of the Federal Research Division of the Library of Congress under an interagency agreement with the sponsoring United States Government agency.

The Federal Research Division is the Library of Congress's primary fee-for-service research unit. At the request of Executive and Judicial branch agencies of the United States Government and on a cost-recovery basis, the Division prepares studies and reports, chronologies, bibliographies, foreign-language abstracts, databases, and other tailored products in hard-copy and electronic media. The subjects researched include the broad spectrum of social sciences, physical sciences, and the humanities.

PREFACE

This chronology supplements four previous publications the latest of which is Sino-Soviet Competition in Asia: A Chronology, January-June 1980 (DDB-2200-92-81), published in January 1981. This volume is intended as a research tool to aid in the understanding of Sino-Soviet rivalry in the Pacific and Indian Ocean regions. In order to reflect more accurately the tenor of Chinese and Soviet interaction, the number of countries surveyed has been expanded beyond the four nations considered earlier (Japan, the Socialist Republic of Vietnam, the Democratic Republic of Korea, and the Republic of Korea). The chronology now includes Laos, Kampuchea, Burma, India, Bangladesh, Pakistan, and the ASEAN nations (Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, and Thailand).

All information is derived from open sources available at the Library of Congress.

SIX-MONTH SUMMARY AND ANALYSIS

I. INTRODUCTION

As an area where the dynamics of Sino-Soviet competition are exceedingly volatile and in danger of igniting open conflict, Asia is assuming increasing importance for both China and the Soviet Union. In the space of a decade, the Asian Continent has experienced the era of the Vietnam War, the post-war period, and more recently, the beginnings of what may be viewed as the post "post-Vietnam War" period. Political, economic, and military configurations of the region have changed enormously since the war and the years immediately following. A new set of issues and crisis points has since evolved that relates either directly or indirectly to the Sino-Soviet contest, seemingly more critically than before. It is the purpose of the following analysis and summary to isolate these various factors and review how they changed or developed from July through December 1980.

a. Soviet Perceptions

Soviet motives in Asia appear to be twofold: neutralization of China as a threat to Soviet borders and eventual control of South and Southeast Asian waters, particularly the Straits of Malacca through which flow the various raw materials vital to Japan's industrial economy. Control of this area would deny not only Japan but other Western economies as well, easy access to the raw materials, markets, and investment opportunities to be found in Asia. By reason of its underdevelopment, Asia represents a vast area in which Western capitalism theoretically could flourish. The Soviet plan to remove it from capitalism's reach would almost certainly inhibit Western economic growth. Not surprisingly, the Soviets continue to rely on the belief that the West still regards Asia as remote and therefore not crucial. Soviet advances into Asia, they believe, would be less likely to erupt into war with the West than a Soviet thrust into Western Europe.

b. Chinese Perceptions

For China, Asia traditionally has been valued for its protective role as a series of distinct buffer nations each acting to guard China's borders against attack from outside forces. For two decades, China's strategy in Southeast Asia was to promote fragmentation to preserve its domination of the region. It was a strategy that was followed even during the Vietnam War when Chinese support for North Vietnam was carefully calculated to prevent defeat but not bring victory. The Soviet Union's growing domination of Vietnam and burgeoning interest in the remainder of Southeast Asia, however, spurred China to view the region differently. Fragmentation, as a policy, was replaced by an interest in unifying the nations of Southeast Asia (particularly ASEAN member nations) into a common front opposing both the Soviet Union and Vietnam. To cultivate relations with the ASEAN nations, China had to demonstrate its willingness to drop support for Communist insurgent groups operating within the borders of ASEAN countries. Its intense opposition to the Vietnamese and Soviets appears to be responsible for its having acceded to this long-time ASEAN demand, although some inconsistencies still exist in the implementation of this policy. It remains for China to find yet other ways to dispel old fears that it seeks, above all, to dominate the region.

2. NORTH ASIA

a. Japan-USSR

Tensions which arose between Moscow and Tokyo following the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan did not ease appreciably during the final 6 months of 1980. The Japanese Government did decide to lift gradually its economic sanctions against the Soviet Union, much as the United States and Western Europe were beginning to lift theirs, and major Japanese companies, who were reported in November to have lost $4 or $5 billion as a result of the sanctions, resumed trade negotiations with the Soviets. The Japanese additionally eased their policy of restricting people-to-people contacts with the Soviet Union by first granting an entry visa in July to the Soviet Foreign Ministry's second Far East Department Chief Nikolay Solovyev. His visit was followed in September by that of Soviet Deputy Foreign Trade Minister Vladimir Sushkov and in November by that of a Soviet trade delegation headed by Deputy Foreign Trade Minister V. M. Ivanov.

In August, the Soviet Union asked Japan to undertake approximately one-third of a $10 billion natural gas pipeline project linking western Siberia and West Germany. Contract talks in December, however, encountered strong competition for the Soviet orders from West German and other European firms, threatening a substantial decline in the anticipated final number of Soviet orders to Japan.

Japan's big five steelmakers accepted in principle a Soviet request that 1 million metric tons of plates for pipes be supplied yearly for 5 years starting in 1981, marking the first time Japanese steelmakers guaranteed a long-term supply volume to the USSR. A subsequent agreement stipulated that Japan would supply 150,000 tons by March 1981.

The two countries also signed protocols calling for the Japan Export-Import Bank to advance $35.2 million in loans for coal mine development in southern Yakutsk and $800 million for a Siberian forestry resource development project.

The area of tension between the two countries was concentrated, however, not in economic relations but in issues related to Japan's defense against a perceived Soviet military threat. The publication of two Japanese Government papers--one on security and the other on diplomacy--appeared to be directed at creating public support for Japan in strengthening its military position in the Western community. One stressed Japan's vulnerability to an unnamed enemy; the other called on Japan to be prepared to meet the sacrifices required of a leading member of the Western community. The distinctly anti-Soviet tone of the papers was apparently shared by a large proportion of the population whose support for a military buildup was also continuing to grow.

Prime Minister Suzuki integrated the defense buildup issue into a concept called "comprehensive national security," a scheme stressing Japan's difficult position as a resource-poor but industrially successful nation caught between two quarreling Communist neighbors. The plan called for "self-reliance" in defense and required Japan's Self-Defense Force to be modernized "in the spirit of defending the country ourselves," a theme that was echoed in an impassioned debate on the definition of "patriotism" between the Ministry of Education and various leftwing teachers, unions, and political organizations. The ministry's position was that the time had come to nurture "the will to defend our country" in the classroom, a practice that the opposition argued was dangerously similar to the style of pre-World War II militarism.

Within the ruling Liberal Democratic Party, a move to revise article 9 of the Constitution was revived and argument renewed over whether the possession of nuclear weapons was constitutionally permissible. The Government's view held that it was, within the context of defense of the nation.

Soviet intransigence regarding the Northern Territories issue and overall arrogance in dealing with Japan, continued to incur Japanese enmity. Japan's decision to arm its Self-Defense Force fighters with air-to-air missiles, an important initial step in the direction of rearmament, was taken because of continuing Soviet disregard for the sanctity of Japanese airspace. Similarly, an August incident involving the Soviet Navy's towing of a damaged nuclear submarine through Japanese territorial waters, despite Japan's refusal to grant permission for its passage, succeeded in damaging relations further. Although both countries claimed to be open to the possibility of improving relations, each was waiting for the other to initiate the process. A brief reference to Japan in an August speech by Party Chairman Brezhnev, however, might be interpreted as a clue to Soviet interest in better relations, as it marked the first time the Soviet leader mentioned Japan in a public statement since a MiG-25 pilot defected to Hokkaido with his aircraft in September 1976.

b. Japan-PRC

A July report showed that the Japan-China trade balance had moved toward an equilibrium in the first half of 1980 after a long period of chronic deficit on the Chinese side. Indications were that Japan's merchandise trade balance with China was likely to be deficit for the first time in 16 years because of a steep growth in imports arising from soaring crude oil prices. While Japanese exports to China fell by 0.5 percent, Japanese imports from China increased by 51.7 percent largely because of an upsurge in crude oil imports. As a result, Sino-Japanese trade for 1980 was expected to reach a record high of more than $8 billion.

Crude oil imports from China, however, were expected to decline. China proposed to cut sharply the amount of crude oil it was slated to supply Japan in 1981 and 1982 because it anticipated little growth in either its onshore production or offshore exploration. It offered an additional 10 million tons of coal a year beginning in 1990 as a possible substitute for the expected shortfall in future oil shipments. The Japanese responded by extending four loans totaling $200 million to help finance major Chinese coal projects.

Nevertheless, 8 years of smooth relations between China and Japan suffered a setback as a result of another reshuffle of China's industrial priorities. A number of unilateral contract cancellations and postponements of plant construction projects in China caught the Japanese unprepared. Chinese explanations that these actions were needed to scale down an unrealistic modernization program did little to mollify Japanese investors who were preoccupied with the question of whether China intended to compensate Japanese business for losses on plant and equipment already delivered. China's assurances that compensation would be forthcoming elicited only skepticism on the part of Japan. The Japanese felt China was ignorant of international business practices and was not aware of the seriousness of the situation it had created.

The immediate cause of China's difficulties lay in balancing its budget. In 1979, China's deficit was $11.37 billion, 61 percent of which was attributed to capital investments. The shortfall at that time was made up by drawing on the previous year's surplus. The 1980 deficit amounted to $8 billion but, unlike 1979, no surplus was available. Instead the Chinese looked to cutting back new industrial plants and equipment in hopes that the deficit could be eliminated altogether by ruthlessly cutting investment and canceling projects already underway. A previous emphasis on heavy industry was dropped in favor of lighter industry which would provide a more immediate return on investment. The future of Baoshan, the massive steel manufacturing complex funded by the Japanese, was, therefore, placed in jeopardy along with numerous other Japanese ventures.

The drastic nature of China's actions may have appeared necessary from the Chinese point of view but they seriously alienated Japanese investors who will be required to demonstrate extraordinary patience and resilience if Sino-Japanese economic ties are not to deteriorate further.

c. North Korea

There was some indication that Moscow was once again interested in rebuilding relations with Pyongyang, which began to decline in the late 1970s. Communiques issued following meetings between Moscow's delegate Viktor Grishin and Korean leaders at the October Korean Workers Party Congress were friendly and optimistic, expressing Moscow's interest in improving relations. The North Koreans, however, responded cautiously, partly as a result of their concern over the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan, a subject on which they remained silent. North Korea's failure to express an opinion on the invasion and its abstention on two occasions from voting on Afghanistan resolutions raised at Socialist bloc parliamentary meetings were, however, interpreted by Moscow as anti-Soviet. The Korean Workers Party Congress in a way reinforced this view because the North Koreans continued to refer to "dominationism," a codeword embracing certain aspects of Soviet foreign policy. Kim Il-song made repeated reference to North Korea's support for the "anti-imperialist independent forces" against the "imperialists and dominionists," but seemed equally bothered by China-US ties and called on "socialist and nonaligned countries [not to] give up their anti-imperialist stand in order to improve their diplomatic relations with imperialist countries . . . "

Conclusions concerning North Korea's position between China and the Soviet Union are difficult to draw. Its refusal to align with Soviet foreign policy no more suggests its moving toward Beijing than its annoyance at US-China ties implies it is looking toward Moscow. Kim Il-song plays a risky game. His dependence on both countries requires that he never move very far toward one without making some concession to the other. Oil shortages, however, due to severe Soviet cutbacks, will lead to an increased dependence on the Chinese and some semblance of closer alignment.

d. South Korea

South Korea moved quietly to reestablish a trading partnership with China, and two-way trade in 1980 amounted to more than $300 million. The political impact was greater than the economic, however, because a thaw in the cold war politics which have dominated relations between the two countries may have resulted. South Korea's exports to China consisted of electronic products and fabrics in return for coal, and despite a large share of the trade occurring by way of third countries, their volume exceeded Seoul's trade with any other Communist country.

The Seoul Government also sought unsuccessfully to purchase coal from the USSR. Secret negotiations apparently were underway to establish both commercial trade agreements and diplomatic recognition, but the Soviets failed to show a serious interest.

3. SOUTHEAST ASIA

a. ASEAN

For the ASEAN nations, Kampuchea represented the major problem facing the area. Vietnam's occupation of Kampuchean territory continued to alert member nations to the possibilities of further Vietnamese expansion, with the concurrence and support of the Soviet Union. At the UN in October, the members joined with China in voting to seat the Democratic Kampuchean delegation rather than the Vietnamese-supported Heng Samrin regime and supported a UN resolution calling for the removal of foreign troops from Kampuchea and the convening of an international conference to settle the situation. Although ASEAN unity was in part responsible for the UN resolution, differences of approach surfaced soon after the vote. Indonesia supported a plan to legitimize forthcoming elections in Heng Samrin-ruled Kampuchea with an international supervisory team. Malaysia explored ways to hold regional talks between ASEAN, Vietnam, and Laos, while Thailand and Singapore urged China to remove the Khmer Rouge's leaders to gain international support for the anti-Vietnamese resistance.

In successive trips to Beijing, Thai Premier Prem Tinsulanon and his Singapore counterpart, Lee Kuan Yew, suggested persuasively to Chinese Vice Chairman Deng Xiaoping that Pol Pot, Ieng Sary, and Khieu Samphan be dropped from the Democratic Kampuchean leadership. The Chinese appeared interested as long as opposition to the Vietnamese in Kampuchea could be kept alive. A united front of resistance forces was suggested and the Singapore and Thai leaders favored Prince Sihanouk as its leader. Sihanouk, retreating from an earlier declaration of retirement from politics and an even earlier refusal to deal with Democratic Kampuchians, acquiesced to playing a role.

Malaysia and Indonesia viewed the Vietnamese as being in control in Kampuchea and as unwilling, despite grave economic problems, to give it up. Both felt that a regional conference on Kampuchea attended by the ASEAN countries and Hanoi might be feasible rather than an international conference which the Vietnamese would adamantly oppose because it would isolate them as villains in the situation. In October, Hanoi proposed that ASEAN and Indochina enter into discussions on peace and stability in the region. Such discussions would have a twofold advantage. They would be satisfactory to the Vietnamese because they would not focus on Kampuchea per se but might address Kampuchea in passing and thus would meet ASEAN's requirements. A regional conference on peace and stability would also give Vietnam a chance to present China in the worst light. Both ASEAN countries believed that if they accepted the Vietnamese version of the Chinese role in the conflict and ceased supporting the Khmer Rouge, Vietnam might reduce its troop strength in Kampuchea and offer a broader based government.

However, for precisely the same reasons that Hanoi would promote such a conference, Beijing would reject it. Singapore, too, was less than enthusiastic when the idea was broached, while Thailand remained concerned principally with effecting a total Vietnamese troop withdrawal from Kampuchea and opposed any solution that countered Chinese interests. Most Southeast Asian nations, however, still viewed China as a threat. Senior Indonesian officials believed Vietnam's posture on Kampuchea was linked to a justifiable fear of China. They would like to see a strong yet nonaggressive Vietnam to counterbalance China.

China became increasingly sensitive to its threatening image in Southeast Asia owing, in part, to Singaporean Prime Minister Lee's visit to Beijing in November. To shed the image and appear conciliatory, China quietly dropped its demand that substantial Vietnamese troop withdrawals be a condition to the convening of an international conference on Kampuchea and yielded to a suggestion to diminish its support for armed insurgency in the region. Lee's argument that China needed to demonstrate goodwill toward the ASEAN nations perhaps was sufficiently convincing although inconsistencies in China's implementation of its decision are puzzling. For example, the Communist Party of Malaysia's radio station continued to broadcast from China despite Lee's conviction, after leaving China, that it would be shut down. Similarly, the Yunnan-based radio station of the Communist Party of Thailand oddly resumed broadcasting after a long silence. One explanation held that China's hatred of Vietnam was so intense that it was willing to forgo good relations with ASEAN rather than risk having Southeast Asia's Communist parties fall under the influence of Vietnam or the Soviet Union. If the broadcasts continue, they will almost certainly alienate the people from whom China seeks support.

For most of the ASEAN nations, however, Soviet behavior in Southeast Asia was still more alienating than reassuring. When the Soviet aircraft carrier Minsk penetrated into the Gulf of Thailand in October, it was only Indonesia who argued that the carrier's presence was not sufficiently provocative to require an ASEAN demarche to Moscow. For the remaining countries, the idea of a Soviet naval fleet sailing without warning into the area was alarming. The Philippines on more than one occasion expressed fear of the Soviet presence at Cam Ranh Bay, Vietnam, because of its proximity to the Philippines, and Thailand, too, continued to protest Soviet resupply of Vietnamese troops along the Thai-Kampuchean border despite repeated Soviet denials. Overall the Kremlin did not handle Southeast Asia with a light touch and its behavior served to isolate it even from Vietnam.

b. Vietnam

Vietnam faced severe economic problems, social unrest, and dissolution of its government's moral authority in the latter half of 1980. Food shortages, already critical, were aggravated further by a series of autumn typhoons which destroyed more than 40 percent of the rice crop, and relations with the Soviet Union began to show signs of strain because of Vietnamese resentment of relentless Soviet attempts to secure greater control and Soviet irritation over Vietnam's unyielding independence. Reports that Hanoi's 1981 rice ration from Moscow was to be half the 1979 figure of 1 million tons suggested that the Soviets were not averse to pressuring the Vietnamese in order to wrest further concessions, particularly in the matter of their use of military bases. In addition to the use of harbors at Danang and Cam Ranh Bay, Southeast Asian intelligence circles believed the Soviets were building a submarine base at Kompong Som, Kampuchea, to bolster their Far Eastern fleet. Even though the Soviets were concerned that Vietnam was draining resources otherwise needed in Afghanistan and possibly Poland (by some estimates, as much as $1 billion in military aid in 1980), the USSR's undiminished fear of China enhancing its relations with ASEAN assured the Vietnamese of continued support.

China continued to threaten Vietnam with another "lesson" despite the military failure of its February 1979 incursion and the succeeding redeployment of Vietnam's elite forces along the border. China perceived its threatening posture as a means of sustaining pressure on a nation already weakened by overwhelming economic and social problems that would force it to succumb eventually. Kampuchea remained the key to the situation. The Vietnamese invasion of Kampuchea in 1978 left China with little recourse other than military intervention to protect its client state. China's succeeding 1979 offensive against Vietnam failed to force it to withdraw from Kampuchea but nevertheless demonstrated to the Soviet Union that the Chinese position on Kampuchea was one to be reckoned with, thereby establishing a basis for compromise with Moscow that did not exist previously. China's threats of a second "lesson" looked beyond Hanoi to Moscow for a response. It was the Chinese hope in the final 6 months of 1980 that a solution in Kampuchea would result once the Soviets tired of supporting a beleaguered Vietnam drained by ceaseless Chinese threats of invasion.

For the Soviets, however, the continuation of the Vietnamese-Chinese controversy had the advantage of keeping the flashpoint of potential conflict in Indochina and not on the Sino-Soviet border. Their policy is unclear. If it is in the USSR's interest to keep the situation destabilized, the process toward peace in Kampuchea will be a long one. In the end, only they and not Chinese threats will persuade the Vietnamese to reach a political solution.

c. Burma

Uneasy about its position between China and the Soviet Union, Burma did not participate in the Kampuchea credentials question at the UN. Burmese President U Ne Win paid an official visit to China in October and was told by Deng Xiaoping that China was prepared to expand relations with Burma. Problems arose during the talks, however, because of Beijing's unwillingness to promise not to support the armed insurgents opposing the Burmese Government. Ne Win was encouraged to enter into peace talks with the Communist Party of Burma and agreed to do so, with China as the mediator.

4. SOUTH ASIA

a. India-USSR

India made clear which side of the Sino-Soviet contest it was taking by recognizing the Heng Samrin regime in Kampuchea in early July and then playing host to Soviet President Brezhnev when he visited New Delhi in December. Because of Moscow's interest in the Indian Ocean, India was actively courted as a preferred client to insure that it would not reach rapprochement with China. During his visit, President Brezhnev made a point of addressing Communist Party of India (CPI) leaders in a separate function independent of official leadership. Moscow-leaning factions were told to support the Gandhi Government in all foreign policy matters and to restrict criticism solely to domestic issues.

India's position regarding Soviet activity in Afghanistan remained deliberately ambiguous. In September Prime Minister Gandhi had yielded to pressure from 15 other heads of government, gathered in New Delhi for a conference of Asian and Pacific members of the Commonwealth, to join them in a veiled condemnation of the USSR and Vietnam for their respective roles in Afghanistan and Kampuchea. A joint communique issued after Indonesia's President Suharto visited New Delhi in December more clearly stated India's disapproval by unconditionally extending Indian and Indonesian support for the independence and nonaligned status of Afghanistan. Nevertheless, the joint communique issued following President Brezhnev's visit was deliberately vague on the issue and referred only to "hotbeds of tension in Southwest Asia." Apparently the Indian Government had felt it necessary to demonstrate in small ways that it was not under pressure to endorse the Soviet presence in Afghanistan but felt constrained at the same time not to alienate the Soviets in doing so.

Moscow's economic role in the Indian public sector expanded considerably in the wake of the Brezhnev visit, and the Soviets were found to be popular despite their troops' active engagement in neighboring Afghanistan. A public opinion poll taken in November showed the Soviet Union to be highly regarded by the Indian public while the Chinese were viewed as untrustworthy.

b. India-China

India's close ties with the Soviet Union and the insoluble nature of its border dispute with China effectively precluded any dramatic breakthrough in Sino-Indian relations. Each side appeared to be waiting for the other to initiate action. Indian recognition of the Heng Samrin regime in Kampuchea signaled to China that India's position was clearly to do the Soviets' bidding. India, in turn, seemed content to leave relations as they were in order to maximize Soviet support. However, the Indians remained wary of Chinese overtures to Pakistan, Bangladesh, and Nepal because they threatened Indian preeminence in the area and necessitated closer reliance on the Soviets for diplomatic and military support.

c. Pakistan-USSR

The worsening relationship between Pakistan and the Soviet Union was caused primarily by the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan. Islamabad saw itself encircled by Soviets in Afghanistan and a hostile India with close ties to the Soviet Union. The Pakistani military feared a Soviet move into Pakistan that could be disguised by the need to halt rebel infiltration along the Durand Line. For their part, the Soviets continued to woo President Zia with offers of economic aid, including a new steel plant erected with Soviet assistance, but the plant's opening ceremony was avoided by Zia in a gesture of displeasure over harsh Soviet media attacks on the Pakistani martial law regime.

Soviet strategy aimed at getting President Zia to sit down at the negotiating table with the Kabul "puppet" government, thereby recognizing its legitimacy. Zia's policy of Islamization, however, was a real impediment to the Soviets as was his decision to restrict the number of Soviet diplomatic personnel and their movements. It was Zia's fear that a new wave of tribal uprisings would break out in Baluchistan with Soviet support. Several instances of Soviet helicopter gunship raids into Pakistan territory enhanced his insecurity.

d. Pakistan-China

Pakistan's relationship with China is one of longstanding friendship. However, China's capability to insure Pakistan's security has been limited. Pakistan's military hardware is antiquated and the Chinese have not had the financial means to modernize it. Although they opened an aircraft rebuild factory in Kamra in November and reportedly delivered three squadrons of Fantun fighter aircraft as part of an arms deal that included new Chinese SAM-2, surface-to-air missiles, the Chinese commitment to Pakistan's defense, while sincere, has been inadequate in the face of Pakistan's perceived threat from India and the USSR.

e. Bangladesh

Bangladesh's overriding security consideration has always been India, and an early deterioration in relations with the Gandhi regime led the Bangladesh Government to seek cordial ties with the Chinese as part of a foreign policy similar to that of Pakistan in its view of India and the USSR. A Calcutta daily reported in September that Bangladesh had arranged the purchase of two squadrons of MiG-21s, 36 tanks, and other arms worth about $400 million from China when President Zia visited Beijing in July. China also agreed to provide a $42 million interest-free loan for economic development.

The Soviets continued to be apprehensive about China's high visibility in Bangladesh. Although the political opposition, particularly the leftwing of the Awami League, still looked to Moscow as a model and friend, it was difficult to convince the country's Muslim population of Soviet goodwill, particularly after Afghanistan.

5. CONCLUSION

The prospects for a Sino-Soviet rapprochement in Asia appeared more bleak at the end of 1980 than previously, as competition between the two sides intensified and attitudes hardened. The Soviet invasion of Afghanistan remained no less a blot on Moscow's reputation among the Asian nations, but the attention it once received dwindled in the face of the potentially explosive situation in Kampuchea for which the Soviets were also held culpable. With the exception of Vietnam (whose Soviet relationship had begun to show signs of deterioration), India, and occasional Indonesian acquiescence, the Soviets met with little support in Asia. Their successes, nevertheless, could be measured in terms of having gained access in Vietnam to some of the finest military harbors in Asia, having renewed a special relationship with India, the world's largest nonaligned nation, and having kept China preoccupied with countering the threat of a hostile Vietnam.

China's opposition to both Vietnam and the Soviet Union fostered much of its foreign policy in the region. In Southeast Asia it was able to capitalize to a degree on Soviet unpopularity, although its cultivation of goodwill was marred by an inconsistency observed between its stated intention to withdraw support of Communist insurgent groups in the region and its apparent failure to do so fully. Nevertheless, Southeast Asian nations tended to follow China's lead because Soviet-supported Vietnam appeared to be the greater threat, surpassing even old fears of Chinese domination. In Japan as well, China was preferred over the USSR, despite the alienation incurred as a result of China's unilateral economic cuts, because of the more imposing threat represented by the Soviet Union.

From this particular perspective China would appear to have gained somewhat over the Soviet Union. However, Sino-Soviet rivalry in Asia in the final months of 1980 was really more accurately depicted in Kampuchea where it was stalemated, and where, given the unyielding positions of either side, it was likely to remain so.

Takeshi Inoue, Japan-China Association on Economy and Trade President, states Japan should expand government loans for coal development in China in order to secure a Japanese supply target of 10 million tons in 1985. The possible expansion of loans is necessary, he says, to develop three other coal mines in addition to the four for which the Exim Bank has already approved $100 million in financing. 12 Jul 80	SRV/USSR/PRC. Unattributed "News Analysis" broadcast to Southeast Asia from Beijing accuses the Soviet Union and Vietnam of using the occasion of the 28 June visit of VCP General Secretary Le Duan to Moscow for a secret discussion of the Southeast Asian issue and pays particular attention to Soviet-Vietnamese cooperation. Since the signing of the November 1978 Soviet-Vietnam Treaty of Friendship and Cooperation, Soviet military advisers have "swarmed" into Vietnam, and Soviet arms and ammunition shipped to Vietnam have sharply increased. With Soviet support, Vietnam has increased its anti-China activities and has openly sent troops to invade Kampuchea and control Laos, imposing a great threat to peace and stability in Asia. The USSR has turned Vietnam into a "relay station" for its south-bound strategy in Southeast Asia. This strategy is in coordination with the Soviet drive in South Asia and the Persian Gulf and constitutes an important link in the Soviet contention for world hegemony. The new cooperation means that Vietnam will be "more tightly tied to the war chariot of Soviet world Strategy" and that it will create new disturbances in Southeast Asia.	X				FBIS (PRC) 14 Jul 80

4 Aug 80	ASEAN/SRV/USSR. Thai PM Prem Tinsulanon, at a dinner honoring UN Secretary General Kurt Waldheim in Bangkok, says the illegal presence of outsiders in Kampuchea is the root cause of the conflict in Kampuchea. The suggested concept of a demilitarized zone would prevent the Kampucheans already in Thai territory from returning voluntarily to their homeland, thus leaving the burden to Thailand and other third-world countries. The concept differs from the international law which intends to separate warring parties--of which Thailand is not one; it encourages on Thailand's sovereign right to protect its own territory; and, finally, it should be seen as an attempt to legitimize the illegal presence of foreign forces in Kampuchea. 24 Aug 80	JAPAN/ASEAN/PRC. Japanese FM Masayoshi Ito leaves Tokyo for a 12-day trip to Thailand, Burma, India, Pakistan, and China. This is the first diplomatic tour by a member of the new Suzuki Cabinet and indicates Japan attaches importance to Asia and intends to play a positive role in the international situation. The trip is also considered in Tokyo as a preparation for the UNGA debate on the Kampuchean issue and the Prime Minister's planned visit to ASEAN countries in January 1981.		X				FBIS (PRC) 25 Aug 80
24 Aug 80	JAPAN/PRC/USSR. Commentary by Xinhua (Beijing) correspondent Wu Xuewen entitled "Moscow's High-Handedness Toward Tokyo" decries Moscow's attitude toward Japan since the formation of the Suzuki Cabinet. It claims Moscow wants to "call the tune" for the planned talks between Soviet and Japanese foreign ministers at the UNGA session in September and to compel Japan to say nothing about the northern territories and the Afghan issue during the talks. The Soviet Union is also accused of wanting to take advantage of its geographical position and military strength to force Japan to give up its sanction measures so that Western unity regarding the Afghan situation will be disrupted. 25 Aug 80	JAPAN/USSR. Japan's Cabinet Legislative Bureau Director Reijiro Tsunoda and Chief Cabinet Secretary Kiichi Miyazawa discuss the legal aspects of the passage of the disabled Soviet nuclear submarine through Japanese territorial waters. Tsunoda tells Miyazawa that he has no objections to the Foreign Ministry's view that the Soviet submarine made a "harmless transit" through Japanese waters. He adds that since the submarine was reportedly not carrying nuclear weapons, the transit poses no problems in connection with Japan's three antinuclear principles opposing the possession, manufacture, and importation of nuclear weapons into Japan. 27 Aug 80	PAKISTAN/USSR. GOP orders the closure of the Soviet Press and Information Office in Islamabad, imposes travel restrictions on Russian diplomats, and requests the USSR to reduce its diplomatic presence in Pakistan by 50 percent. The measures are part of the government's crackdown on the Soviet presence in Pakistan in an effort to quell a Moscow-inspired campaign against the regime of President Zia-ul-Haq. According to Western and nonaligned sources, the Soviets have been exceptionally heavy-handed in their dealings with Pakistan, with the Russian Ambassador reportedly trying to "bully" President Zia and making "threatening-remarks" to other officials. The USSR is also alleged to have embarked on a campaign of subversion designed to destabilize the government, with repeated journalistic attacks on the Zia regime appearing in Soviet publications originating in Karachi or promulgated by TASS in Moscow. 29 Sep 80	INDIA/USSR. Indian President Reddy, heading a large delegation, arrives in Moscow for high-level discussions at the Kremlin. Reddy's highest priority is to persuade the Soviets to increase crude oil exports to India which have been threatened by the hostilities in the Persian Gulf. Petroleum Minister Virendra Patil's request for 6 million tons of crude in addition to the 1.5 million tons the Soviets already export is rejected by President Brezhnev, even though this increase represents only 1 percent of total Soviet production. Informed sources claim the Indian delegation is upset over the Soviet's reluctance to assist an ally that only recently invited international criticism for supporting Soviet-backed regimes in Kampuchea and Afghanistan. The Soviets are said to be considering the request "sympathetically" and indicate an interest in exchanging Soviet crude for Indian wheat. The Indian Government is unwilling to commit Indian food supplies until it can be assured that ample stocks exist. 19 Nov 80	INDIA/USSR. Brajesh Mishra, Indian Ambassador to the UN, explains India's controversial position on the Soviet occupation of neighboring Afghanistan. India, he points out, has consistently urged restraint by all parties in attempting to negotiate the dispute peacefully. Mishra voices India's fear of the region turning into a hotbed of super-power rivalries when he states, "Suspicious generated by the harboring and encouragement of dissident elements and the consequent buildup of tensions could only heighten the risk of great power confrontation closer on our doorstep." Unwilling to endorse the Soviet occupation and equally unwilling to jeopardize its close links with Moscow, India abstains on the motion to condemn the Soviets, raised by the Islamic Conference. 19 Nov 80	INDIA/USSR. To publicize Moscow's firm commitment to India prior to President Brezhnev's state visit to New Delhi in December, Izvestiya (Moscow) issues a stinging denunciation of Washington's and Beijing's policies in the subcontinent. The paper contends that Chinese operatives have established bases against India in the Chittagong Hills and that Washington is arming Pakistan with weapons to be trained on India. Furthermore, China is sending massive arms aid to Afghan "bandits" through the Karakoram "road of aggression" and threatening Indian Kashmir. The article concludes that this "international freebooting" on the part of the United States and China "is flagrantly at variance with the developing countries' interests." 30 Nov 80	PAKISTAN/USSR. Indian journalist interviews members of a London-based separatist organization calling for the creation of an independent Baluchistan straddling the borders of Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Iran. The Baluchistan People's Liberation Front (BPLF) claims the support of 60,000 Baluch tribesmen and a trained force of 15,000 to 20,000 guerrilla fighters. The BPLF, headed by Mir Hazar Khan, is avowedly Marxist and is openly courting the Soviet Union. Besides a broad base of popular support, the BPLF claims the support of the more moderate Baluchistan National Party headed by Ghous Bakhsh Bizenjo and the radical Baluchistan Students Organization. The organization has recently made overtures to various West-ern governments as well as to Libya. Leaders stress they are not receiving support from India but India will not come to President Zia's aid when the tribes rise in revolt. The Kabul regime, they claim, is firmly committed to an independent Baluchistan and is training Baluch tribesmen in guerrilla warfare. BPLF leaders are confident the Soviets will assist in carving out the new state from the already destabilized areas in Iran and Pakistan.	X			X		India (New Delhi) 3 , 80

2 Dec 80	INDIA/USSR. PM Indira Gandhi, addressing Soviet journalists on the forthcoming trip to India of Soviet leader Brezhnev says the President of the USSR will be welcomed very warmly and that "at this juncture of this changing world, it is very important to exchange views. Leonid Brezhnev's visit will give us an opportunity of knowing better the Soviet stand on many matters. The Soviet leader will be able to see what we are trying to do, what are our difficulties, and what we have been able to achieve." Gandhi stresses that "friendship between the Soviet Union and India is one of the important factors for world peace. The friendship has been based on principles and also on the fact that the Soviet Union has helped us in moments of need--economically and morally." Gandhi conceded that some differences in viewpoint exist between India and the USSR on various world issues, but that both sides are eager to continue to strengthen their friendship. 4 Dec 80	INDIA/USSR. Izvestiya (Moscow) examines USSR-India economic cooperation. The article states that USSR aid has been directed toward creating a powerful industrial potential in India while strengthening the state sector of its economy, as exemplified by the construction of metallurgical enterprises at Bhilai and Bokaro and the heavy machine-building plants at Ranchi, Durgapur, and Harward, the aluminum plant at Korba, oil-extraction and refining enterprises in Gujarat, Bihar, and Assam States, and pharmaceutical enterprises at Hyderabad and Rishikesh. The Indian side pays for Soviet deliveries of equipment, planning, and other jobs performed by Soviet specialists with deliveries of jute, tea, copra, leather and metallurgy, machine building, petrochemistry, and other products. The USSR has made India capable of producing with its own resources a very wide range of industrial output, thereby reducing imports of complete equipment. Cooperation has resulted in coordination of economic plans; the sixth 5-year plan for India coincides with the Soviet 11th 5-year plan. Coordination in particular enables provision to be made for important aspects of Soviet-Indian cooperation in the sphere of power engineering. Mentioned also are other important links such as the Indian-Soviet intergovernmental Commission for Economy, Scientific, and Technical Cooperation which meets periodically in Delhi or Moscow, the Treaty of Peace, Friendship, and Cooperation, visits by national leaders, the new form of cooperation in joint construction of major industrial units in Third World countries, and the long-term economic, trade, scientific and technical cooperation program.			X		FBIS (USSR) 16 Dec 80

6 Dec 80	INDIA/USSR. During her first extended interview since returning to power in January, Indian PM Gandhi speaks at length on foreign and domestic affairs on the eve of President Brezhnev's arrival in New Delhi. The usually confident and forthright prime minister betrays a note of pessimism regarding the international situation and India's role in the world. On the touchy subject of Afghanistan, Mrs. Gandhi concedes that India's policy of withholding criticism of the Soviet invasion and using quiet persuasion to get the Soviets to withdraw has been a failure. Faced with armed resistance and harsh international criticism, the Soviets have "dug in their toes" and appear to be in Afghanistan for the long haul. Despite India's close relationship with the Soviet Union, PM Gandhi has moved from an initial understanding attitude to a quietly critical stance. She claims the nonaligned movement--one of the cornerstones of Indian foreign policy--has become sidetracked in recent years and needs to find new directions.		X			Washington Post 7 Dec 80

9 Dec 80	INDIA/USSR. During the first full day of talks following Soviet President Brezhnev's arrival in India, PM Gandhi unequivocally tells President Brezhnev the presence of 85,000 Soviet troops in Afghanistan is unacceptable to India and the Soviets should withdraw. At a press conference following the meeting, Soviet spokesman Leonid Zamyatin asserts that, while no new troops will be committed to the campaign, the Soviets will remain in Afghanistan "to the end." Zamyatin accuses the United States and China of inciting and arming the insurgents, thereby forcing the USSR to react to the threat on its southern flank. Zamyatin urges Pakistan and Iran to initiate bilateral talks with the Karmal government on the basis of Moscow's proposals of 14 May. During a midday reception for Mr. Brezhnev which was moved indoors for security reasons, Mrs. Gandhi points to the enduring friendship of the two countries. She calls Indo-Soviet friendship "of equal importance" to both countries and states that neither country has ever sought to impose its perceptions on the other. "Our agreement on vital issues outweighs divergence." Foreign press speculations suggest PM Gandhi's refusal to criticize the Soviets openly has caused India to become isolated from many of its Third World friends and highlighting Indian disagreements with the Soviets is intended to refurbish New Delhi's NAM credentials. For its part, the Kremlin seeks, if not outright support for their Afghan venture, then at least a diplomatic silence on India's part. Both sides are careful to point out that inevitable differences of opinion on specific issues will not be allowed to overshadow substantive areas of Indo-Soviet relations. 9 Dec 80	INDIA/USSR. Leonid Brezhnev, speaking at an Indian-Soviet friendship meeting in New Delhi, stresses the increasing importance of economic cooperation between the two countries, and notes the important regard given by the Soviet government to assisting in strengthening India's defense capability. At the same meeting Indian PM Gandhi pays respect to the achievements of the Soviet people and marks India's continued following of a nonalignment policy, the content of which is to seek friendship with all countries and to work for goodwill and peace among nations. She expressed hope that independence, sovereignty, territorial integrity, and nonaligned status of the countries in the region will not be jeopardized through conflicts and interference. 9 Dec 80	INDIA/USSR. At a private meeting with President Brezhnev, Mrs. Gandhi tells the Soviet side that India is against all kinds of interference "which has affected the progress, sovereignty, and nonaligned status of Afghanistan." She says this position is within the framework of India's foreign policy and its "principled approach to issues." She adds that India's consistent stand has been that it does not condone foreign intervention or interference or any type of domination by one country over another. Brezhnev responds that Pakistan and the United States are continuing their interference in the internal affairs of Afghanistan. He asserts that the reasons for which Kabul requested Soviet military assistance have not vanished and blames outside intervention for the turmoil in the country. The USSR wants a political solution to the Afghan crisis and the 14 May proposals put forward by the Afghan Government can form the basis for such a settlement..		X			FBIS (South Asia) 10 Dec 80

10 Dec 80	INDIA/USSR. During an unprecedented joint session of the Indian Houses of Parliament, Leonid Brezhnev unveils a five-point peace and security proposal for the defense of the Persian Gulf. Partly an attempt to roll back US and Western influence in the Gulf and partly an endorsement of India's zone of peace initiative, the salient points of the Soviet proposal include (1) a ban on foreign military bases in the gulf or its vicinity, (2) a ban on the use or threat of force by an outside power in the area, (3) a respect for the nonaligned status of Persian Gulf states, (4) a respect for the sovereign right of the states in the area to their natural resources, (5) a pledge to keep open the sea lanes of the area. Mr. Brezhnev lavishes praise on PM Gandhi and claims Indo-Soviet friendship has "stood the test of time." With regard to Afghanistan, he heaps abuse on the United States, China, and Pakistan for instigating the Afghan "mercenaries," and vows to keep Soviet troops in the country until foreign provocations cease. Both sides pledge to support negotiations for nuclear disarmament and the demilitarization of the Indian Ocean. On the issue of Afghanistan, the declaration is deliberately vague, referring only to "hotbeds of tension in southwest Asia." Consistent with PM Gandhi's public criticism of Soviet conduct in Afghanistan, the declaration calls for "opposition to all forms of outside interference in the internal affairs of countries of the region. 13 Dec 80	INDIA/USSR. Informed sources in New Delhi report the Soviets are pressuring New Delhi to spurn Western offers of economic and technical aid in favor of deepening Soviet involvement in the Indian economy. The Soviets are particularly concerned over American and West European assistance to state-owned enterprises and the defense industry. Instances directly related to this pressure include India's last-minute decision to slow negotiations for the purchase of $350 million worth of American arms and Soviet pledges to supply additional oil if India withdraws a bid to buy Canadian transport planes. The Soviets are actively promoting a coproduction agreement for the manufacture of transport aircraft and a contract for the purchase and manufacture of the advanced MiG-23. India's decision to look to the West for assistance is based on pragmatic not ideological considerations. Not only does the West possess technical skills which the Soviets are unable to provide, but Indian state-owned enterprises which have been heavily dependent on Soviet assistance in the past are functioning sluggishly and suffering heavy losses. 22 Dec 80	JAPAN/USSR. Kyodo (Tokyo) reports Joji Omura, Director General of Japan's Defense Agency, said his country is watching closely the sharp increase in the passage of Soviet military vessels through three strategic straits near Japan. In 1980, 435 ships of the Soviet navy had sailed through the Straits of Soya, Tsugaru, and Tsushima by the end of November; a figure nearly doubling the 240 passages recorded in 1975. The number of scramble operations involving Air Self-Defense Force aircraft also increased greatly as more Soviet aircraft shuttled between the Soviet Union and Vietnam. By the end of November, there had been 498 scramble operations doubling the number in 1975 and surpassing by 131 the number recorded in 1979.				X		FBIS (AP) 22 Dec 80; FBIS (PRC) 22 Dec 80
