CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTION TO THE LAW OF EVIDENCE

0101 SOURCES OF THE MILITARY LAW OF EVIDENCE

A. The United States Constitution. The Constitution, as the supreme law of the land, governs many evidentiary and quasi-evidentiary issues that arise during courts-martial. It determines the admissibility of certain evidence (Fourth and Fifth Amendments) and also affects such matters as discovery, compulsory process of witnesses, and immunity (Fifth and Sixth Amendments). Many so-called "courtroom" rules of evidence (such as form of questions, relevancy, and hearsay) are not constitutionally based, but are controlled by other sources of evidentiary law.

B. The Uniform Code of Military Justice [hereinafter UCMJ]. 10 U.S.C. §§ 801-934 (1994). The Constitution, in Article I, Section 8, provides that Congress shall have the power to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces. Congress provided such rules by enacting the UCMJ in 1950, establishing our current military justice system. The following UCMJ articles deal with evidentiary matters.

1. Article 31: Prohibits compulsory self-incrimination. See chapter XII, infra.
2. Article 42: Requires that the court members, the military judge, trial counsel, defense counsel, and the witnesses be sworn. See chapter VII, infra.
3. Article 46: Provides that trial counsel and defense counsel will have an equal opportunity to obtain evidence and to secure the attendance of witnesses. See chapters II and XIV, infra.
4. Article 47: Makes it an offense for a civilian to refuse to appear as a witness in a court-martial after fees have been tendered and the witness has been properly subpoenaed. See chapter XIV, infra.
5. Article 49: Provides for the use of depositions in courts-martial. See chapter VIII, infra.

6. Article 50: Provides that records made at courts of inquiry may, under certain conditions, be admitted under the "former testimony" exception to the hearsay rule. See chapter VIII, infra.

Note, only Articles 31, 49, and 50 actually deal with the admissibility of evidence.

Probably the most significant UCMJ provision governing the admissibility of evidence is article 36(a), which states:

Pretrial, trial and post-trial procedures, including modes of proof, for cases arising under this chapter triable in courts-martial, military commissions, and other military tribunals, and procedures for courts of inquiry, may be prescribed by the President by regulations which shall, so far as he considers practicable, apply the principles of law and the rules of evidence generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts, but which may not be contrary to or inconsistent with this chapter. [Emphasis added.]

The President has prescribed procedures for the trial of courts-martial in the Manual for Courts-Martial.

C. The Manual for Courts-Martial [hereinafter MCM]. Pursuant to the authority vested in the President by Article 36, UCMJ, the MCM (an Executive Order) was promulgated in 1951 and significantly revised in 1969 and 1984. The Military Rules of Evidence, patterned after the Federal Rules of Evidence, were promulgated in September 1980. The Military Rules of Evidence are found in Part III of the MCM.

D. Departmental Regulations. The Department of the Navy directs the activities of the Navy and Marine Corps, and promulgates regulations affecting the admissibility of evidence at trials by court-martial, particularly the service record entries so important during sentencing hearings. Sometimes regulations establish additional rules of evidence more restrictive than the Constitution, the UCMJ, or the Military Rules of Evidence. (See, e. g., the discussion of the limited immunity available to a servicemember under the Navy's Alcohol and Drug Abuse Program in Secretary of the Navy Instruction (SECNAVINST) 5300.28B of 11 July 1990.)

The following regulations, instructions, and publications are often cited as sources of evidentiary law in trials by court-martial:

1. U.S. Navy Regulations, 1990;
2. Secretary of the Navy Instructions (SECNAVINST);
3. Manual of the Judge Advocate General (JAGMAN);

4. Naval Military Personnel Manual (MILPERSMAN);
5. Navy Pay and Personnel Procedures Manual (PAYPERSMAN);
6. Chief of Naval Operations Instructions (OPNAVINST);
7. Marine Corps Individual Records Administration Manual (IRAM); and
8. Marine Corps Orders (MCO).

The proper execution of the rules and procedures set forth in these departmental regulations will often control the admissibility of evidence. For example, the PAYPERSMAN and the IRAM set forth the rules for preparing service record entries for the Navy and Marine Corps, thus controlling the admissibility of these public records under Military Rule of Evidence 803(6). Additionally, OPNAVINST 5350.4B and MCO P5300.12 set forth the procedures used in the Department of the Navy's urinalysis program. Both instructions create personal rights for the servicemember and deviations may cause the test results to be inadmissible. Counsel must be careful not to overlook these important sources of evidentiary law.

E. The military appellate court system

1. The first level of appellate courts in the military justice system are the four Courts of Criminal Appeals, one for the Navy and Marine Corps, one for the Coast Guard, one for the Army, and one for the Air Force. Most of the judges on these courts are military members, though the Coast Guard Court of Criminal Appeals has traditionally included two civilian judges. Above the Courts of Criminal Appeals is the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces--the court of last resort within the military justice system, consisting of five civilians appointed by the President for fifteen-year terms. Cases actually reviewed by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces fall within the U.S. Supreme Court's certiorari jurisdiction. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces reviews cases from all of the services, and its decisions are binding precedent in all trials by court-martial. The decisions of the Courts of Criminal Appeals are binding for the court's particular service and are considered persuasive authority by the other services.

2. Both the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the Courts of Criminal Appeals often interpret the sources of law listed above. On occasion, an appellate court finds that a particular provision does not comply with constitutional or statutory requirements. Accordingly, counsel should research the appellate case law before relying upon the sources listed above.

F. Other sources

1. The Federal Rules of Evidence. These rules are not directly applicable to trials by court-martial. The Federal Rules of Evidence, however, may become applicable if the Military Rules of Evidence are silent on a particular point. Military Rule 101(b) provides:

Secondary Sources: If not otherwise prescribed ... and not inconsistent with or contrary to the [Uniform Code of Military Justice] or this Manual, courts-martial shall apply:

- (1) First, the rules of evidence generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts; and
- (2) Second, when not inconsistent with [Military Rule 101(b)(1)], the rules of evidence at common law.

2. Federal precedent. Given the great similarities between the Military Rules of Evidence and the Federal Rules of Evidence, judicial construction of the Federal Rules will often prove helpful in interpreting the Military Rules.

3. State court decisions. These precedents may be persuasive, particularly if they interpret the U.S. Constitution or if they interpret state rules of evidence that are similar to the Military Rules.

0102 FORMS AND TYPES OF EVIDENCE

A. Forms of evidence. The information with which counsel attempt to persuade the trier of fact takes roughly four different forms: oral, documentary, real, and demonstrative evidence.

1. Oral evidence. Oral evidence is the sworn testimony received at trial. The fact an oath is administered is considered some assurance the information related by the witness will be trustworthy. If the witness makes false statements under oath, the witness may be prosecuted for perjury. Generally, witnesses will be able to relate only what they actually saw, heard, smelled, felt, or tasted, and state certain conclusions they reached based upon these sensory perceptions. See chapter VII, infra, for a more detailed discussion of the various aspects of the testimony of witnesses.

2. Documentary evidence. Documentary evidence is usually a writing that is offered into evidence. For example, an accused is charged with making a false report. The government, in order to prove its case, may attempt to introduce the report in evidence. Another example involves unauthorized absences. A servicemember is absent from the command. To prove the absence, the government may introduce an entry from the accused's service record. See chapter IX, infra, for a more detailed discussion of documentary evidence.

3. Real evidence. Real evidence (often referred to as "physical" evidence) usually consists of tangible objects that are relevant to the offense charged. The murder weapon or the baggie of marijuana are examples of real evidence. Chapter X, infra, contains a discussion of the procedures for handling real evidence at trial.

4. Demonstrative evidence. Strictly speaking, there are only three forms evidence may take: oral, documentary, and real. There is a fourth form which is sometimes considered a separate category. This form of evidence, called "demonstrative" evidence, has no inherent relevance to the case. Its relevance is derived from the item or location that it represents or demonstrates for the trier of fact. Demonstrative evidence (in the form of charts, diagrams, maps, models, photographs, or demonstrations) assists the trier of fact in visualizing places, objects, or events that cannot be introduced into evidence in the courtroom. Demonstrative evidence is the preferred method for familiarizing the trier of fact with such matters rather than transporting the trier of fact to the location for a personal view. Demonstrative evidence is discussed further in chapter X, infra.

B. The two types of evidence: direct and circumstantial. Whatever form it takes, all evidence is introduced either directly to prove a fact in issue, or to prove some other fact which may not be in issue, but from which a fact in issue may be inferred.

Examples: Clark is accused of murdering O'Henry.

Witness 1: "I saw Clark shoot O'Henry."--Direct evidence that Clark is the culprit.

Witness 2: "I saw Clark running away from the scene of the shooting with a gun in his hand."--Circumstantial evidence that Clark is the perpetrator.

1. Direct evidence

a. Defined: "[E]vidence that tends directly to prove or disprove a fact in issue." R.C.M. 918(c) discussion.

b. Effect

(1) Court members need not draw any inferences to make direct evidence relevant.

(2) The desired conclusion is apparent from the fact itself.

2. Circumstantial evidence

a. Defined: "[E]vidence which tends directly to prove not a fact in issue but some other fact or circumstance from which, either alone or together with other facts or circumstances, one may reasonably infer the existence or nonexistence of a fact in issue." R.C.M. 918(c) discussion.

b. Effect

Court members must draw inferences to arrive at the desired conclusion.

c. Rule: Military law permits a conviction to rest solely upon circumstantial evidence. See R.C.M. 918(c).

(1) Circumstantial evidence is not considered secondary or inferior evidence, only to be used where there is no direct evidence. It is admissible even when there is direct evidence on the same issue, and the decision as to weight rests with the trier of fact. "There is no general rule for determining or comparing the weight to be given to direct or circumstantial evidence." R.C.M. 918(c) discussion; see also Mil. R. Evid. 401, 402.

(2) In many situations, no direct evidence may be available on the point in question. For example, the accused's intent, identity, knowledge of a particular fact, and state of mind are often proved by circumstantial evidence.

Example: (desertion case)

Where the accused has not admitted the intent to remain away permanently (an element of the offense), trial counsel may introduce: the fact that the accused changed his name, bought a one-way ticket to Australia, burned his uniforms, and accepted civilian employment. From all these facts, the court may properly infer the necessary intent to remain away permanently.

0103 ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

A. Admissibility distinguished from credibility

1. Evidence is admissible if it meets the three requirements of authenticity, relevancy, and competency.

2. Just because evidence has been admitted for the trier of fact's consideration, however, does not mean that it must necessarily be believed. For example:

- a. The witness may be lying or mistaken;
- b. the document may contain false information; or
- c. the object may have been planted at the scene of the crime.

3. Credibility. Credibility relates to the "believability" of the evidence, that is, the "weight" it is accorded by the court. The trier of fact is the final judge as to how much weight a particular item of evidence will be given.

B. The "admissibility formula": authenticity (A) + relevancy (R) + competency (C) = admissible evidence (AE). All three factors must be present before the evidence is admissible over an objection.

1. Authenticity. The term authenticity refers to the genuine character of the evidence. Authenticity simply means that a piece of evidence is what it purports to be.

Examples:

1. Oral evidence. We know that the testimony is what it purports to be by virtue of the oath the witness has taken to tell the truth. He identifies himself as John Jones. This is John Jones' testimony.

2. Documentary evidence. How do we know that the service record entry is what it purports to be? Sometimes the custodian of the record, the personnel officer, will be called to "identify" the service record entry. This witness will testify under oath that he or she is the custodian of the record and that he or she has withdrawn a particular entry or page from the service record and that this is the same entry or page. Again, it is established that the service record entry is what it purports to be.

3. Real evidence. A pistol that was recovered from the person of the accused as the result of a search by a police officer. The police officer is called and sworn as a witness. The officer gives testimony about the circumstances of the search. Finally, he or she is presented with the pistol, and identifies it, perhaps from the serial number or perhaps from a tag attached to the pistol at the time it was seized. This testimony establishes that the pistol is what it purports to be.

Some types of evidence are "self-authenticating" and do not require testimonial authentication. For example, in the case of documentary evidence, a certificate from the custodian may be attached to a particular document. This "attesting certificate" establishes that the document is what it purports to be. An "attesting certificate" is a certificate or statement, signed by the custodian of the record, which indicates that a particular document is a true copy of the record. The "attesting certificate" also indicates that the individual signing the certificate or statement is the official custodian of the record. The certificate takes the place of the authenticating witness. In effect, the certificate speaks for itself. This technique can be used for documents or records of the United States, or any state, district, Commonwealth, territory, or possession of the United States. The concept of "self-authentication" is discussed further in chapter IX, infra.

2. Relevancy. Relevant evidence is evidence having a tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence. See Mil. R. Evid. 401. The question or test involved is, "Does the evidence aid the court in answering a question before it?"

To demonstrate the meaning of relevancy, consider a situation in which an accused is charged with a theft of property. In most cases, the fact that he beat his wife regularly would probably have nothing to do with his theft of property. Therefore, any testimony to this effect would be objectionable as irrelevant. Chapter V, infra, covers the various concepts of relevancy in greater detail.

3. Competency. Competent evidence is evidence that is appropriate proof in a particular case. Several considerations bear on this determination.

a. Public policy. First, the evidence to be introduced must not have been obtained in a manner contrary to public policy. The various exclusionary rules recognize that, in certain instances, public policy requires the exclusion of certain evidence to encourage or prevent certain types of conduct. The exclusionary rules will be discussed at length in subsequent chapters of this study guide. Chapter XII deals with evidence obtained in violation of Article 31, UCMJ, while chapter XIII deals with evidence obtained in violation of the law of search and seizure. Additionally, public policy sometimes acts to further certain relationships at the cost of sacrificing certain relevant evidence. For example, the spousal incapacity rule precludes, under certain circumstances, calling one spouse to testify against the other. Chapter VI, infra, discusses privileges in detail.

b. Reliability. A second consideration that relates to competence is reliability. Evidence which is hearsay, for example, is considered unreliable and is generally inadmissible. Exceptions to the hearsay rule are allowed only where the circumstances independently establish the reliability of the evidence. These rules exist with one purpose in mind: evidence admitted must be reliable. See chapter VIII, infra, for more discussion of the hearsay rule.

c. Undue prejudice. The third consideration with regard to competence is the area of undue prejudice. Here, certain matters (such as prior convictions of an accused) or certain physical evidence may be relevant, but their value as evidence may be outweighed by the danger they might unfairly prejudice the accused by emotionally affecting the court members. See chapter V, infra, and Mil. R. Evid. 403.

4. Admissible evidence. ( $A+R+C=AE$ ). It is obviously impossible to reduce the admissibility of evidence to a formula of mathematical precision. The chart on the following page is designed as an aid in conceptualizing the three broad categories under which all of the various objections to evidence lie. The proponent of the evidence must anticipate such objections and be prepared to offer sound legal theories to demonstrate that the proffered evidence is authentic, relevant, and competent.

CHAPTER II

DISCOVERY

"[T]he Statutory and implemental regulatory discovery rights of a military accused are more generous than the constitutional discovery rights of his civilian counterparts." United States v. Meadows, 42 M.J. 132 (C.M.A. 1995).

0201 GENERAL. Discovery is the right to examine information possessed by the other side before or during trial. There are at least four basic reasons why discovery is a valuable right.

A. It helps to put the defense on an equal footing with the prosecution in terms of investigative resources. Art. 46, UCMJ.

B. It enables the defense to prepare a rebuttal to the charges. In this sense, discovery complements Articles 10, 30, and 35, UCMJ, which require that the accused be informed of the charges and served with a copy of them.

C. It provides the basis for cross-examination and impeachment of witnesses at trial.

D. It works to make a court-martial a "truth-finding" process by giving both government and defense access to the evidence to be presented in both government and defense cases, and prevents trial by ambush. See R.C.M. 701.

The accused's and the government's right to discovery under the UCMJ is implemented by various provisions of the Manual for Courts-Martial [hereinafter "MCM"] and rules developed by case law. Each of these MCM provisions sets forth certain parameters for discovery. Although military discovery rules are fairly liberal, any errors in denying requests for discovery are measured on appeal by the reasonableness of counsel's requests. Discovery is not a substitute for counsel's case preparation; it is an essential part of it. Therefore, any request for discovery should be (1) as specific as possible under the circumstances, (2) timely, (3) directed to the appropriate official, and (4) supported by the specific authority pursuant to which the request is made. To preserve any error in denying a discovery request for appellate review, the request should be renewed at trial specifying the prejudice to the accused caused by its denial. For example, defense counsel may show that he has been deprived of the right to prepare cross-examination of the witness because the witness refused to talk to him, and the government and pretrial investigating officer refused to call the witness at a pretrial investigation. See United States v. Ledbetter, 2 M.J. 37 (C.M.A.

1976) (error to deny accused's request for presence of witness at article 32 investigation).

0202 METHODS OF DISCOVERY

A. Right to interview witnesses. Article 46, UCMJ, provides that "the trial counsel, the defense counsel, and the court-martial shall have equal opportunity to obtain witnesses and other evidence. . . ." Rule for Courts-Martial 701(e), MCM, 1984 [hereinafter "R.C.M."] indicates that both counsel may interview a prospective witness for the other side (except the accused) without the consent of opposing counsel. Trial counsel's dealings with the accused must be through the defense counsel. R.C.M. 502(d)(5) (Discussion para. C). See United States v. Irwin, 30 M.J. 87 (C.M.A. 1990) (order requiring third party present during defense interview of victim held invalid); United States v. Aycock, 15 C.M.A. 158, 35 C.M.R. 130 (1964) (order for accused not to contact witnesses against him unlawful); United States v. Enloe, 15 C.M.A. 256, 35 C.M.R. 228 (1965) (Air Force regulation requiring presence of a third party during defense counsel interview of Air Force investigative agents held unlawful). See also United States v. Strong, 16 C.M.A. 43, 36 C.M.R. 199 (1966) (error to prohibit accused or his counsel from interviewing prosecution witnesses after they had testified); United States v. Killebrew, 9 M.J. 154 (C.M.A. 1980) (where government transferred informant to distant duty station to protect informant against retaliation, government had duty to arrange required interview, even though extraordinary measures might be required to protect informant; such measures include telephone interviews or written communication if appropriate). Remember the Victim Witness Assistance Program (VWAP) mandated by Congress and implemented in DOD may have an impact on the discovery process.

Although both sides have an equal right to interview witnesses, a witness has no obligation to submit to a pretrial interview. United States v. Morris, 24 M.J. 93 (C.M.A. 1987). Also, the denial of access to a witness will not automatically get the defense appellate-level relief. See United States v. Irwin, supra. The Court of Military Appeals has held that, absent prejudice to the defense, denying requests for interviews would not be reversible error. United States v. Lucas, 5 M.J. 167 (C.M.A. 1978). The defense counsel should ensure the record fully reflects the prejudice to the accused. If it does not, then the appellate court may simply remand the case for a hearing to determine if the witness had information material to the defense, rather than reversing a conviction solely on the basis of whether the interview was allowed. United States v. Killebrew, supra. But see United States v. Ford, 29 M.J. 597 (A.C.M.R. 1989) (abuse of discretion for military judge to deny defense request for continuance to obtain witness, even though request was untimely; testimony was noncumulative, important, relevant, requested on the merits, and delay would have been only a few days.) See also United States v. Jones, 20 M.J. 919 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) on the issue of abuse of discretion.

Note that a remedy for the witness who refuses to be interviewed exists under R.C.M. 702's provision for depositions, which includes subpoena power to compel the witness to attend and respond to questions. For more information, see para. H, infra.

B. Pretrial investigation, Article 32, UCMJ. When a general court-martial is contemplated, the Article 32, UCMJ, pretrial investigation provides a means for discovery. The pretrial investigating officer is not limited by the strict rules of evidence and may consider the sworn statements of unavailable witnesses. Additionally, unsworn statements of witnesses may be considered if the defense does not object. R.C.M. 405(g)(4). All reasonably available witnesses who appear relevant and not cumulative to a thorough and impartial investigation are required to be called at the article 32 investigation. Military orders may be issued to pay the travel and per diem expense of military witnesses to attend an article 32 investigation. R.C.M. 405(g)(3) also allows similar expenses to be paid for civilian witnesses on invitational travel orders, but because there is no subpoena power at these investigations, civilian witnesses may not be compelled to attend. See JAGMAN, § 0146.

As indicated above, not every witness will be made to attend the pretrial investigation. In pertinent part, Article 32(b), UCMJ provides: "At that investigation, full opportunity shall be given the accused to cross-examine witnesses against him if they are available." (Emphasis added.) R.C.M. 405(g)(1)(A) defines a witness as being "reasonably available" if the witness is located within 100 miles from the situs of the investigation and the significance of the testimony and personal appearance of the witness outweighs the difficulty, expense, delay, and effect on military operations of obtaining the witness' appearance. This "100-mile rule" was added to the R.C.M. in 1991 in an attempt to simplify the determination of "reasonable availability" by creating a bright-line rule. If the witness is within 100 miles, then the investigating officer must consider the other factors in the rule. The production of witnesses outside the 100-mile radius is within the discretion of the witness' commander for military witnesses or the commander ordering the investigation for civilian witnesses.

In United States v. Ledbetter, 2 M.J. 37 (C.M.A. 1976), the Court of Military Appeals considered the meaning of the word "available" as it bears upon the right of the accused to confront and cross-examine witnesses at the pretrial investigation. The accused requested the presence of the key government witness to cross-examine him at the article 32 investigation. The defense objected to the denial of this request and the use of the witness' statements. At trial, the defense moved to reopen the article 32 investigation. The trial judge denied the motion without comment.

In deciding the issue, the Court of Military Appeals utilized a balancing test by weighing the significance of the witness' testimony against the relative difficulty and expense of providing the witness for the investigation. The witness in Ledbetter was the key prosecution witness, transferred by the government less than two weeks prior to the investigation. The government made no showing that military exigencies or extraordinary circumstances existed to support its decision not to produce the witness subject to military orders. The court concluded that the trial judge's failure to reopen the investigation and order the production of the witness was prejudicial error.

In United States v. Marrie, 43 M.J. 35 (C.M.A 1995), the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces affirmed the Air Force court holding that the new "100-mile rule" did not mean that a witness was per se unavailable merely by virtue of location. Instead, the court said, the determination of availability remains an exercise of discretion, and hearing officers and trial judges should continue to apply the Ledbetter balancing test. But see United States v. Burfitt, 43 M.J. 815 (A.F.C.C.A. 1996) (IO's determination that witnesses were unavailable premised on 100 mile rule not fatal, IO elected sworn telephone testimony using a speaker phone and defense had opportunity to cross).

Because the availability of a witness is a matter of law to be resolved by the trial judge, the importance of raising the issue again at trial and getting all the facts on the record cannot be overemphasized. The trial judge cannot make assumptions as to the facts. In United States v. Chestnut, 2 M.J. 84 (C.M.A. 1976), the court chastised, and held improper, a trial judge's adoption of the IO's assumption that a key civilian witness (the rape victim, a German national) was unavailable. When a motion to reopen an article 32 investigation is made, the trial judge must make an independent determination concerning the availability of the requested witness. Additionally, failing to object to the deprivation of substantial pretrial rights at the article 32 investigation through a motion for continuance or a motion for appropriate relief at trial may waive the issue. United States v. Chuculate, 5 M.J. 143 (C.M.A. 1978).

R.C.M. 405(f) states that the accused and his counsel are entitled to be present at all sessions of the pretrial investigation and to confront all witnesses who testify. But see United States v. Bramel, 29 M.J. 958 (A.C.M.R. 1990) (finding the right of face-to-face confrontation at trial, as announced in Coy v. Iowa, 487 U.S. 1012 (1988), did not apply to an Article 32 pretrial investigation). The defense is also entitled to a copy of the report of investigation, with all enclosures, which is forwarded to the officer who ordered the investigation. R.C.M. 405(j)(3). In addition to a copy of the report itself, counsel is also entitled to the tape recordings of testimony at the article 32 investigation. United States v. Strand, 17 M.J. 839 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984); United States v. Derrick, 21 M.J. 903 (N.M.C.M.R. 1986); see also The Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500 (1994) at para. G, infra. Because of the value of preserving Article 32 testimony, it is a relatively common practice to request a verbatim transcript.

C. Documents and other information possessed by the prosecution. R.C.M. 701.

1. As soon as practicable after charges have been served on the accused, the trial counsel shall provide copies of, or allow the defense to inspect, any paper which accompanied the charges when referred, the convening order and any amending order, and any sworn or signed statement relating to an offense charged in the case which is in the possession of the trial counsel. R.C.M. 701(a)(1). This may include:

- a. The report of the preliminary inquiry officer and statements of witnesses;

b. the report of Naval Criminal Investigative Service (NCIS) or the Criminal Investigation Division (CID) and statements of witnesses;

c. the recommendations as to disposition by officers subordinate to the convening authority;

d. the report of the pretrial investigating officer, either formal or informal, and a transcript of the pretrial investigation;

e. the staff judge advocate's advice to the officer exercising general court-martial jurisdiction pursuant to Article 34, UCMJ;

f. papers relating to any previous withdrawal or referral of charges;
and

g. the service record of the accused.

2. Before arraignment, the trial counsel shall notify the defense of any records of prior civilian or court-martial convictions that the government may attempt to introduce at trial. R.C.M. 701(a)(4).

3. Before the trial, the trial counsel shall notify the defense of the names and addresses of the witnesses the government intends to call in the case-in-chief or to specifically rebut an announced defense of alibi, innocent ingestion, or lack of mental responsibility. R.C.M. 701 (a)(3).

4. Upon defense request, the government shall permit the defense to inspect books, papers, documents, photographs, objects, buildings, or places which are in the possession, custody, or control of military authorities and are material to defense preparation or are to be used by the government or were obtained from the accused. Additionally, any results or reports of physical or mental examinations, and of scientific tests or experiments which are material to the preparation of the defense or are to be used by the prosecution, must be revealed to the defense if requested. R.C.M. 701(a)(2).

5. Upon defense request, the trial counsel shall permit the defense to inspect written material that will be presented by the prosecution at the sentencing proceedings and notify the defense of the names and addresses of the witnesses the trial counsel intends to call at the sentencing proceedings. R.C.M. 701(a)(5).

6. R.C.M. 701(a)(6) requires the trial counsel to affirmatively disclose to the defense the existence of evidence which tends to negate or reduce the guilt of the accused of the offense charged or which would reduce the punishment. In addition, R.C.M.

703(f) entitles both parties to evidence which is relevant and necessary and, if that evidence is unavailable and "of such central importance to an issue that it is essential to a fair trial," allows relief if there is no "adequate substitute" for such evidence. In examining what type of evidence is essential to a fair trial, what the duties of the trial counsel are, and when the defense is entitled to relief, a look at appellate case law is essential.

a. In a line of cases beginning with Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83 (1963), the Federal courts began with the doctrine that due process required the prosecution to disclose to defense any evidence favorable to the accused. The Supreme Court later strengthened this doctrine to require the prosecutor to affirmatively disclose, whether requested or not, any evidence favorable to the accused if that evidence is reasonably likely to raise a reasonable doubt as to the accused's guilt. United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976). See also Kyles v. Whitley, 115 S.Ct. 1555 (1995). This doctrine has caused reversal of convictions, even in instances where the prosecutor was not personally aware of the evidence. See also United States v. Simmons, 38 M.J. 376 (C.M.A. 1993) (holding that R.C.M. 701 also imposes on trial counsel a duty to discover and disclose exculpatory evidence in possession of other military authorities, e.g., CID). See United States v. Sebring, 44 M.J. 805 (N.M.C.C.A. 1996) (trial counsel's duty to affirmatively seek out and discover evidence of quality control problems at drug lab). This concept has also been extended to impose a duty on the government to preserve and protect exculpatory evidence for the use of the accused. In United States v. Kern, 22 M.J. 49, 51 (C.M.A. 1986), the court applied this rule to the military stating: "The Government has a duty to use good faith and due diligence to preserve and protect evidence and make it available to an accused." These principles apparently do not apply to inculpatory evidence, only that which is obviously exculpatory. Additionally, the military courts, following the principles set forth by the Supreme Court in California v. Trombetta, 467 U.S. 479 (1984), have placed the burden of showing the exculpatory nature of the evidence on the defense. The Kern court stated "... where the evidence is not 'apparently' exculpatory, the burden is upon an accused to show that the evidence possessed an exculpatory value that was or should have been apparent to the Government before it was lost or destroyed and that he is unable to obtain comparable evidence by other reasonably available means." 22 M.J. at 51-52 (emphasis added). See also United States v. Garries, 22 M.J. 288 (C.M.A.) cert. denied, 479 U.S. 985 (1986); United States v. Meadows, 42 M.J. 132 (C.A.A.F. 1995); United States v. Hart, 29 M.J. 407 (C.M.A. 1990); United States v. Eshalomi, 23 M.J. 12 (C.M.A. 1986).

The language used by the Court of Military Appeals is similar enough in intent to the language of R.C.M. 703(f) to assume that the court will interpret that provision using the same guidelines set forth in Trombetta, Kern, and Garries. Hence, the trial counsel must ascertain what evidence is available and preserve that which is apparently exculpatory. Whether the prosecution intentionally suppresses exculpatory evidence or is negligent in doing so, the likelihood of reversal is great. See, e.g., United States v. Poole, 379 F.2d 645 (7th Cir. 1967) (failure to disclose report of doctor who had examined kidnapping victim and found no evidence of intercourse was error, even though defense relied upon theory of consent at trial). Reversal has also been required for nondisclosure of exculpatory evidence, even where due diligence by defense counsel would have revealed its existence. See, e.g., Levin v. Katzenbach, 363 F.2d 287 (D.C. Cir. 1966).

b. The courts have viewed the disclosure requirements as pertaining not only to direct evidence of innocence but to matters which might have helped the defense on the merits or sentencing had the defense known about them. See, e.g., Levin v. Katzenbach, supra (eyewitness' inability to recall whether certain transactions had taken place); United States v. Poole, supra (report of a doctor who examined the alleged kidnapping victim and stated there was no evidence of intercourse was viewed as exculpatory on appeal, even though trial defense counsel cross-examined and argued as though the defense theory was consent); Giglio v. United States, 405 U.S. 150 (1972); United States v. Romano, 46 M.J. 269 (1992) (evidence that government immunized witness claimed that fraternization never occurred is exculpatory and should have been disclosed. The findings were set aside. United States v. Stone, 40 M.J. 420 (C.M.A. 1994) (impeachment evidence of pending travel claim fraud investigation of Government witness); United States v. Simmons, 38 M.J. 376 (C.M.A. 1993) (contradictory statements of rape victim); and United States v. Reece, 25 M.J. 93 (C.M.A. 1987) (disclosure of matters affecting credibility of a witness). But see Moore v. Illinois, 408 U.S. 786 (1972) (unrevealed evidence must be material); United States v. Agurs, 427 U.S. 97 (1976) (a prosecutor doesn't violate the constitutional duty of disclosure unless the omission results in the denial of the defendant's right to a fair trial; but, if evidence favorable to the accused is reasonably likely to raise a reasonable doubt as to accused's guilt, government must disclose the evidence even in the absence of a defense request). Neither Brady nor Agurs created a constitutional right to general discovery in criminal cases, only a right to disclosure of exculpatory evidence. In Arizona v. Youngblood, 488 U.S. 51 (1988), the Court held that, unless a criminal defendant can show bad faith on the part of the police, failure to preserve potentially useful evidence does not constitute a denial of due process of law. Military discovery rules are broader than the constitution requires, however, and must always be complied with as well. See, e.g., United States v. Trimper, 28 M.J. 460 (C.M.A.) cert. denied, 493 U.S. 965 (1989) (case involving cocaine use by an Air Force JAG) in which the court held that R.C.M. 701(a)(2)(B) requires disclosure of nonexculpatory rebuttal evidence. Even though trial counsel did not intend to use the evidence in question in the government's case-in-chief, the materiality of the evidence required disclosure. But see United States v. Clark, 37 M.J. 1098 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993) (holding that sentencing rebuttal evidence need not be revealed). See also United States v. Rodriguez, 44 MJ 766 (N.M.C.C.A. 1996), (refusal of broadcast company (NBC) to turnover videotape of accused's arrest and apprehension).

c. In United States v. Webster, 1 M.J. 216 (C.M.A. 1975), the Court of Military Appeals held that a grant of immunity or promise of leniency must be reduced to writing and served on the accused within a reasonable time before the witness' testimony. Mil.R.Evid. 301(c)(2) codifies the results in the Webster case. Failure to serve the promise upon the defense may preclude the testimony, but a failure to object by the defense may amount to a waiver of the defect. United States v. Carroll, 4 M.J. 674 (N.C.M.R. 1977), aff'd, 4 M.J. 89 (C.M.A. 1977).

7. In addition to R.C.M. 701, there are a number of other rules (like Mil.R.Evid. 301(c)(2) discussed above) that address required disclosures. For example, Mil.R.Evid. 304(d)(1) requires government disclosure of all relevant statements of the accused, whether or not the government intends to use the statements in its case. For an unwary counsel, these additional rules can be potential pitfalls. See, e.g., United States v. Dancy, 38 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1993). For a valuable checklist of these other disclosure rules, see R.C.M. 701(a)(6) discussion (government disclosures) and R.C.M. 701(b)(5) discussion (defense disclosures).

8. Besides the discovery rights based in the military rules, the Court of Military Appeals has also recognized a right of discovery required by military due process. In United States v. Toledo, 15 M.J. 255 (C.M.A. 1983), the court reversed the trial judge's denial of a defense request for the government to produce testimony given in a prior Federal court trial by the informant, the government's key witness. The defense counsel had based his request solely on the Jencks Act, see para. G, infra, and it had been properly denied on those grounds. The Court of Military Appeals, however, after saying that the request was reasonable and the material relevant, held that military due process required that it be disclosed. The court cited the "liberal" provisions of Article 46, UCMJ. To preserve the issue, counsel should be sure to discuss the military due process aspects of a discovery request in addition to the other specific provisions which apply to any particular request.

9. Another issue closely related to defense discovery rights is the issue of defense rights to investigative and other expert assistance in preparing for trial. Generally the prosecution has automatic access to whatever assets and investigators it needs, while the defense has relatively few assets. In appropriate cases, where assistance is necessary, the defense may be able to compel the government to provide or fund the assistance. In United States v. Garries, 22 M.J. 288 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 985 (1986), the defense counsel sought to compel the government to pay for an independent investigator to assist the accused. Noting that the extensive defense discovery rights in military practice accomplish the same purpose as the Federal statute cited as authority for such funding, the Court of Military Appeals affirmed that the trial judge's denial of this request did not violate the accused's due process right to a fair trial. For the defense to obtain such expert assistance, an accused must show that expert assistance is both material and necessary to the case. See, e.g., United States v. Gonzalez, 39 M.J. 459 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 429 (1994); United States v. Kelly, 39 M.J. 235 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 115 S.Ct. 324 (1994); United States v. Robinson, 39 M.J. 88 (C.M.A. 1994); United States v. Mann, 30 M.J. 639 (N.M.C.M.R. 1990); United States v. True, 28 M.J. 1057 (N.M.C.M.R. 1989). After showing necessity, the accused will be entitled to expert assistance. However, this does not mean the accused is entitled to an expert of his own choosing. All that is required is that competent assistance be made available. United States v. Burnette, 29 M.J. 473 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 821 (1990).

D. Documents and evidence in possession of defense. R.C.M. 701(b), as amended in 1991, places broad discovery obligations on the defense. The information required to be disclosed includes:

1. Names of witnesses and statements. R.C.M. 701(b)(1) requires the defense to notify the government, before trial, of the names and addresses of witnesses, other than the accused, it intends to call in its case-in-chief, and to provide all signed or sworn statements made by these witnesses and known to the defense. The rule further requires the defense, upon request, to disclose the names and addresses of witnesses it intends to call on sentencing, and to allow the trial counsel to inspect written material the defense intends to present on sentencing.

2. Notice of certain defenses. R.C.M. 701(b)(2), requires notice before trial of intent to use the defense of alibi, innocent ingestion, or lack of mental responsibility, or intent to use an expert to discuss the accused's mental condition. With respect to alibi and innocent ingestion, the defense must also describe with particularity the circumstances creating the defense and the witnesses who will testify.

3. Reciprocal Discovery. R.C.M. 701(b)(3) and 701(b)(4) require that, if the defense has requested and received discovery of documents, tangible objects, and reports under R.C.M. 701(a)(2), upon request, the defense is required to give some reciprocal discovery to the government. But the defense is only required to reveal documents, tangible objects, and reports that it intends to offer at trial, or, in the case of reports, that were prepared by a witness the defense intends to call at trial.

E. Privileged information. R.C.M. 701(f) excludes from discovery any information which is not subject to disclosure under the Military Rules of Evidence, such as classified information (Mil.R.Evid. 505), see United States v. Pruner, 33 M.J. 272 (C.M.A. 1991), "government information" (Mil.R.Evid. 506), and an informant's identity (Mil.R.Evid. 507), see United States v. Coleman, 14 M.J. 1014 (A.C.M.R. 1982) ("tipster" vs. informant). Where the substantial rights of the accused are prejudiced by a refusal to disclose information, the charges may have to be dismissed. For more information on available privileges and how they are asserted and overcome, see Chapter VI, infra. See also Jencks v. United States, 353 U.S. 657 (1957); and para. G., infra.

F. Reasonable request. Discovery for some items must be preceded by a request. A broad request amounting to a "fishing expedition" may be regarded as unreasonable. United States v. Franchia, 13 C.M.A. 315, 32 C.M.R. 315 (1962) (relevance and reasonableness of request depend upon facts of each case). Discovery under R.C.M. 701 may be limited pursuant to the Military Rules of Evidence. R.C.M. 701(f). R.C.M. 701 is not intended to entitle defense counsel to matter which is the "work product" of trial counsel. See Hickman v. Taylor, 329 U.S. 495 (1947) (written statements of witnesses given to counsel subject to discovery under the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure upon showing of good cause; oral statements given to counsel, whether in form of memoranda or mental impressions, are "work product" and not subject to discovery); R.C.M. 701(f). But see United States v. Nobles, 422 U.S. 225 (1975) (Supreme Court applied the attorney work product doctrine to criminal cases but held that, when an investigator who was part of the defense team takes the stand to contrast his recollection of an interview with that of an opposing witness, the work product privilege is waived with respect to matters covered in the investigator's testimony) and United States v. Vanderwier, 25 M.J. 263 (C.M.A. 1987) (interview notes prepared by attorney or his representative are not automatically excluded from discovery by defense on basis that notes are work product).

G. The Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500 (1994). In Jencks v. United States, 353 U.S. 657 (1957), the Supreme Court held that a Federal criminal defendant was entitled to inspect pretrial statements of government witnesses without a showing that such statements were inconsistent with the witness' trial testimony. The Jencks decision was interpreted by some Federal courts to allow discovery before trial of statements of prospective government witnesses. In some instances, the government was required to allow discovery of its investigative files. Congress regarded these lower court interpretations of the Jencks decision as unwarranted, and passed legislation known as the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500.

The effect of the Jencks Act was to limit the defendant's right of discovery established by Jencks v. United States, supra. In pertinent part, the statute provides:

After a witness called by the United States has testified on direct examination, the court shall, on motion of the defendant, order the United States to produce any statement (as hereinafter defined) of the witness in the possession of the United States which relates to the subject matter as to which the witness has testified. If the entire contents of any such statement related to the subject matter of the testimony of the witness, the court shall order it to be delivered directly to the defendant for his examination and use. 18 U.S.C. § 3500(b)(1994).

The term "statement," as used in subsection (b) in relation to any witness called by the United States, means –

-1- a written statement made by said witness and signed or otherwise adopted or approved by him;

-2- a stenographic, mechanical, electrical, or other recording or a transcription thereof, which is a substantially verbatim recital of an oral statement made by said witness and recorded contemporaneously with the making of such oral statement. 18 U.S.C. § 3500(e) (1994).

1. The Court of Military Appeals has held that the Jencks Act applies to courts-martial. United States v. Albo, 22 C.M.A. 30, 46 C.M.R. 30 (1972); United States v. Jones, 20 M.J. 919 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985). In light of the more recent R.C.M. 701 provisions discussed above, the Jencks Act may often overlap with pretrial discovery and become superfluous. However, a broader version of the Jencks Act concept has been written into the manual as R.C.M. 914. This rule allows the prosecution (as well as the defense) to request statements of any witness other than the accused who has testified. In the event that witness statements have not been previously provided under R.C.M. 701, R.C.M. 914 and the Jencks Act provide an alternative means of obtaining them. The R.C.M. 914 definition of "statement" is also somewhat broader than the R.C.M. 701 definition, and this distinction may also lead to different production under the two rules. See para. G.2., infra. Additionally, R.C.M. 914 and the Jencks Act allow discovery of witness statements possessed by the United States, as distinguished from statements in the hands of trial counsel or military authorities. See R.C.M. 701. See also Mil.R.Evid. 612.

2. The definition of "statement" in the Jencks Act includes a wide variety of matter. It includes not only the written statements signed by a witness, but also the typed signed reports and case activity notes of investigative agents. See United States v. Albo, supra, and United States v. Pena, 22 M.J. 281 (C.M.A. 1986) cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1030 (1987). Photographs can be included if they constitute part of the statement by the witness, Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968); however, a composite drawing made from a witness' statement has been held not to be a statement within the meaning of the Jencks Act. United States v. Zurita, 369 F.2d 474 (7th Cir. 1966), cert. denied, 386 U.S. 1023 (1967). In United States v. Jarrie, 5 M.J. 193 (C.M.A. 1978), the court held that secondhand statements adopted by the witness fall within the scope of the act. The "statement" in that case was the notes taken by the military investigator during a conversation with an informant that were seen and verified by the informant two weeks later. Accord United States v. Dixon, 8 M.J. 149 (C.M.A. 1979) and United States v. Holmes, 25 M.J. 674 (A.F.C.M.R. 1987). In United States v. Gomez, 15 M.J. 954 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, sub nom. United States v. Kamyal, 17 M.J. 22 (C.M.A. 1983), rough notes taken by a military police dispatcher of a telephone request for assistance from a witness were held not to constitute a "statement" within the purview of the Jencks Act, but instead were merely a part of the administrative and general recordkeeping practice. The tape recordings of witness testimony at article 32 investigations are the proper subject of Jencks Act motions. See United States v. Strand, 17 M.J. 839 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984). However, the Coast Guard Court of Military Review has indicated there is no duty to make a recording at the article 32 investigation, only to provide it to the defense if one was made. See United States v. Giusti, 22 M.J. 733 (C.G.C.M.R. 1986).

The definition of "statement" in subsection (e) of the Jencks Act includes matter that might properly be objected to as "work product" under discovery provisions of R.C.M. 701. There is no work product exception under the Jencks Act and, if a statement taken or recorded by government counsel falls within the definition of the Act, it must be produced. United States v. Hilbrich, 341 F.2d 555 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 381 U.S. 941, (1965); Saunders v. United States, 316 F.2d 346, appeal after remand, 323 F.2d 628

(D.C. Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 377 U.S. 935 (1964); United States v. Smaldone, 484 F.2d 311 (10th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 915 (1974). Additionally, in Goldberg v. United States, 425 U.S. 94 (1976), a writing prepared by a government lawyer relating to the subject matter of testimony of a government witness that had been signed or otherwise adopted or approved by the government witness was held to be producible under the Jencks Act. The court noted that such a writing was not rendered nonproducing merely because a government lawyer interviewed the witness and wrote the statement.

3. If the government, in response to a defense demand, maintains that there are portions of the statement which do not relate to the testimony of the witness, the judge must require that the statement in question be submitted for an in camera examination. If the judge determines that any portion of the statement does not relate to the testimony, it shall be excised, and the remainder delivered to the defense. Excised portions of the statement must be preserved for appeal. See 18 U.S.C. § 3500(c) (1994) and United States v. Dixon, 8 M.J. 149 (C.M.A. 1979).

4. Classified material. In Campbell v. United States, 365 U.S. 85 (1961), the Court placed the duty on the trial judge to administer the Jencks Act "in such way as can best secure relevant and available evidence necessary to decide between the directly opposed interests protected by the statute." Id. at 95. The Court found erroneous the trial judge's ruling that placed the burden upon the defendant to produce evidence to support his position. If the military judge orders production of a statement under the Jencks Act, and the government refuses on the basis that the material is classified and not producible under Mil.R.Evid. 505, the military judge may recess the trial and require the government to choose among (1) foregoing prosecution; (2) not using the testimony to which the classified material relates; or (3) devising a system under which the statement may be seen by the defense. See United States v. Gagnon, 21 C.M.A. 158, 44 C.M.R. 212 (1972); De Champlain v. McLucas, 367 F. Supp. 1291 (D.D.C. 1973); Mil.R.Evid. 505.

5. When requested Jencks Act material is unavailable, what is the remedy? Normally, the military judge may grant a continuance to attempt to produce the evidence, or may exclude the witness' testimony or grant a dismissal. But the military judge need not grant relief at all unless the government has intentionally withheld or destroyed evidence in an effort to frustrate the defense. United States v. Killian, 368 U.S. 231 (1961). See United States v. Marsh, 21 M.J. 445 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1016 (1986). This "good faith" exception excuses the inadvertent destruction of material. A major problem often arises in determining whether the good faith exception applies. The Court of Military Appeals, in United States v. Jarrie, 5 M.J. 193 (C.M.A. 1978), recognized such an exception but construed it narrowly, holding that it was inapplicable where the government failed to show that the discoverable material was destroyed prior to contemplation of prosecution. As a practical matter, usually the last thing the defense actually wants is production of the discoverable statement. Failure to produce, it is hoped, will lead to exclusion of the witness' testimony and subsequent failure of the charge. Hence, the government must try to bring itself within a good faith exception when discoverable material has been destroyed.

The trend has been for the military courts to expand upon the Jarrie "good faith" exception. See, e.g., United States v. Pena, 22 M.J. 281 (C.M.A. 1986); United States v. Marsh, 21 M.J. 445 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1016 (1986); United States v. Roxas, 41 M.J. 727 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. 1994); United States v. Strand, 21 M.J. 912 (N.M.C.M.R.), petition denied, 22 M.J. 367 (C.M.A. 1986); United States v. Derrick, 21 M.J. 903 (N.M.C.M.R. 1986); United States v. Jones, 20 M.J. 919 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985); United States v. Price, 15 M.J. 628 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982); United States v. Boyd, 14 M.J. 703 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 15 M.J. 279 (C.M.A. 1983); United States v. Bosier, 12 M.J. 1010 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 13 M.J. 480 (C.M.A. 1982). But see United States v. Kilmon, 10 M.J. 543 (N.C.M.R. 1980). Consequently, merely because material discoverable under the Jencks Act has been lost or destroyed does not mean that the prosecution has no recourse. The government should attempt to show lack of bad faith in the loss, and produce testimony as to the contents of the lost statements, to show lack of prejudice to the accused.

H. Depositions. See generally Art. 49, UCMJ; R.C.M. 702; and chapter XIV, infra. R.C.M. 702 provides that oral or written depositions may be taken to preserve the testimony of a witness who may not be available for trial. But, since Article 49, UCMJ, and R.C.M. 702 indicate that the convening authority may deny a request for a deposition only for "good cause," circumstances may exist where the defense counsel is entitled to use a deposition for discovery purposes. The term "good cause" has not as yet been judicially defined by military cases. It may be that, where a deposition is the only means by which defense counsel is able to interview a government witness, good cause may not exist for its denial. See, e.g., United States v. Killebrew, 9 M.J. 154, 161 (C.M.A. 1980). For example, assume that a witness claims he is unable to make any arrangements for an interview before trial. Only by the subpoena power afforded by a deposition can defense counsel have an opportunity to interview this witness. This use of depositions for discovery purposes is discussed in United States v. Chestnut, 2 M.J. 84, 85 (C.M.A. 1976). The Court of Military Appeals considered the trial judge's denial of a defense continuance for a deposition to be inconsistent with the broad discovery concepts within the military judicial system. The witness was "unavailable" for the article 32 investigation so the defense requested a deposition. The denial of a motion for continuance to depose the witness required reversal. But see Fed. R. Crim. P. 15 Advisory Committee notes, which provide that the principal reason for depositions under the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure is to preserve evidence for use at trial and not to provide a basis for discovery.

Merely because a deposition is taken does not mean it will be admissible in court. See Chapter VIII, infra, on the hearsay issues involved, and Chapter XIV, infra, on the Confrontation issues involved. See also Chapter XI, infra, on the more permissive rules applicable in sentencing hearings.

CHAPTER III

THE MILITARY RULES OF EVIDENCE

0301 INTRODUCTION. On 12 March 1980, President Carter signed Executive Order No. 12198, promulgating the Military Rules of Evidence. Executive Order No. 12233, of 1 September 1980, made some clarifying and technical amendments to the rules and they became effective on that date. With minor changes, the rules were incorporated into the Manual for Courts-Martial (MCM) which became effective 1 August 1984. The rules alter the nature of trial practice and substantially change the rule of criminal procedure, as well as limiting the nature and quantity of evidence admissible before a court-martial. Perhaps equally important is the significant change in approach symbolized by the Military Rules of Evidence. Following Article 36, Uniform Code of Military Justice, the rules adopt civilian Federal practice unless it would not be practicable or would be "contrary to or inconsistent with" the UCMJ. On 27 May 1998, President Clinton signed Executive Order (EO) 13086 amending the MCM, United States (1995 Edition), which automatically adopts any amendments to the Federal rules of Evidence (FRE) 18 months after their effective date, unless the President takes action to the contrary. Mil.R.Evid. 1102. (Accordingly, Mil.R.Evid. 704 was modified on 10 April 1985, but the original rule was subsequently restored and remains different from Fed.R.Evid. 704.) Thus, the rules are designed to show conformity with civilian Federal practice—a conformity that should keep military practice current.

This chapter takes a brief look at the history of the Military Rules of Evidence [hereinafter Mil.R.Evid.] and provides an overview of these rules and their impact upon military practice. It also discusses the general and miscellaneous rules under Sections I and XI, Mil.R.Evid.

0302 HISTORY

A. Drafting the rules. The Military Rules of Evidence were initially drafted by a special committee of the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice Working Group, and subsequently reviewed and modified by the Joint Service Committee on Military Justice. The Joint Service Committee is an interservice body composed of the chiefs of the criminal law divisions of the Army, Air Force, Coast Guard, Navy, and Marine Corps, and a representative of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. The working group that drafted the Military Rules of Evidence was composed of two representatives from the staff of the Court of Military Appeals (later renamed the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces), and one representative each from the Army, Navy, Air Force, Coast Guard, and the Office of the General Counsel of the Department of Defense. The Code Committee, Uniform Code of Military Justice, Article 67(g) (now article 146), reviewed those matters under the proposed rules which involved interservice conflicts, except with regard to Section III of the rules which the judges of the Court of Military Appeals, chose not to review. The final draft of the rules was forwarded through the General Counsel of the Department of Defense to the Office of Management and Budget, which circulated the rules to the Department of Justice and other agencies, and finally forwarded them to the President via the White House Counsel's Office.

1.     In order to assist counsel in the field, the drafters of the rules provided a detailed analysis of the new rules. This analysis was promulgated as Manual for Courts-Martial, 1969 (Rev.), app. 18, and is included as appendix 22 of the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1984. The analysis presents the intent of the drafting committee, seeks to indicate the source of the various changes, and generally notes when substantial changes to military law result from the amendments. It clarifies a number of the rules with examples and occasionally suggests possible trial practice considerations. It can be a great help to the trial practitioner and should be consulted as a persuasive source for interpretation of the Military Rules of Evidence.

2.     There are several limitations to the analysis, however.

a.     The analysis is not binding, as it is not part of the Executive Order promulgating the Mil.R.Evid., nor does it constitute or represent any official view of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces or any of the executive departments concerned with the drafting of the Mil.R.Evid.

b.     The analysis makes frequent reference to "the present Manual," meaning the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1969 (Rev.) [hereinafter MCM, 1969 (Rev.)], as it existed prior to 1 September 1980. Most trial advocates in the field will not have access to copies of the now-superseded MCM, 1969 (Rev.). The comparisons to, and analysis of, these MCM, 1969 (Rev.) paragraphs will be of limited usefulness to a majority of the judge advocate community for this reason.

c.     In a number of situations, the analysis does not resolve known uncertainties in a rule. In other cases, the analysis apparently conflicts with the rules. These instances will be pointed out in the appropriate chapters of this text.

C.     *Later revisions. There have been modifications to the Mil.R.Evid. Additional analysis accompanies all modifications and is added to appendix 22 of MCM, 1984 (Rev.).

0303      OVERVIEW

A.      General. Until the adoption of the Military Rules of Evidence, the evidentiary rules for courts-martial were primarily "cook-book" type discussions similar to the remainder of the MCM, 1969 (Rev.). In place of this, the Mil.R.Evid. is a body of black-letter rules which the drafters believed to be clearer than the previous MCM, 1969 (Rev.) provisions and more susceptible to use by non-lawyers. At the same time, the rules modernize military law and will hopefully make practice before courts-martial simpler and more efficient. Lederer, The Military Rules of Evidence: An Overview, 12 The Advocate 113 (1980).

B.      Similarity to the Federal Rules of Evidence. Sections I-II, IV, and VI-XI of the Mil.R.Evid. adopt the Federal Rules of Evidence [hereinafter Fed.R.Evid.] with little change, except when modification of the Federal rule was required to ensure compliance with the UCMJ or to ensure practicality within the military setting. (The term "section" was used rather than "article," as in the Fed.R.Evid., because the drafters were concerned that confusion with articles of the UCMJ might result.) For a general, tabular comparison of the Federal and Military Rules of Evidence, see page 3-22, infra.

C.      New sections under the Mil.R.Evid. Sections III and V represent significant departures from the corresponding articles of the Federal Rules of Evidence.

1.      Section III replaces those Federal evidentiary rules dealing with presumptions in civil matters with a partial codification of the law relating to self-incrimination, confessions and admissions, search and seizure, and eyewitness identification. (For a discussion of specific rules in these areas, see chapters XII, XIII, and XIV, respectively, infra.)

a.      Section III represents a balance between complete codification—the approach best suited for situations involving non-lawyers—and flexibility, which is generally permitted only when dealing with matters within the province of lawyers. Section III was expressly intended to serve the needs of the numerous non-lawyer, commanders, legal officers, and law enforcement personnel who play important roles in the administration of military justice.

b.      The Section III rules provide a combination of both procedural and evidentiary prescriptions. Since they affect conduct outside of the traditional trial arena, some might argue (and have argued) that there is a question whether these rules are properly within the confines of the President's Article 36 powers. See United States v. Frederick, 3 M.J. 230 (C.M.A. 1977) (it is outside the President's authority to promulgate matters affecting substantive law such as the standard for mental responsibility). The drafters' analysis is silent on this point. Although there has been no litigation in this area, it is likely that the rules would be upheld since, although the Mil.R.Evid. are plainly designed in part to affect out-of-court behavior, they are written so as to focus on evidence, trials, and the creation of evidence.

c. There is no treatment of presumptions (found in Article III of the Fed.R.Evid.) in the Military Rules of Evidence.

2. Section V prescribes a body of privileges law derived primarily from the MCM, 1969 (Rev.) and the Federal Rules of Evidence dealing with privileges. This section of the Mil.R.Evid. follows Federal Rule 501 to the extent that it recognizes Federal common law, but it also provides for eight specific privileges in Section V—with additional self-incrimination privileges in Section III.

D. Intent to follow the Fed.R.Evid. As previously mentioned, it is the explicit intent of the President and the drafters of the Military Rules of Evidence that the court-martial evidentiary rules will never again be allowed to proceed independently of civilian Federal law. This intent is evidenced in several ways.

1. The title itself, according to the drafters, is intended to make it clear that "military evidentiary law should echo the civilian federal law to the extent practicable," but should reflect the "unique and critical reasons" behind a separate military justice system. See Mil.R.Evid. 1103 drafters' analysis, Manual for Courts-Martial, 1984, app. 22 [hereinafter MCM, 1984, app. ____].

2. Under pre-Mil.R.Evid. procedures, to change an evidentiary rule, the President had to authorize the change and then promulgate it by Executive Order. Military Rule of Evidence 1102 allows for automatic incorporation of amendments so that the military rules can continue to track the Federal Rules where practicable.

a. Amendments to the Federal Rules of Evidence automatically apply to the military 18 months after the effective date of the Fed.R.Evid. amendment, unless:

(1) The President directs earlier or later application; or

(2) the President affirmatively directs that any such amendment not apply, in whole or part, to the military. Mil.R.Evid. 1102.

b. The automatic adoption date of amendments is 18 months after the effective date of the Federal rule amendment, not the date that the amendment is proposed by the Supreme Court.

c. In the first potential case of amendment of the Mil.R.Evid., the President chose to take affirmative action to prevent the automatic amendment. Executive Order No. 12,306, of 1 June 1981, amending Mil.R.Evid. 410.

d. Mil.R.Evid. 704 was modified on 10 April 1985, pursuant to the automatic amendment provision of Mil.R.Evid. 1102, but the original rule was restored subsequently and remains different than Fed.R.Evid. 704.

e. Mil.R.Evid. 413 and 414 came into effect through use of MRE 1102's automatic amendment provision.

0304 PURPOSE AND CONSTRUCTION. Mil.R.Evid. 102.

A. General. In case there was ever any doubt as to what a court-martial proceeding should be about, or how it should be conducted, Mil.R.Evid. 102 appears to settle the matter. Without mincing words, this provision mandates that courts-martial are tools of justice, not merely disciplinary proceedings—that they should foster the growth and development of the law and facilitate ascertaining the truth of the issues at bar.

B. Statement of philosophy. Mil.R.Evid. 102 is a statement of philosophy taken verbatim from Fed.R.Evid. 102 and, as an "aspirational rule," is without precedent in military practice. It provides six guidelines which should be considered in construing the Military Rules of Evidence:

1. Securing fairness in the administration of justice;
2. eliminating unjustifiable expense;
3. eliminating unjustifiable delay;
4. promoting the growth and development of the law;
5. enhancing the ascertainment of truth; and
6. justly determining the guilt or innocence of an accused.

C. Balancing requirements. Counsel using these guidelines in argument will be able to advocate the usual countervailing considerations and balancing requirements for determining evidentiary issues at trial. When is the time and expense of obtaining and admitting evidence "unjustifiable," and when is it necessary for "ascertainment of the truth"? When will the admission of additional evidence on an issue interfere with the "just determination" of guilt or innocence, or when is it advisable to depart from the well-trod path of precedent in order to "promote the growth and development" of the law? Essentially, this rule provides a wealth of material for argument by counsel.

D. Aid in application. Mil.R.Evid. 102 is not an independent source of authority nor a license for counsel and military judge to ignore the remaining rules and fashion their own concepts of law. The language of the rule is clear that it is intended only to aid in the legitimate application of specific rules under the Mil.R.Evid. The case can be validly made that Mil.R.Evid. 102 must also be considered in construing secondary sources under Mil.R.Evid. 101(b) and in applying the traditional concept of "military due process."

0305 SCOPE AND APPLICABILITY OF THE RULES. Mil.R.Evid. 101, 1101, and 104(a).

A. Applicability. Mil.R.Evid. 101(a) is a deceptively simple statement of the extent of application of the Military Rules of Evidence. It is taken generally from Federal Rule of Evidence 101. Essentially, it states that the military rules apply in all courts-martial, including summary courts-martial. This should not be taken at full face value, however, since Mil.R.Evid. 101 must be read together with Mil.R.Evid. 1101 (as explicitly stated in Mil.R.Evid. 101) and (implicitly) with Mil.R.Evid. 104(a). For example, Mil.R.Evid. 1101(c) recognizes the relaxation of the rules during the sentencing proceedings of courts-martial, while Mil.R.Evid. 104(a) qualifies Mil.R.Evid. 101(a)'s broad application by indicating that most preliminary questions heard at article 39(a) sessions and many evidentiary rulings will not be strictly governed by the Mil.R.Evid. Interestingly, the reason given by the Fed.R.Evid. advisory committee for leaving questions of detail out of the initial scope statement is "a simple one: not to discourage the reader of the rules by confronting him at the outset with a rule filled with minute detail." J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence 101-2 (1981).

1. The applicability of the rules to summary courts-martial is emphasized by the inclusion of subsection (c) in Mil.R.Evid. 101. This "rule of construction" makes it clear that when the rules use the term "military judge," the term is intended to include a summary court-martial officer and the president of a special court-martial sitting without a military judge. Where the application of the rules in a summary court-martial or a special court-martial without military judge is different from their application in the traditional court-martial with military judge, specific reference and explanation is given in the individual rule.

2. The application of the rules to summary courts-martial is not a change in military practice, as the previous evidentiary provisions of the MCM, 1969 (Rev.) were similarly applicable to all courts-martial. However, some concern has been expressed that the change from the "cookbook approach" to the tersely worded rule approach of the Mil.R.Evid. might cause difficulties for the non-lawyer summary court officer. See, e.g., S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi & D. Schlueter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual, 6 (3d ed. 1991) [hereinafter Military Rules of Evidence Manual].

B. Proceedings at which applicable. Mil.R.Evid. 1101 (a) makes a further statement about the applicability of the rules to all courts-martial, except as otherwise provided in the Manual for Courts-Martial. E.g., Mil.R. Evid. 104(a). Mil.R.Evid. 1101(a) repeats the statement that the rules apply to summary courts-martial and further emphasizes that the rules apply generally at all issue-determinant portions of court-martial practice including:

1. Article 39(a) sessions;
2. limited fact-finding proceedings ordered on review (often called DuBay hearings. See United States v. DuBay, 17 C.M.A. 147, 37 C.M.R. 411 (1967); R.C.M. 1102, MCM, 1984 [hereinafter R.C.M. ____]);
3. proceedings in revision; and
4. contempt proceedings, except where the military judge may act summarily.

C. Proceedings at which not applicable. Mil.R.Evid. 1101(d) enumerates proceedings at which the rules are not applicable, including:

1. Pretrial investigations under Article 32, UCMJ;
2. vacation of suspended sentence hearings under Article 72, UCMJ;
3. requests for search authorizations (chapter XIII, infra has a detailed discussion of the applicable procedures for search authorizations);
4. proceedings involving pretrial restraint (initial review officer's hearings);
5. any other proceedings authorized under the UCMJ or MCM and not included in Mil.R.Evid. 1101(a) (e.g., courts of inquiry and nonjudicial punishment).

Although the rules in general are inapplicable to these proceedings, those rules with respect to privileges and Mil.R.Evid. 412 are applicable, as emphasized by the parenthetical note in Mil.R.Evid. 1101(d). See also the discussion of Mil.R.Evid. 1101(b), infra.

D. Applicability of the rules of privilege. Mil.R.Evid. 1101(b) makes it clear that the privileges provided for in Sections III and V of the Military Rules of Evidence "apply at all stages of all actions, cases, and proceedings." (Emphasis added.) This is particularly important, since the benefits of a privilege are substantially lost once the privilege is violated and cannot be significantly recovered by application of an exclusionary rule or limiting instruction. Accordingly, notwithstanding the comment in the drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 101 that the rules are "inapplicable to proceedings conducted pursuant to Article 15 of the Uniform Code of Military Justice," it seems appropriate to read Mil.R.Evid. 1101(b) and (d) as providing that privileges recognized under the Mil.R.Evid. must be honored at captain's mast or office hours. Cf. Mil.R.Evid. 101 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22. Furthermore, Part V, paragraph 4c(3), MCM, 1984, specifically requires application of privilege rules at non-judicial punishment.

E. Relaxation of the rules. During the sentencing portion of a court-martial, it has been traditional military practice to allow a relaxation of evidentiary rules. Mil.R.Evid. 1101(c) continues this practice by allowing that the rules, although still applicable, may be relaxed in sentencing proceedings and cites R.C.M. 1001.

1. R.C.M. 1001(b)(4)—evidence in aggravation. Allows the use of depositions, except in capital cases.

2. R.C.M. 1001(c)(3)—extenuation and mitigation (E&M). This is the area where the rules have traditionally been relaxed with regard to letters, affidavits, certificates of civil or military officers, and other writings of similar authenticity and reliability. This is discussed in detail in chapter XI, infra.

3. R.C.M. 1001(d)—rebuttal and surrebuttal.

The extent of relaxation of the rules is within the sound discretion of the military judge and not mandatory, but judges are traditionally fairly liberal in allowing any reliable evidence to be used since they do not have the benefit of a presentencing report as do their Federal court brethren.

Mil.R.Evid. 1101(c) also allows for the possible relaxation of the rules in additional areas and recognizes that the remainder of the Manual for Courts-Martial may impact on the Mil.R.Evid.

One of these additional relaxations of the rules is hidden in Mil.R.Evid. 405(c). This rule relaxes the normal rules by allowing the defense counsel to use affidavits or other written statements of persons other than the accused to prove the accused's character. If the defense uses any of these types of statements, the prosecution may also use similar types of statements in rebuttal. Since the use of this rule can only be initiated by the accused, there appears to be no sixth amendment confrontation problem with it. This is a limited relaxation since the written statements are admissible "only if, aside from being contained in an affidavit or other written statement, [they] would otherwise be admissible under [the] rules." (Emphasis added.) Mil.R.Evid. 405(c).

F. Determination of preliminary questions. As noted above, Mil.R.Evid. 104(a) qualifies the broad statements of Mil.R.Evid. 101(a) and 1101(a) as to the applicability of the rules. During hearings before the military judge on "preliminary questions," the judge is not bound to apply the exclusionary law of evidence, except with respect to privileges. Therefore, the judge may hear any relevant evidence, including affidavits or other hearsay.

1. The rule lists five particular issues which are strictly within the military judge's function to decide:

- a. The qualification of a person to be a witness (see Mil.R.Evid. 601-602);
- b. the existence of a privilege (see Sections III and V, Mil.R.Evid.);
- c. the admissibility of evidence (see Sections III, IV, VI, VIII-X, Mil.R.Evid.);
- d. whether a continuance should be granted; and
- e. the availability of a witness.

2. The drafters' analysis states that there is a significant and unresolved issue concerning whether the rules of evidence shall be applicable to the determination of evidentiary issues involving constitutional or statutory issues. The drafters suggest that Mil.R.Evid. 104(a) is constitutional in providing that the rules of evidence need not apply in determining constitutional issues. MCM, 1984, app. 22. This appears to be the prevailing practice in Federal courts and should be held to be permissible in courts-martial. See, e.g., United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164 (1974); United States v. Haldeman, 559 F.2d 31 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (hearsay evidence admissible at suppression hearing), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 933 (1977).

3. In some situations it may even be necessary for the military judge to breach a privilege in order to see if that privilege exists. See, e.g., Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604 (1953) (determination of whether spousal privilege existed).

4. Although the military judge "is not bound by the rules" except with respect to privileges, there is nothing wrong with requesting the judge to apply the rules in appropriate situations.

0306 LITIGATION OF PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS. Mil.R.Evid. 104.

A. General. Under Mil.R.Evid. 104(a), the role of the military judge and the applicability of the Mil.R.Evid. in determining preliminary questions has been discussed in paragraph 0305 F., supra. The remaining subsections of Mil.R.Evid. 104 provide guidance on the procedural aspects of litigating preliminary questions.

B. Relevancy conditioned on fact. Mil.R.Evid. 104(b). Only relevant evidence is admissible. See Mil.R.Evid. 402. In some situations, the relevancy of an item of evidence may depend upon the existence of a particular preliminary fact. See chapter V, infra.

1. Under the Fed.R.Evid., if the judge believes the proponent has established or will establish the preliminary fact to the satisfaction of a reasonable juror, the matter is submitted to the jury subject to instructions to disregard the evidence if they find against the existence of that preliminary fact. J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, footnote 104-54 (1988). Under the Mil.R.Evid., language has been added to Fed.R.Evid. 104(b) to make it clear that in military practice the judge alone determines whether evidence is relevant and whether there is sufficient factual basis to allow evidence to come before the court members. The rule allows for an exception to the judge's sole responsibility where the rules or the Manual for Courts-Martial provide expressly to the contrary, and Mil.R.Evid. 1008 is the only apparent exception at present.

a. In ruling on relevancy objections, the military judge might admit evidence contingent upon other evidence being admitted later and then strike the initially admitted evidence if the other evidence fails to show its relevancy (with appropriate instructions to the members to disregard). Alternatively, the judge might require counsel to demonstrate at an article 39(a) session that the relevancy could be shown before admitting any of the evidence. The order of proof is strictly within the discretion of the military judge. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

b. The Military Rules of Evidence Manual, supra, at 56-57, offers an insightful analysis of the questions a military judge should consider in ruling under Mil.R.Evid. 104(b).

2. Like many of the other Military Rules of Evidence, Mil.R.Evid. 104(b) cannot be considered in a vacuum. Some of the rules which specifically relate to the concept of Mil.R.Evid. 104(b) are Mil.R.Evid. 602, 901(a), and 1008 (dealing with personal knowledge of a witness, authentication, and the admissibility of other evidence of contents of writings, respectively).

3. Mil.R.Evid. 104(e) should also be considered, as it provides an alternative for counsel who have lost a conditional relevancy issue or any other preliminary issue, for that matter. This provision states that nothing in Mil.R.Evid. 104 prevents counsel from introducing evidence before members that would challenge the weight to be given admitted evidence and the credibility of witnesses. This is a reminder that the military judge's decision to admit evidence does not mean that the evidence must be believed by the members.

C. Hearing of members. Mil.R.Evid. 104(c). This subsection discusses the circumstances under which members are excluded from hearings in preliminary matters.

– In a trial with members, Mil.R.Evid. 104(c) requires that the members be excluded under two situations:

a. During litigation under Mil.R.Evid. 301-306 on the admissibility of statements of the accused; and

b. when the accused is a witness on any preliminary question, if the accused so requests.

In any other situation, exclusion of the members is permissive and within the sound discretion of the military judge "when the interests of justice require." Mil.R.Evid. 104(c). In light of traditional military practice, Article 39(a), UCMJ and the R.C.M. 803 discussion, and considering that the judge has sole responsibility for preliminary question determination, it is hard to envision a situation where the members will not be excluded. If the military judge should fail to call for article 39(a) sessions sua sponte, either counsel should be prepared to explicitly request them, if necessary.

D. Testimony by the accused. Mil.R.Evid. 104(d). This section of Rule 104 is designed to encourage the accused's participation in the litigation of preliminary matters and thus improve the fact-finding process. If the accused decides to testify on a preliminary matter, he or she is not subject to cross-examination concerning any other issue in the case.

1. Nothing in this rule deals with subsequent use of testimony given by an accused at a hearing on a preliminary question. For example, can the accused's limited purpose testimony be used against him on the merits? The Military Rules of Evidence Manual, supra at 59, advances the opinion that it cannot, but this is still an open question.

2. Mil.R.Evid. 304(f), 311(f), and 321(e) deal with preliminary question testimony of the accused in specific circumstances and should be consulted and cited by counsel when applicable (motions to suppress accused's statements, results of search and seizure, and eyewitness identification, respectively). These rules strictly forbid any use of the accused's limited purpose testimony except in a later prosecution for perjury, false swearing, or false official statement.

0307 RULING ON EVIDENCE. Mil.R.Evid. 103.

A. General. Perhaps more than any other evidentiary provision contained in the Military Rules of Evidence, Mil.R.Evid. 103 provides for a new approach and philosophy towards courts-martial practice. Prior to the Mil.R.Evid., the Court of Military Appeals had adopted paternalistic tendencies towards defense counsel and had been prone to allow appellate defense counsel to raise allegations having no foundation in the record of trial. See, e.g., United States v. Reagan, 7 M.J. 490 (C.M.A. 1979). Under Mil.R.Evid. 103, counsel have greater responsibility for raising and preserving issues and can no longer afford to sit back and count on the courts to save them, except possibly to save their clients from the truly incompetent counsel.

B. Materially prejudicial error. Mil.R.Evid. 103(a) states that no error may be found on appeal unless that error "materially prejudices a substantial right of a party." (i.e., the accused.) Surprisingly, this language has existed for as long as Article 59(a), UCMJ and, for a few years prior to implementation of the Mil.R.Evid., had been rather routinely ignored by the Court of Military Appeals. Rule 103 changes this, stating that error alone will not justify relief on appeal, unless the accused in some very specific manner has first suffered material prejudice to a substantial right. The standard for reviewing alleged prejudicial errors varies depending on the type of error alleged. If the error is of constitutional dimension, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has followed the decision of Chapman v. California, 386 U.S. 18 (1967), which requires reversal unless the error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. See United States v. Bins, 43 M.J. 79 (C.A.A.F. 1995). Mil.R.Evid. 103(a) specifies constitutional errors as an exception to the "materially prejudices" standard, although they could be interpreted as materially prejudicial per se (absent a showing of harmlessness beyond a reasonable doubt). See also United States v. Owens, 21 M.J. 117 (C.M.A. 1985); United States v. Jones, 33 M.J. 1040 (N.M.C.M.R. 1991). If the error is non-constitutional, the court has applied the rule of Kotteakos v. United States, 328 U.S. 750 (1946), which requires reversal only if the error had a substantial influence on the findings. See United States v. Barnes, 8 M.J. 115 (C.M.A. 1979). The Mil.R.Evid. 103(a) "materially prejudices a substantial right" language reiterates, and perhaps even strengthens, this standard in favor of the government. See, e.g., United States v. Wirth, 18 M.J. 214 (C.M.A. 1984). See generally, Steven A. Childress & Martha S. Davis, Federal Standards of Review (2d ed. 1992) (considered the authoritative publication on this topic).

C. Objection. Mil.R.Evid. 103(a)(1) requires a timely and specific objection or motion to strike to preserve an error admitting evidence. The objection or motion to strike must identify the evidence objected to and the grounds for the objection, unless this is obvious in the context of the case.

1. Timeliness. A "timely" objection normally means one made at the earliest possible opportunity, before a witness has had a chance to answer an objectionable question, or at the time that objectionable physical evidence is offered to the military judge

a. In United States v. Lockhart, 11 M.J. 603 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 11 M.J. 466 (C.M.A. 1981), defense counsel failed to make a timely objection when the government offered his client's admissions. Instead, after the government rested, defense counsel moved for a finding of not guilty, contending that the government had failed to establish the admissions' voluntariness. The court found the claim to be untimely, holding that "[f]ailure to object at the time the admission was offered in evidence constituted a waiver." Id. at 604. See generally Mil.R.Evid. 304(d) and Chapter XII, infra, on objection to confessions and admissions.

b. In United States v. Thomas, 11 M.J. 388 (C.M.A. 1981) (pre-Mil.R.Evid.), defense counsel sought to exclude certain evidence by a motion in limine. The military judge refused to hear the matter at that time, but informed counsel that he could raise the issue at trial. However, defense counsel failed to object when the evidence was later offered and admitted. As a result, the Court of Military Appeals held that counsel waived any objection and prohibited appellate defense counsel from litigating the issue. But see United States v. Gamble, 27 M.J. 298 (C.M.A. 1988) (military judge made a final ruling on a motion in limine obviating the need for a second defense objection at the time the evidence was eventually introduced).

c. Contrast Thomas with United States v. Burrell, 15 M.J. 259 (C.M.A. 1983), where error was not waived even absent a specific defense objection. In Burrell, the military judge gave a constitutionally deficient instruction on reasonable doubt (using the words "unwilling to act" vice "hesitate to act"). Defense counsel failed to object to the improper instruction, but had submitted a constitutionally sufficient instruction to the military judge. The military judge did not give the instruction submitted by the defense counsel. The court held that the act of submitting the proposed instruction preserved the error on appeal, even though no specific objection was made to the constitutionally deficient instruction given by the military judge.

d. In United States v. Cofield, 11 M.J. 422 (C.M.A. 1981), the court urged the use of in limine motions to resolve issues where appropriate. While recognizing that in limine resolutions are discretionary with the military judge, the court stated that they helped to minimize the possibility of mistrials, reduce the amount of time members need to spend waiting for evidentiary issues to be resolved, clarify issues for review, and reduce or avoid the "trial-by-ambush" tactics employed by some counsel. See also United States v. Sutton, 31 M.J. 11 (C.M.A. 1990).

e. In the case of United States v. Hilton, 27 M.J. 323 (C.M.A. 1989), the court held that a failure to raise at trial constitutional and statutory challenges to a regulation which was disobeyed did not preclude appellate consideration, where applicable precedent militated against objecting or the appellate court decided sua sponte to order review.

2. Specificity. The drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 103(a)(1) states that the "party has a right to state the specific grounds of the objection to the evidence." MCM, 1984, app. 22 (emphasis added). More than a "right," this is a responsibility of counsel, and the Federal courts have held the defense to high levels of specificity. See, e.g., United States v. Ruffin, 575 F.2d 346 (2d Cir. 1978) (objection to evidence as irrelevant does not preserve hearsay objection on appeal); United States v. Sims, 617 F.2d 1371 (9th Cir. 1980) (court would not consider Fed.R.Evid. 803(8) on appeal when only 803(6) was raised at trial); United States v. O'Brien, 601 F.2d 1067 (9th Cir. 1979) (objection that witness was testifying from material not in evidence held inadequate to preserve objection under Fed.R.Evid. 1006). Counsel should cite specific rules of evidence in their objections and be sure to cite all rules that apply. See, e.g., United States v. Hutcher, 622 F.2d 1083 (2d Cir.) (defense counsel's statement "I will object to that" without any citation of authority was found to lack sufficient specificity to preserve the claim for appeal), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 875 (1980); United States v. Taylor, 12 M.J. 561 (A.C.M.R. 1981) (court requires objecting counsel to demonstrate potential errors so that moving party could cure "evidentiary foundational defects" at trial, rather than on appeal); United States v. Foust, 14 M.J. 830 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (general hearsay objection to admissibility of lab reports and related documents lacked sufficient specificity), aff'd on other grounds, 17 M.J. 85 (C.M.A. 1983). See also United States v. Corrairie, 31 M.J. 102 (C.M.A. 1990).

D. Offer of proof. Mil.R.Evid. 103(a)(2). When an objection to evidence has been successful and the evidence excluded, the proponent of the evidence must make an offer of proof to preserve the issue for appeal. See, e.g., United States v. Heatherly, 21 M.J. 113 (C.M.A. 1985) (court declined to speculate about counsel's purpose in seeking admission of demonstrative evidence); United States v. Elvine, 16 M.J. 14 (C.M.A. 1983) (defense counsel's offer of proof demonstrated probative value of excluded evidence). As in Mil.R.Evid. 103(a)(1), there is an exception to this requirement when the substance of the excluded evidence is "apparent from the context within which questions were asked," but counsel are again cautioned never to count on the obvious and to make the offer of proof in these situations.

1. The drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 103(a) defines offer of proof as a "concise statement by counsel setting forth the substance of the expected testimony or other evidence." MCM, 1984, app. 22.

2. The statement of the offer of proof by counsel is not the only permissible form of an offer of proof. The offer may take several other forms.

a. Counsel may obtain permission to question the witness as if the objection had been overruled. The second sentence of Mil.R.Evid. 103(b) explicitly recognizes this form of an offer. Conducted at an article 39(a) session, this form allows the courts to determine more accurately the effect of the exclusion of the testimony, but it does result in increased delay in the proceedings.

b. Counsel may submit a written summarization of the offer of proof. This would be particularly advisable when the excluded testimony is lengthy or technical and counsel's oral offer might omit certain portions.

c. Courts have found other forms of offers of proof when they deem it appropriate. In United States v. Reed, 11 M.J. 649 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981), an important defense witness was excluded based on trial counsel's hearsay objections. The court found the exclusion of the witness to be error, but noted that trial defense counsel had failed to make a timely offer of proof demonstrating what the excluded testimony would have been. Adopting a broad, if not creative, interpretation of Mil.R.Evid. 103(a)(2), the court found that the defense counsel's opening statement (demonstrating how the witness would have testified) was the functional equivalent of an offer of proof. The court did note that counsel would be well advised to make an explicit offer of proof following the exclusion of proffered evidence.

3. Counsel should remember that the term "offer of proof" includes not only offers following the exclusion of evidence, but also representations of fact that are actually used in lieu of evidence by the court to resolve a disputed matter. In neither case is the offer of proof considered evidence. In the latter case, the offer of proof is akin to a stipulation, discussed in chapter IV, infra.

E. Waiver. In general, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has strictly applied the waiver doctrine implicit in Mil.R.Evid. 103(a).

1. In United States v. McLemore, 10 M.J. 238 (C.M.A. 1981), trial defense counsel failed to object to certain potentially inadmissible records of NJP. Although the court noted that their admission may have been error, the court denied relief stating: "Under these circumstances, the responsibility rests on defense counsel to interpose an objection—or else be subject to a waiver." Id. at 240. The court went on to state that Mil.R.Evid. 103(a)(1) has taken a "very expansive view of waiver," indicating that defense counsel must pose specific and timely objections to inadmissible evidence or face waiver on appeal. Id. See also United States v. Gordon, 10 M.J. 278 (C.M.A. 1981), where the court, citing McLemore and United States v. Negrone, 9 M.J. 171 (C.M.A. 1980), again cited Mil.R.Evid. 103(a)(1)'s broad waiver provisions.

2. In United States v. Cofield, 11 M.J. 422 (C.M.A. 1981), appellant's motion in limine to suppress a summary court-martial conviction was denied before trial. As a result, appellant did not testify on the merits. Although the court ultimately reversed the conviction, it expressed concern that, because Cofield did not testify, it was difficult to determine whether the judge's erroneous ruling prejudiced the defense. Today, the accused's failure to testify would constitute waiver. Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984); United States v. Sutton, 31 M.J. 11 (C.M.A. 1990). See also, United States v. Jones, 43 M.J. 708 (A.F.C.C.A. 1995) (where accused's failure to call spouse to offer favorable testimony with a view towards her invocation of spousal incapacity on cross, and where there was no motion in limine or objection to prevent such cross, constituted waiver of issue on appeal as to whether compelled cross would have been improper, and if so, whether it would have been prejudicial).

3. United States v. Jessen, 12 M.J. 122 (C.M.A. 1981), also recognizes that Mil.R.Evid. 103 changes pre-existing practice and provides that hearsay may be considered when it is admitted without objection. Accord United States v. Gordon, 18 M.J. 463 (C.M.A. 1984) (failure of defense counsel to raise hearsay objection to testimony regarding a prior identification of the accused waived issue for appeal).

4. In United States v. Lucas, 25 M.J. 9 (C.M.A. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1027 (1988), the trial defense counsel's failure to object to the improper use of immunized testimony was determined to be a waiver of this issue for appeal.

5. In United States v. Fitzgerald, 44 M.J. 434 (C.A.A.F. 1996), after instructing the members on the elements on the alleged offenses, instructions were provided on findings by exceptions and substitutions pursuant to R.C.M. 918(a)(1). Due to the nature of the separate and discrete acts within each specification, the MJ suggested a "straw" vote in his instructions. Neither TC nor DC objected. Held that because the instructions did not constitute plain error, and absent objection, the issue was waived.

F. Record of offer and ruling. Mil.R.Evid. 103(b) places some responsibility on the military judge to ensure that counsel's offers of proof are accurately preserved by giving the judge discretion to enhance any offering. The military judge may add a comment that explains the character or form of the evidence or offer, the nature of the objection, or the court's ruling on the objection. The purpose here again is to send a complete and accurate view of the proceedings to the appellate courts.

G. Hearing of members. Mil.R.Evid. 103(c) is self-explanatory and consistent with the military practice of article 39(a) sessions in preventing members from hearing potentially inadmissible evidence. It states that, in a court-martial composed of a military judge and members, proceedings shall be conducted, to the extent practicable, so as to prevent inadmissible evidence from being suggested to the members by any means (such as making statements or offers of proof or asking questions in the hearing of the members). Additionally, rule 29 of the Navy-Marine Corps Trial Judiciary Uniform Rules of Practice, NAVMARTRIJUDIC 5810.5B (29 Sep 94), provides that, when stating objections, counsel should state only the objection and the basis for it. Before proceeding to argue an objection, counsel will request permission of the military judge. Although argument identifying legal issues and presenting authorities is ordinarily appropriate, an objection or argument for the purpose of making a speech, recapitulating testimony, or attempting to guide a witness is prohibited. After the military judge has ruled on an objection, counsel shall not make further comment or argument except with the express permission of the trial judge. These restrictions allow the military judge to better control what is heard by the members.

H. Plain error. Mil.R.Evid. 103(d)'s "plain error" provision provides an escape route from the strict requirements of Mil.R.Evid. 103(a) should there be truly egregious error. This subsection should normally be limited to errors that are indeed "plain," which can be translated to mean "without excuse for their occurrence." See, e.g., United States v. Watson, 11 M.J. 483, 486 (C.M.A. 1981), where the court, in reversing a case where defense counsel failed to object to hearsay statements, noted that it was "unable to discern any trial tactic which would imply a conscious choice by defense counsel to have the hearsay evidence in the record." Such errors can be minimized if the military judge inquires of counsel whether counsel is acting inadvertently or whether counsel is pursuing a course of action for strategic reasons.

— Counsel should not count on the invocation of Mil.R.Evid. 103(d) on a frequent basis. Even errors of constitutional magnitude are not necessarily plain error. United States v. Colon-Angueira, 16 M.J. 20 (C.M.A. 1983). In United States v. Beaudion, 11 M.J. 838 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 12 M.J. 181 (C.M.A. 1981), the court found waiver under Mil.R.Evid. 103(a) in defense counsel's failure to object to an inadmissible record of NJP. The court refused to apply Mil.R.Evid. 103(d)'s "plain error" standard because "invoking waiver will not 'cause a miscarriage of justice' nor will it 'impugn the reputation and integrity of the courts' or amount to 'a denial of a fundamental right of the accused.'" Id. at 840. In United States v. Robinson, 12 M.J. 872 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982), admission of an unauthenticated document was not plain error. Lack of finality of a prior conviction was not considered to be plain error in United States v. Hancock, 12 M.J. 685 (A.C.M.R. 1981). In United States v. Cox, 45 M.J. 153, (1996), it was not considered plain error for the installation's Chief of Military Justice, who was also the assistant trial counsel in the case, to testify that he had gone to the victim's home to determine the veracity of the allegations before deciding to go forward, and that he had left, at least the implication was, with the view that the accused was guilty. In United States v. Willett, 11 M.J. 723 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 12 M.J. 177 (C.M.A. 1981), however, admission of a prior conviction not properly recorded on a service record page was considered to be plain error since it was "plainly inadmissible." Failure to establish that a government witness called in sentencing had personal knowledge of an NJP of the accused, about which the witness testified, was plain error. United States v. McGill, 15 M.J. 242 (C.M.A. 1983). Plain error was also found in the military judge's admission of an NJP record that was largely unreadable and incomplete. United States v. Dyke, 16 M.J. 426 (C.M.A. 1983). "Although the Military Rules of Evidence were intended to place additional responsibility upon trial and defense counsel, we do not believe that they were meant to provide a license for slipshod performance by military judges." Id. at 427. See also United States v. May, 18 M.J. 839 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984) (plain error to admit civilian conviction with patent deficiencies). Even when plain error does not exist, appellate courts can still take corrective action in the interest of justice. United States v. Claxton, 32 M.J. 159 (C.M.A. 1991).

I. Deferring ruling. Nothing requires the military judge to make a ruling on objections when they are raised. A ruling may be deferred, even if doing so will have a chilling effect on counsel. United States v. Cannon, 33 M.J. 376 (C.M.A. 1991).

0308 LIMITED ADMISSIBILITY. Mil.R.Evid. 105.

A. During the course of a court-martial, evidence may be admitted as helpful to the trier of fact on one aspect of the case (Mil.R.Evid. 401 & 402), yet be inadmissible as to another aspect of the case (see, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 404(b)). Court members often find it difficult to use evidence offered for a limited purpose solely for that limited purpose and may tend to misapply the evidence, especially when it is evidence of an accused's prior conviction (Mil.R.Evid. 609). Mil.R.Evid. 105 addresses the problem of limited admissibility.

B. Mil.R.Evid. 105 embodies the traditional military theory that, as a general rule, evidence should be received if it is admissible for any purpose, notwithstanding the fact that it is inadmissible for another purpose. This rule categorizes the two general situations in which limited admissibility arises.

1. Evidence may be admissible for one purpose, but not another. For example, evidence of other crimes may be admissible to show an accused's intent, but not that he acted in conformity with the character shown by these crimes (Mil.R.Evid. 404(b)); or, in situations not covered by Mil.R. Evid. 801 (d)(1)(A), inconsistent statements may not be used as substantive evidence, but may be used solely for impeachment purposes (Mil.R.Evid. 613).

2. Evidence may be admissible against one accused even though it is inadmissible against a co-accused. See Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968); United States v. Pringle, 3 M.J. 308 (C.M.A. 1977). Note that Mil.R.Evid. 306, dealing with statements of co-accused, is more restrictive and protective than Mil.R.Evid. 105.

C. Mil.R.Evid. 105 places primary responsibility for limiting instructions upon counsel, rather than the military judge, by specifying that the judge need give a limiting instruction only "upon request." This is a significant change in military law, since substantial appellate litigation over the three years prior to the effective date of the Mil.R.Evid. had stripped counsel of their responsibilities in this area. The drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 105 indicates the explicit intent to overrule United States v. Grunden, 2 M.J. 116 (C.M.A. 1977). MCM, 1984, app. 22. Grunden reflected a more paternalistic approach by the court, substituting the court's judgment over that of counsel. The case included the oft-quoted language that "[n]o evidence can so fester in the minds of court members as to the guilt or innocence of the accused as to the crime charged as evidence of uncharged misconduct. Its use must be given the weight of judicial comment, i.e. an instruction as to its limited use." Id. at 119.

Even before the adoption of the Mil.R.Evid., the Court of Military Appeals was backtracking from the Grunden position. In the case of United States v. Montgomery, 5 M.J. 832 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 6 M.J. 89 (C.M.A. 1978), the accused met a companion with whom he became intimate. After the companion performed oral sex on him, he disrobed the companion and found out that "she" was a "he." Becoming quite upset, the accused beat up the companion and took his money as compensation for the emotional trauma. Montgomery was charged with robbery only and not sodomy, but at trial the evidence of the sodomy was introduced. Finding the uncharged misconduct to be part and parcel of the charged misconduct, the court did not find error in the trial judge's refusal to give a limiting instruction. See also United States v. Thomas, 11 M.J. 388 (C.M.A. 1981) (evidence inextricably related in time and place to those offenses charged need not be the subject of a sua sponte limiting instruction).

D. Although an instruction need not be given unless requested by counsel (and note that this can be either trial or defense counsel), once a request is made, the instruction must be given. See, e.g., United States v. Eckmann, 656 F.2d 308 (8th Cir. 1981) (where damaging evidence was adduced against only one of several defendants, the court found that the failure to give requested limiting instructions was reversible error.) The rule is silent, however, on what constitutes a sufficient "request" or when the instruction should be given.

1. Sufficient request. A defense counsel's request for instructions couched in terms of the military judge doing "whatever is legal and correct" is probably not a sufficient request for an instruction under this rule. See United States v. Vitale, 596 F.2d 688 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 444 U.S. 868 (1979); United States v. Bridwell, 583 F.2d 1135 (10th Cir. 1978).

a. Counsel should, at a minimum, specifically state the grounds for limiting the evidence. Mil.R.Evid. 103(a). The lack of a limiting instruction may be so potentially prejudicial, notwithstanding counsel's failure to ask for one, that the judge's failure to give a sua sponte instruction may be plain error under Mil.R.Evid. 103 (d), but this would be the rare case. Military judges may help reduce plain error problems by asking counsel whether there are tactical reasons for their decision not to request an instruction.

b. In addition to specifically requesting an instruction and citing the grounds for the request, counsel may also offer the court specific language for the instruction, usually based on the Military Judge's Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, 1982 (Rev.), or other competent authority or case law. Military judges will frequently require counsel to provide such an instruction. If an adequate instruction cannot be fashioned, this may indicate that the evidence should be excluded completely under a Mil.R.Evid. 403 rationale. This relationship between Mil.R.Evid. 105 and 403 is sometimes overlooked by counsel. The effectiveness of Mil.R.Evid. 105 in limiting the evidence to its proper use is a consideration in reaching a decision under Mil.R.Evid. 403. See Chapter V, infra.

2. Timing of the instruction. The limiting instruction may be given either when the evidence is received or as part of the general instructions at the conclusion of the case. Counsel should have input on the timing of the instruction as part of their responsibility in this area. In most cases, if counsel want any instruction, they will want instructions at both possible times and should get two instructions. Of course, two instructions could unduly emphasize the evidence—another tactical decision for counsel.

E. Nothing in Mil.R.Evid. 105 prevents the military judge from giving limiting instructions sua sponte in appropriate situations, even over the objection of counsel. The military judge "is more than a mere referee, and as such he is required to assure that the accused receives a fair trial." United States v. Graves, 1 M.J. 50, 53 (C.M.A. 1975). If a judge determines that an instruction is necessary, it seems good practice to consult counsel on the form of instruction they would recommend.

F. Limiting instructions under Mil.R.Evid. 105 should be distinguished from curative instructions given when evidence has been erroneously admitted and is not admissible for any purpose. The requirements for giving a curative instruction, or the adequacy of such an instruction, should be judged by Mil.R.Evid. 103 standards and not under Mil.R.Evid. 105, which assumes by its very language that the evidence must be admissible for some purpose.

0309      REMAINDER OF OR RELATED WRITINGS OR RECORDED STATEMENTS. Mil.R.Evid. 106.

A. At first glance, Mil.R.Evid. 106 appears to be a rule dealing with the admissibility of documentary evidence that should have been included under Section X of the rules. In actuality, it concerns the timing of the introduction of otherwise admissible evidence and does not create an additional rule of admissibility. For an adverse party to "require" the remainder of a writing or any other writing to be introduced, that additional writing must be admissible under some other portion of the Mil.R.Evid.

B. The phrase "at that time" should be considered in conjunction with the military judge's control of the order of evidence presentation under Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

Military judges will exercise their normal discretion in this matter and avoid the potential problems of unnecessary interruption of one counsel's case, and confusion for the members, by resolving as many issues as possible during preliminary article 39(a) sessions.

C. Mil.R.Evid. 106 is based upon two primary considerations:

1. Avoiding misleading impressions created by taking matters out of context; and
2. the inadequacy of delaying the remedy for a misleading presentation by counsel.

The rule suggests that "fairness" is the controlling consideration in determining these issues, but this is not particularly helpful since fairness is a general consideration in all discretionary rulings. See Mil.R.Evid. 102. Since this rule is taken without change from Fed.R.Evid. 106, Federal case law may be particularly helpful in this area. See, e.g., United States v. Walker, 652 F.2d 708 (7th Cir. 1981) (where portions of appellant's previous testimony were read to the jury, reversible error to exclude other relevant portions that explained the admitted evidence).

D. When the confession or admission of an accused is involved, Mil.R.Evid. 106 must be read in conjunction with Mil.R.Evid. 304(h)(2). The latter rule deals with oral as well as written or recorded statements.

0310 SUMMARY. The general and miscellaneous rules of sections I and XI, Mil.R.Evid., discussed above, are frequently given a quick and cursory glance by counsel in their haste to get to the "meaty" and "fun" part of the Mil.R.Evid. (i.e., substantive evidentiary rules). New trial advocates should appreciate the basic themes which permeate these sections so that they can make effective use of the Military Rules of Evidence.

A. First, counsel need to know when and to what extent the rules apply to the proceedings in which the counsel are involved. The need to know if the rules are inapplicable, or if their application may be relaxed, is self-evident.

B. Second, proper use of procedural rules is necessary to the effective use of the substantive rules, such as those in sections VI and VIII.

C. Third, counsel must appreciate that, although they must consider the rules individually in order to learn their content, in using the Mil.R.Evid., they must also consider their interrelationships with each other.

Fed.R.Evid. vs. Mil.R.Evid.
Comparison Table

The following table is designed to give the reader a general idea of the relationship between individual rules under the Federal Rules of Evidence and the corresponding rules under the Military Rules of Evidence.

Although not a substitute for a side-by-side comparison of the rules, this table should be useful in an initial analysis and determination of persuasive value of Federal court cases interpreting the Federal Rules of Evidence.

The term "identical" denotes that the respective Fed.R.Evid. was adopted into the Mil.R.Evid. without change; "similar" denotes that the language of the Federal rule was changed to some extent (frequently to conform to military terminology), but the intent of the rule was retained; and "standard" refers to provisions of the Federal Rules proposed by the Supreme Court but not accepted by Congress.

CHAPTER IV

SUBSTITUTES FOR EVIDENCE:

JUDICIAL NOTICE, PRESUMPTIONS AND INFERENCES, AND STIPULATIONS

0401 INTRODUCTION. In the court-martial process, most "proof" is presented by, and most of the effort of counsel is directed toward, using testimonial, documentary, and real evidence. The Military Rules of Evidence primarily deal with these "regular" aspects of the law of evidence. But traditionally, the law has recognized the need for and the existence of substitutes for evidence. These substitutes relieve a proponent from formally proving certain facts and are recognized as practical necessities for the purposes of judicial economy and efficient case resolution.

This chapter deals with the three most commonly accepted substitutes for evidence. Part One considers judicial notice under Mil.R.Evid. 201 and 201A. Part Two addresses the interrelated concepts of presumption and inference, dealing with general application of these concepts to evidentiary issues at trial as they have been developed under military common law. This common law approach is necessary since the drafters of the Mil.R.Evid. purposely decided not to codify the concepts into specific rules, but to allow for their continued development by the courts. Presumptions and inferences related to specific procedural rules or substantive criminal offenses are dealt with in detail in the NJS Procedure Study Guide, and Criminal Law Study Guide, respectively. Part Three discusses stipulations of both fact and testimony as provided for in Rule for Courts-Martial 811, MCM, 1984 [hereinafter R.C.M. ____].

PART ONE: JUDICIAL NOTICE

0402 DEFINITION

A. Traditional. Prior to the Mil.R.Evid., "judicial notice" in the military was defined to be "the recognition by a court of the existence of certain kinds of matters without formal proof." MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 147a. This paragraph enumerated a number of matters of which judicial notice could be taken. The common attribute of these judicially noticeable "facts" being that they "could not reasonably be the subject of dispute" or were "capable of immediate and accurate determination by resort to easily accessible sources of reasonably indisputable accuracy." Id. This essential prerequisite of "a high degree of indisputability" is carried over in Mil.R.Evid. 201. See

Fed.R.Evid. 201 advisory committee note.

B. Under the rules. Mil.R.Evid. 201 is taken substantially from Fed.R.Evid. 201. The drafters of Fed.R.Evid. 201 considered judicial notice to be a court's acceptance of particular facts "outside the area of reasonable controversy" without formal introduction of evidence. Id. In their consideration of what matters are properly subject to judicial notice, they limited notice to only "adjudicative" facts, as opposed to "legislative" facts.

1. Adjudicative facts are defined as simply the facts of the particular case ("i.e., those facts that are normally resolved by the fact-finder. Id."). Legislative facts, on the other hand, are "those that have relevance to legal reasoning and the lawmaking process whether in the formulation of a legal principle or ruling by a judge or court or in the enactment of a legislative body." Id. They tend to be general in application, rather than situation specific, and their noninclusion under judicial notice can be considered a vote against judicial lawmaking. Two well-known cases of judicial notice of legislative fact are Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483 (1954) (segregated schools could never be equal) and Baker v. Carr, 369 U.S. 186 (1962) (contemporary notions of justice require voting reapportionment).

The "adjudicative" and "legislative" fact terminology was coined by Professor Kenneth Davis in his article, An Approach to Problems in Evidence in the Administrative Process, 55 Harv. L. Rev. 364, 404-07 (1942). See Annot., 35 A.L.R. Fed. 440 (1977). Other works by Professor Davis provide some amplification on the distinction in terminology.

Adjudicative facts are defined by Professor Davis as follows:

When a court or an agency finds facts concerning the immediate parties - who did what, where, when, how, and with what motive or intent - the court or agency is performing an adjudicative function, and the facts are conveniently called adjudicative facts. . . .

Stated in other terms, the adjudicative facts are those to which the law is applied in the process of adjudication. They are the facts that normally go to the jury in a jury case. They relate to the parties, their activities, their properties, their businesses.

K. Davis, 2 Administrative Law Treatise 353 (1958).

Legislative facts are quite different. As Professor Davis says in his article, A System of Judicial Notice Based on Fairness and Convenience, published in Perspectives of Law (1964):

My opinion is that judge-made law would stop growing if judges, in thinking about questions of law and policy, were forbidden to take into account the facts they believe, as distinguished from facts which are "clearly . . . within the domain of the indisputable." Facts most needed in thinking about difficult problems of law and policy have a way of being outside the domain of the clearly indisputable.

The drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 201 is not particularly helpful in resolving the distinction between adjudicative and legislative facts as it notes that the distinction "can on occasion be highly confusing in practice and resort to any of the usual treatises may be helpful." See MCM, 1984, app. 22. The Mil.R.Evid. resolve part of the problem by the specific recognition in rule 201A of judicial notice of law (a form of legislative fact).

2. The debate on what facts are judicially noticeable can be further complicated by the philosophical theory that all judicial deliberations are in essence "judicial notice." This theory implies that all thought processes require the acceptance of certain assumptions, that judicial thought is no different and, hence, must involve certain assumptions, and that these assumptions are judicial notice of facts. Thayer stated:

In conducting a process of judicial reasoning, as of other reasoning, not a step can be taken without assuming something which has not been proved; and the capacity to do this with competent judgment and efficiency, is imputed to judges and juries as part of their necessary mental outfit.

Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence 279-80 (1898).

Fortunately, most of the day-to-day problems of the practitioner, as discussed infra, are fairly clear-cut and only occasionally will counsel have to enter the "mire" of commentator distinctions. It also may be worth noting that Professor Davis' distinction originally arose in the area of administrative law.

0403 Kinds of Facts Noticeable. Mil.R.Evid. 201(b).

A. Not subject to reasonable dispute. In addition to being adjudicative, "a judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute in that it is either (1) generally known universally, locally, or in the area pertinent to the event or (2) capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot reasonably be questioned." Mil.R.Evid. 201(b).

This subdivision is based on the theory that traditional methods of proof should be dispensed with only in clear cases. Mil.R.Evid. 201(b) differs from the Federal rule in that subsection (b)(1) has been modified to reflect the widely dispersed military community rather than to limit judicial recognition of known facts to an area "within the territorial jurisdiction of the trial court," a concept foreign to military practice.

B. Otherwise admissible. A concept that is implicit in this subsection is that the judicially noticeable facts must be otherwise admissible under the Mil.R.Evid. The rule allows substitutes for proof, not exemption from the usual rules of evidence.

C. Examples. The drafters' analysis lists examples of types of matters which are judicially noticeable under Mil.R.Evid. 201, provided that they qualify as adjudicative facts.

1. The ordinary divisions of time into years, months, weeks, and other periods;
2. general facts and laws of nature, including their ordinary operations and effects;
3. general facts of history;
4. generally known geographical facts;
5. such specific facts and propositions of generalized knowledge as are so universally known that they cannot reasonably be the subject of dispute;
6. such facts as are so generally known, or are of such common notoriety, in the area in which the trial is held that they cannot reasonably be the subject of dispute [see, e.g., United States v. Porter, 12 M.J. 129, 131 (C.M.A. 1981) (in a drug case, judicial notice could be taken that "a 'crime laboratory' is a place in which scientific methods and principles are applied in the testing and analysis of various items in connection with the detection and prosecution of crimes"); United States v. Evans, 16 M.J. 951 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983), petition denied, 17 M.J. 348 (C.M.A. 1984) (judicial notice could be taken that burning marijuana has a distinctive odor)]; and
7. specific facts and propositions of generalized knowledge that are capable of immediate and accurate determination by resort to easily accessible sources of reasonably indisputable accuracy. Compare United States v. Jones, 14 M.J. 740 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 15 M.J. 298 (C.M.A. 1983) (judicial notice could be taken that, on a certain date, a certain person was the acting General Counsel for the Air Force) with United States v. Williams, 17 M.J. 207 (C.M.A. 1984) (judicial notice of jurisdictional issue was inappropriate due to the complexity of the issue). Mil.R.Evid. 201 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22.

0404 THE "MAY" AND "MUST" OF JUDICIAL NOTICE

A. Discretionary notice. Mil.R.Evid. 201(c) states:

When discretionary. The military judge may take judicial notice, whether requested or not. The parties shall be informed in open court when, without being requested, the military judge takes judicial notice of an adjudicative fact essential to establishing an element of the case.

1. Subdivision (c) permits the military judge to take judicial notice on his own motion. The first sentence is identical to the Federal rule, but the second sentence is new and requires the military judge to announce when he has taken judicial notice on his own motion if the fact noticed is essential to establishing an element of the case. This notice requirement was included by the drafters to meet the "clear implication" of subdivision (e), which offers counsel an opportunity to be heard, and to satisfy the requirement of Garner v. Louisiana, 368 U.S. 157 (1961). In Garner, under a Louisiana statute, black defendants were convicted for disturbing the peace when they sat in a restaurant section reserved for whites. The Supreme Court resisted state arguments that the trial court must have sub silentio taken judicial notice of the racial unrest in Louisiana. Finding no evidence in the record to support the state's position, the Court noted that it would not turn the doctrine of judicial notice into a pretext for dispensing with a trial. The Court stated:

Furthermore, unless an accused is informed at the trial of the facts of which the court is taking judicial notice, not only does he not know upon what evidence he is being convicted, but, in addition, he is deprived of any opportunity to challenge the deductions drawn from such notice or to dispute the notoriety or truth of the facts allegedly relied upon. Moreover, there is no way by which an appellate court may review the facts and law of a case and intelligently decide whether the findings of the lower court are supported by the evidence where that evidence is unknown. Such an assumption would be a denial of due process.

2. If the trial judge does not properly exercise the judicial notice provisions, appellate relief may be forthcoming. In United States v. Williams, 17 M.J. 207 (C.M.A. 1984), the Court of Military Appeals expounded on its ability to take judicial notice of indisputable facts. See also United States v. Irvin, 21 M.J. 184 (C.M.A. 1986) (court declined to take judicial notice for the first time on appeal, citing sixth amendment issues).

B. Mandatory judicial notice. Mil.R.Evid. 201(d) states:

When mandatory. The military judge shall take judicial notice if requested by a party and supplied with the necessary information.

The drafters' analysis provides only that the military judge must take judicial notice when the evidence is properly within Rule 201, is relevant under Rule 401, and is not inadmissible under other provisions of the Mil.R. Evid., MCM, 1984, App. 22. S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi, and D. Schleuter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 80 (3d ed. 1991) adds:

... supporting information ... need not itself be admissible. If the supporting evidence is admissible, the military judge, instead of judicially noticing the fact, may admit the evidence.... But if notice is appropriate, it shall be taken. This is important, even though the proponent of the noticed fact may have some evidence to support it; the taking of notice effectively tells the members of the court that the proponent need not offer additional evidence of the fact, and places the imprimatur of the judge on the fact.

0405 OPPORTUNITY TO BE HEARD. Mil.R.Evid. 201(e) states:

Opportunity to be heard. A party is entitled upon timely request to an opportunity to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice and the tenor of the matter noticed. In the absence of prior notification, the request may be made after judicial notice has been taken.

A. General. Subdivision (e) is identical to the Federal rule and provides that counsel must be provided an opportunity to address the propriety of taking judicial notice.

B. Procedure

1. The rule does not require advance notice of intent to request judicial notice. In the interests of efficiency, however, counsel should give advance notice to the opposing parties whenever possible, and a copy of any supporting materials should also be furnished to the military judge. Generally, these materials need not be admissible in evidence, but must be included in the record of trial.

2. The military judge will generally permit opposing counsel to present controverting evidence and make argument on the propriety and tenor of the notice before making a ruling. If notice is to be taken, the judge will appropriately instruct the court members by explaining the nature and effect of judicial notice upon the proceedings. See Mil.R.Evid. 201(g) and Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, at 7-8 (1982).

3. In some situations, the request for an opportunity to be heard may be made after the court takes judicial notice if prior notification is not given. See In re King Resources, 651 F.2d 1326 (10th Cir. 1980).

0406 TIME OF TAKING NOTICE. Mil.R.Evid. 201(f) states: "Time of taking notice. Judicial notice may be taken at any stage of the proceeding." Subdivision (f) provides that judicial notice may be taken either at the trial or appellate level. It is identical to the Federal rule and is subject to the second sentence of rule 201(c), which would apparently prevent an appellate court from filling evidentiary gaps by noticing an essential adjudicative fact for the first time on appeal. See United States v. Williams, supra. But see United States v. Berrojo, 628 F.2d 368 (5th Cir. 1980) (trial judge could properly take judicial notice even after close of government's case). This subdivision should not restrict appellate courts from continuing to judicially notice, for example, a counsel's qualifications, United States v. Craft, 44 C.M.R. 664 (A.C.M.R. 1971); a military judge's certification, United States v. Gray, 47 C.M.R. 693 (A.C.M.R. 1973); or matters in other cases pending before or previously decided by the courts, United States v. Surry, 6 M.J. 800 (A.C.M.R. 1978), petition denied, 17 M.J. 62 (C.M.A. 1979); United States v. Kildare-Marcano, 21 M.J. 683 (A.C.M.R. 1985); United States v. Petersen, 15 M.J. 530 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 15 M.J. 475 (C.M.A. 1982). Nor should it restrict an appellate court from drawing inferences from the evidence actually admitted or judicially noticed.

A. In a members case, the military judge is required to instruct the court members that "they may, but are not required to," consider as conclusive those facts that have been judicially noticed. Mil.R.Evid. 201(g) (emphasis added). A mandatory instruction to accept as conclusive any judicially noticed fact would be inappropriate as contrary to the sixth amendment right to trial by jury. See Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, at 7-8 (1982).

B. Since the members may reject the noticed fact, it would seem that the other party should be able to offer evidence to rebut the fact. However, admissible rebuttal evidence would probably be difficult to find since the fact must be beyond reasonable dispute in order to be judicially noticeable.

0408 EXAMPLE OF TAKING JUDICIAL NOTICE. A request by the trial counsel or the defense counsel that the court take judicial notice of a fact may be made substantially as follows:

TC: The prosecution requests that the court take judicial notice that the motor vehicle speed limit on NETC, Newport, on 23 January 19CY, was 20 miles per hour. To assist the court and reviewing authorities, the prosecution offers to the court a true copy of paragraph 3a, Center Traffic Regulations, NETC, Newport RI, dated 4 July 1986, supporting the fact to be judicially noticed.

(TC shows document to DC for inspection and then gives it to MJ. The document will normally be marked as an appellate exhibit.)

DC: No objection.

MJ: The court will take judicial notice that, on 23 January 19CY, the motor vehicle speed limit on NETC, Newport, was 20 miles per hour.

0409 JUDICIAL NOTICE OF DOMESTIC LAW. Mil.R.Evid. 201A(a) states:

The military judge may take judicial notice of domestic law. Insofar as a domestic law is a fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action, the procedural requirements of Mil.R.Evid. 201   except Mil.R.Evid. 201(g)   apply.

A. General. The subject matter of rule 201A is generally treated as a procedural matter in article III courts. See, e.g., Fed. R. Crim. P. 26.1. Accordingly, a new rule was adopted to allow judicial notice of law.

B. Domestic law. According to the drafters' analysis, the term "domestic law" is intended to include the following:

1. Treaties of the United States;
2. executive agreements between the United States and any State thereof, foreign country, or international organization or agency;
3. laws and regulations pursuant thereto of the United States, of the District of Columbia, and of a state, Commonwealth, or possession (regulations of the United States include those of the armed forces);
4. international law, including the laws of war [see, e.g., The Paquete Habana, 175 U.S. 677 (1900) (international law assumed to be part of domestic law)];
5. general maritime law and the law of air and space; and
6. common law.

Mil.R.Evid. 201A drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22.

C. Procedure

1. The rule recognizes that, where the domestic law is a "fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action," the procedural requirements of rule 201 must be applied. This is a recognition that law may constitute an adjudicative fact, discussed supra, as would almost always be the case where violation of a regulation is the charged offense.

2. The "procedural requirements of Rule 201" include the notice to parties requirement of rule 201(c) and the opportunity to be heard provision of Mil.R.Evid. 201(e). See, e.g., United States v. Mead, 16 M.J. 270 (C.M.A. 1983) (on appeal of a military judge taking judicial notice of a Navy regulation as domestic law, the court ruled that the accused had received all the procedural benefits he was due under Mil.R.Evid. 201). After a 1984 amendment, rule 201A(a) specifically excludes rule 201(g) from these "procedural requirements of Rule 201." This avoids the possibility that the military judge might instruct the members that they need not follow the law.

3. Although the rule contains no requirement for a copy of the noticed law to be attached to the record of trial, the drafters' analysis suggests this practice be adopted unless the law in question can reasonably be anticipated to be easily available to any possible reviewing authority. MCM, 1984, app. 22.

0410 JUDICIAL NOTICE OF FOREIGN LAW. Mil.R.Evid. 201A(b) states:

A party who intends to raise an issue concerning the law of a foreign country shall give reasonable written notice. The military judge, in determining foreign law, may consider any relevant material or source including testimony whether or not submitted by a party or admissible under these rules. Such a determination shall be treated as a ruling on a question of law.

A. General. This subdivision is derived from Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 26.1 and is little changed from pre-Mil.R.Evid. military practice. It reflects the drafters' realization that the determination of questions of foreign law can be difficult and requires extra time and recourse to additional evidence, including witnesses. Accordingly, the requirement for reasonable written notice has been added, and the consideration of inadmissible evidence is allowed.

B. Foreign law. The drafters' analysis states an intention to have the term "foreign law" include:

1. Laws and regulations of foreign countries and their political subdivisions;
and

2. laws and regulations of international organizations and agencies. MCM, 1984, app. 22.

This should be distinguished from international law and international agreements of which the United States is a party. These both are considered domestic law under Mil.R.Evid.

C. Procedure

1. Although the rule allows the military judge to consider matter not submitted by a party, the military judge will normally want the parties to submit their relevant sources so that they may be examined by all, and each party may then address the other's sources. If the military judge does consider matters not submitted by a party, the better procedure would be for the military judge not only to notify counsel of the sources used but to provide copies to the parties. Any material used for determining foreign law, or pertinent extracts therefrom, should be included in the record of trial as an exhibit. This should include any translations used by the court.

2. Although foreign law could be an adjudicative fact (at least in theory), there is no need for an adjudicative fact versus legislative fact analysis. The court members may be instructed to accept as conclusive the existence and content of the foreign law that is noticed.

PART TWO: PRESUMPTIONS AND INFERENCES

0411 INTRODUCTION

A. General concepts. Presumptions and inferences are ways of dealing with evidence, and may be substitutes for evidence, but they are not evidence. They have been created because it is generally or frequently recognized that certain facts or circumstances exist in relation to, or as the result of, certain other facts or circumstances. These recognized relationships between facts are referred to as either presumptions or inferences. These relationships are a product of what the military judge defines in instructions to court members as the trier of fact's "common sense" and "knowledge of human nature and the ways of the world." Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, Update page 2-69 (1994).

Traditionally, a "presumption" was defined as a conclusion that the law directed the jury to find from other established facts, and an "inference" was defined as a conclusion that the law permits the jury to find from other established facts. United States v. Burns, 597 F.2d 939, 943 n.7 (5th Cir. 1979). In recent cases, however, the Supreme Court has spoken not of presumption versus inference but of differing degrees of presumptions. Ulster County Court v. Allen, 442 U.S. 140, 99 S.Ct. 2213, 60 L.Ed.2d 777 (1979); Sandstrom v. Montana, 442 U.S. 510, 99 S.Ct. 2450, 61 L.Ed.2d 39 (1979).

Application of the presumption-inference evidentiary concept in the military justice system has followed the traditional development of presumptions and inferences as separate terms. Since both are rational conclusions drawn from facts, however, the terms frequently are used interchangeably (e.g., a presumption being called a "mandatory inference" or an inference being a "permissible presumption"). The key difference, as discussed infra, is the use to which the concept is put, not the terminology used to describe it. Along with these traditional evidentiary definitions, or as a result of the application of those definitions, the concepts of presumption and inference have also been accepted as imposing upon the various parties to litigation certain burdens, most particularly that burden generally labeled "burden of proof."

B. Military application. Prior to the adoption of the Military Rules of Evidence, paragraph 138a of the Manual for Courts-Martial, 1969 (Rev.) [hereinafter MCM, 1969 (Rev.)], provided definitions and guidelines for the use of presumptions and inferences. The drafters of the Mil.R.Evid., like their Fed.R.Evid. counterparts, apparently felt this area could not be properly codified and abandoned it to what could be called the "military common law."

The Mil.R.Evid. have no corollary to Article III of the Fed.R. Evid., since that article deals only with presumptions in civil cases. While the general provisions of paragraph 138a were deleted, there is no indication of an intent to change the status of the law of presumptions and inferences as it existed prior to the Mil.R.Evid., and, in fact, numerous specific presumptions and inferences were retained in the post-Mil.R.Evid. provisions of the MCM. Both military and Federal judicial authority will play a vital role in the development of this evidentiary substitute. Mil.R.Evid. 101(b). The material in this part of the chapter catalogs the generally understood status of the current "military common law" of presumptions and inferences and addresses the specifically retained MCM provisions.

0412      PRESUMPTIONS

A.      General. If the rule of law is that the court members must infer fact B if they find fact A, the rule of law is a mandatory inference or presumption. Presumptions are primarily procedural rules governing the production of evidence and do not themselves constitute evidence. See generally United States v. Biesak, 3 C.M.A. 714, 14 C.M.R. 132 (1954); 9 Wigmore's Evidence, sec. 2490 et seq. (1940).

B.      Rebuttable presumptions. In the military, the term presumption is applied to facts that a court is bound to find in the absence of adequate evidence to the contrary. This is generally called a "rebuttable presumption" in the common law of evidence. That is, the fact-finder is bound to find fact B once it finds fact A only if the opponent fails to produce evidence of non-B. The opponent is not precluded by law from producing evidence of non-B.

1.      Thus, once the proponent establishes A, fact B is also established, and the burden of going forward on the issue of establishing non-B shifts to the opponent; if the opponent produces no evidence of non-B, then the opponent loses on that issue.

2.      When the opponent does present evidence tending to establish non-B, then the presumption of B is rebutted and the fact-finder is no longer bound to find, but may find, B, even if it finds A. Thus, once the presumption has been rebutted, normally an inference of the originally presumed fact remains, and the court members will be so instructed.

C.      Conclusive presumptions. So-called irrebuttable or conclusive presumptions are really rules of substantive law. Under a conclusive presumption, the fact-finder is told, "if the fact-finder finds fact A, he must find fact B, even if the opponent has demonstrated that B did not exist." Such a rule has the effect of removing B as an issue in the case altogether; the focus of the controversy is A, and whether B actually exists or not is irrelevant. There are no conclusive presumptions in the military, since conclusive presumptions are not constitutional in criminal cases as they invade the province of the trier of fact and conflict with the presumption of innocence. See Morissette v. United States, 342 U.S. 246 (1952); United States v. United States Gypsum Co., 438 U.S. 422 (1978).

D. Effect. Rebuttable presumptions as "members control devices" in the military are purely procedural, designed to allocate the burden of going forward. See, e.g., United States v. Treagle, 18 M.J. 646 (A.C.M.R. 1984), aff'd, 23 M.J. 151 (C.M.A. 1986) (presumption of unlawful command influence on potential character witness raised by defense).

E. Examples of "presumptions". Several of the so-called "presumptions" in military law are not in fact true presumptions, since they do not require any initial fact A from which fact B must be presumed. They are once again merely procedural devices, several of which are discussed here for the reader's reference and comparison.

1. An accused person is presumed to be innocent until his guilt is proved beyond a reasonable doubt. R.C.M. 920(e)(5).

a. This is not a true presumption, in that no preliminary fact has been found (unless it could be said that being charged with a crime is a preliminary fact). The presumption of innocence is a traditional method of restating and emphasizing that the government has the heavy burden of proving the accused's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt.

b. The innocence presumption is treated differently than rebuttable presumptions. The military judge must always instruct on the innocence presumption and must use mandatory language.

2. An accused is presumed to have been sane at the time of the offense charged and to be sane at the time of trial, until the contrary is established. R.C.M. 916(k)(3)(A) and 909(b). Sanity is also not a true rebuttable presumption because the government need prove no foundational fact to rely upon it. But it operates like a presumption in other respects because it shifts the burden of proof of insanity to the defense.

3. Every person is presumed to be competent as a witness until the contrary is shown. Mil.R.Evid. 601. This presumption merely serves to relieve the party presenting the witness from having to establish competency in the absence of a contest from the other party.

4. Regularity of official documents may be presumed in the absence of any evidence to the contrary. United States v. Leahy, 20 M.J. 564 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985); cf. United States v. Porter, 12 M.J. 129 (C.M.A. 1981) (presumption of regularity in crime lab specimen handling).

0413            INFERENCES

A.    Distinguished from presumptions. The 1951 Manual for Courts-Martial, paragraph 158a, made no distinction between presumptions and inferences, regarding the presumption as a special form of inference. The lumping together of these two related but dissimilar terms created confusion and has been the subject of criticism. See United States v. Troutt, 8 C.M.A. 436, 24 C.M.R. 246 (1957) and Hug, Presumptions and Inferences in Criminal Law, 56 Mil. L. Rev. 81, 91-92 (1972). The presumption is a procedural tool, while the inference is an evidentiary medium. If the rule of law is that the court members may infer fact B if they find fact A, the rule of law is a permissible or justifiable inference. As discussed below, such concepts as intent, knowledge, or state of mind are seldom susceptible of direct proof except in the rare instance of an accused making a concurrent admission and, even then, the accused's actions may belie the words. These concepts are normally established by proof of actions from which the concept may be inferred. Inferences may help in meeting a burden of going forward with evidence or a burden of persuasion. They are especially important during argument and instructions to members (i.e., they are useful in applying evidence that has been received at trial).

B.    Three possible definitions

1.    An assumption. A truth or proposition drawn from another which is supposed or admitted to be true.

2.    A deduction. A process of reasoning by which a fact or proposition sought to be established is deduced as a logical consequence from other facts, or a state of facts, already proved or admitted. This is essentially the manner in which circumstantial evidence may be used by the trier of fact.

3.    A maxim. Well-recognized examples of the application of logic and experience to circumstantial evidence.

Thus, the drawing of inferences is not mandatory, and their weight or effect is to be measured only in terms of their logical value. The weight that should be given to any inference will depend upon all the circumstances attending the proven facts that give rise to the inference. If the inference is thought of as a "rational conclusion" to be "built" by logic, the inference's total strength will depend on the strength of the individual "bricks" of factual proof. Mandatory inferences would also be unconstitutional. See Morissette v. United States, supra.

C.    Weighing the logic of inferences. The fact that evidence is introduced to show the nonexistence of a fact which might be inferred from proof of other facts does not, if the evidence can reasonably be disbelieved, necessarily destroy the logical value of the inference, but the rebutting evidence must be weighed against the inference. The same is true if the evidence is introduced to show the nonexistence of the facts upon which the inference is based.

1. In drawing and weighing inferences, and in considering evidence introduced in rebuttal thereof, common sense and a general knowledge of human nature and the ordinary affairs of life should be applied.

2. Example. The prosecution proves:

- a. A wallet is missing from X's locker; plus
- b. the wallet is found in the accused's locker; plus
- c. X didn't authorize anyone to take it;
- d. equals an inference that A stole the wallet.

The defense proves:

- a. X left his locker unlocked;
- b. A was on liberty at the time of the taking; and
- c. A denies the taking and says he never saw the wallet until the chief master-at-arms searched his locker and found it.

The court may choose to believe or disbelieve the government's evidence, defense evidence, or both; in fact, it is the function of the fact-finder to determine the witness' credibility and weight to be given to the evidence. Consider in this regard the instruction in the Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, Inst. 7-3 (Update 1992):

In this case, evidence has been introduced that [foundational fact, e.g.,] (a letter correctly addressed and properly stamped was placed in the mail). . . . Based upon this evidence you may justifiably infer that [inferred fact e.g.,] (the letter was delivered to the addressee). . . . The drawing of this inference is not required and the weight and effect of this evidence, if any, will depend upon all the facts and circumstances as well as other evidence in the case.

D. Examples

1. Since most persons are sane, it may be inferred that a certain person is sane and that he was sane at any given time. Thus, it may be inferred that a victim was sane at the time of the offense and is sane at the time of trial. The inference of sanity permits consideration of all the evidence in the light of the general human experience that most persons are sane.

2. It may be inferred that a sane person intended the natural and probable consequences of acts shown to have been intentionally committed by him.

3. It may be inferred that a condition shown to have existed at one time continues to exist.

4. Proof that a letter correctly addressed and properly stamped or franked was deposited in the mail will support an inference that it was delivered to the addressee, and a similar inference is permissible in regard to telegrams regularly filed with a telegraph company for transmission. United States v. Albright, 14 C.M.R. 883 (A.F.B.R. 1954).

5. Identity of name ordinarily will support an inference of identity of person. Whether or not this inference may be drawn in a particular case, and the weight to be given to the inference if it is drawn, will depend upon how common the name is and upon any other existing circumstances.

6. When it is shown that a person was in possession of recently stolen property, it may be inferred that the person stole the property and, if it is shown that the property was stolen from a certain place at a certain time and under certain circumstances, that the person stole it from that place at that time and under those circumstances. See United States v. Pasha, 24 M.J. 87 (C.M.A. 1987). Instructions on the possession of recently stolen property are set forth in Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, Inst. 3-90, note 5 (Update 1993).

7. It may be inferred that one who has assumed the custody of another's property has stolen the property if he refuses or fails to account for or deliver it when an accounting or delivery is due. See United States v. Lyons, 14 C.M.A. 67, 33 C.M.R. 279 (1963); United States v. Crowell, 9 C.M.A. 43, 25 C.M.R. 305 (1958).

E. Contradicting or inconsistent inferences. The fact that one or more inferences contradict or are inconsistent with one or more other inferences does not necessarily neutralize or destroy the inferences on either side of the question. The relative weights of conflicting inferences should be assessed in accordance with the logical value of each in the light of all attendant circumstances. See United States v. Patrick, 2 C.M.A. 189, 7 C.M.R. 65 (1953).

F. Circumstantial evidence and inferences

1. Circumstantial evidence is defined as evidence of an indirect nature; evidence of facts or circumstances from which the existence or nonexistence of a fact in issue may be inferred. See generally Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, Inst. 7-3 (Update 1992).

2. Many inferences are the result of circumstantial evidence. The weight to be given such an inference, and thus circumstantial evidence, will depend upon all the circumstances attending the proved facts that give rise to it. For an extensive collection of examples of inferences arising from circumstantial evidence, see J. Munster and M. Larkin, Military Evidence 88-120 (2d ed. 1978).

0414 COMMON INFERENCES IN MILITARY LAW. The following list of common inferences is offered for the reader's consideration. Remember that inferences are permissive and their usefulness is dependent upon the strength of the underlying circumstantial evidence, the situation of the particular case, and the use to which counsel desires to put the inference. This list is not inclusive; the number of permissible inferences is limited only by logic, facts, and the persuasiveness of counsel.

A. Intent. If the court members find the accused intentionally committed an act, they may infer that he intended the natural and probable consequences of the act. See, e.g., Part IV, para. 54c(4)(b)(ii), MCM, 1984. [hereinafter Part IV, para. ____] (intentional infliction of grievous bodily harm).

B. Mails. If the court members find that an individual deposited a correctly addressed and properly stamped letter in the mails, they may infer that the letter was delivered to the addressee. United States v. Albright, supra.

C. Possession of stolen property. If the court members find that the accused was in personal, conscious, and exclusive possession of recently stolen goods, they may infer that he stole the property. United States v. Pasha, supra; United States v. Hairston, 9 C.M.A. 554, 26 C.M.R. 334 (1958).

D. Larceny. An intent to steal may be proved by circumstantial evidence. Thus, if a person secretly takes property, hides it, and denies knowing anything about it, an intent to steal may be inferred; if the property was taken openly and returned, this would tend to negate such an intent. Part IV, para. 46c(1)(f)(ii).

E. Forgery. If the court members find that the accused possessed and uttered a forged instrument, they may infer that he was the forger. United States v. Cook, 15 C.M.R. 876 (A.F.B.R. 1954).

F. Stolen property. If the court members find that the accused stole a part of a body of stolen property, they may infer that he stole the remainder. United States v. Sparks, 21 C.M.A. 134, 44 C.M.R. 188 (1971).

G. Drug possession. If the court members find that the accused had knowing, personal possession of narcotics or marijuana, they may infer the possession was wrongful. Part IV, para. 37c(5).

H. Bad checks. If the court members find that the accused drawer or maker did not pay a check within five days after notice that the drawee bank refused to pay on presentment because of insufficient funds, they may infer both an intent to defraud and knowledge of the account's insufficiency. UCMJ, art. 123a; Part IV, para. 49c(17).

0415 A USE FOR PRESUMPTIONS / INFERENCES: BURDENS OF PROOF. As noted above, presumptions frequently impose or allocate the "burdens of proof" at trial and are therefore not solely evidentiary concepts, but are also procedural devices for determining the order of proof in a case or for litigation of an issue within a case. These presumptions are based on experience, probability, public policy, and convenience. The term "burden of proof" is actually a broad general term incorporating two separate burdens: the burden of persuasion and the burden of going forward with the evidence.

A. Burden of persuasion

1. The party with the burden of persuasion as to a given issue bears the risk of losing on that issue if they do not affirmatively persuade the trier of fact to accept their position.

2. In courts-martial, the burden of persuasion is allocated as follows:

a. The government has the ultimate burden of persuasion as to the accused's guilt, applying the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard, as to:

(1) The elements of offenses charged, and

(2) once a defense (other than insanity) is placed in issue, proving beyond a reasonable doubt that the defense did not exist. R.C.M. 916(b).

b. Except where the Rules for Courts-Martial and / or the Military Rules of Evidence otherwise provide, the burden of persuasion on any factual issue which is necessary to decide a motion is on the moving party. R.C.M. 905c(2)(A).

(1) Rule for Courts-Martial 905c(2)(B) specifically places the burden of persuasion on the prosecution with regard to a motion to dismiss for lack of jurisdiction, denial of the right to speedy trial, or the running of the statute of limitations. See also Mil.R.Evid. 304(e) (the burden of proof is on the prosecution with regard to the admissibility of a confession); Mil.R.Evid. 311(e) (following a motion to suppress evidence on the grounds of unlawful search and seizure, the prosecution has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that the evidence was not obtained as a result of an unlawful search and seizure); Mil.R.Evid. 321(d) (following a motion to suppress the eyewitness identification of the accused, the burden of proof is upon the prosecution to rebut the defense complaint).

(2) The burden of proof on any factual issue which is necessary to decide a motion is generally by a preponderance of the evidence. R.C.M. 905c(1).

3. The amount of proof required. After determining who has the burden of persuasion, the next question is: What degree of persuasion will be sufficient to find that the burden has been satisfied?

a. The law recognizes three commonly used degrees of persuasion, depending upon the type of issue involved.

(1) A preponderance of the evidence. This test, used mostly for interlocutory issues, is met by showing that the existence of a particular fact is more probable than not (i.e., more than 50 percent of the evidence supports existence of the fact). (Numbers and percentages are used here merely for ease of explanation. The reader must be careful to note that this has nothing to do with the number of witnesses nor the length and quantity of evidence. It is a way of describing the quality of evidence or the degree of persuasion developed by the evidence. One believable witness may overcome one hundred unbelievable witnesses.)

(2) Clear and convincing evidence. This test requires a somewhat higher degree of proof than preponderance of the evidence and is used in consent search litigation. See Mil.R.Evid. 314(e)(5).

(3) Proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The trier of fact must be convinced to an evidentiary certainty of the truth of the charge. If there remains a reasonable possibility that the accused is not guilty, even though it is not a likelihood, he must be found not guilty. The quantity of evidence is not the real test. The real question is whether the force of the evidence leaves the military judge or court members convinced of an accused's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and to an evidentiary certainty. See R.C.M. 918(c) and 920(e) and Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, Update page 2-68 (1994).

b. In comparing the three types of tests, the trier of fact must either find that the fact is (1) probably true (preponderance), (2) highly probably true (clear and convincing), or

(3) almost certainly true (reasonable doubt test).

B. *Burden of going forward

1. The party with the burden of going forward bears the risk of losing on an issue if insufficient evidence is presented to submit the issue to the trier of fact for decision.

2. Allocating the burden. Allocation of the burden of going forward is made for reasons of legal logic, plus consideration of such things as ease of proof, access to sources of evidence, and public policies favoring a particular result. Access to sources of evidence plays a major role in placing the burden of going forward on one party or the other.

a. The general rule is that the party having the burden of persuasion on an issue also has the burden of going forward (e.g., the government must both go forward with evidence as to every element of the offense and persuade the trier of fact that each element exists beyond a reasonable doubt).

b. There are numerous exceptions to this rule, however.

(1) The accused generally has the burden of going forward on most defenses (e.g., self-defense, entrapment).

(2) The accused may also bear this burden as to some interlocutory matters (e.g., an attack on a search warrant valid on its face).

c. Example: In an assault and battery charge, the prosecution calls witness A who testifies that he saw D strike V with a club and that V was rendered unconscious and bleeding. Without more, the prosecution has established a prima facie case of assault and battery (i.e., a case that would be legally sufficient to convict the accused). The law generally places upon the accused the burden of going forward with the defense of self-defense. D then testifies that, on two prior occasions within the last several days, V has threatened to kill him. D relates how V ran toward him with an object that looked like a knife, that D feared for his life and struck V with a baseball bat. The fact-finder must now decide whether D has adequately established self-defense. It should be noted that D bears the burden of going forward with the issue of self-defense because only he can know of the prior threats on his life; only he can know that, in his own mind, he feared for his life.

0416 ATTACKING PRESUMPTIONS AND INFERENCES. Since there are no mandatory or conclusive presumptions or inferences in the military, all are subject to attack. The opposing party can attack either the foundational fact or the presumed / inferred fact, or both.

A. Attacking the foundational fact. The opponent may attempt to prevent a finding of the foundational fact (fact A below) in the presumption or the inference; in which case, the fact-finder is precluded from reaching the presumption or inference. This can be done by:

1. Rebutting the existence of A:
  - a. Directly (e.g., opposition witness testifies that non-A existed); or
  - b. circumstantially (e.g., opposition witness testifies that circumstances were such that A could not, or at least probably did not, exist)
2. Attacking evidence from which A is to be found (e.g., by impeaching proponent's witnesses who testified that A exists).
3. Note that the opponent is never bound to rebut A. He can do nothing and hope that the fact-finder does not find A. In some cases he may get a ruling by the judge that, as a matter of law, insufficient evidence has been presented from which A might be found.

B. Attacking the presumed or inferred fact. On the other hand, the opponent may not dispute the foundational fact (facts) but may attack the fact (fact B) inferred from A.

1. Rebutting the existence of B. With either a presumption or an inference, the opponent can attempt to prove non-B. This can also be done by rebutting the existence of B in either or both of two ways:
  - a. Directly (e.g., opposition witness testifies that non-B existed); or
  - b. circumstantially (e.g., opposition witness testifies that circumstances were such that B could not or probably did not exist).
2. Note that, in cases where a true presumption is recognized, failure of the opponent to rebut the inference of B as shown above means that B is no longer in issue, only A is.
3. Attack the inference itself as a factual question. In the case of an inference, the opponent can, even if he presents no rebuttal to B, still argue to the fact-finder that the logical weight of the inference is insufficient for it to be drawn in this case. It is possible that the fact-finder will not draw the inference, even if there is no rebutting evidence. This luxury is not available to one faced by a presumption, although a similar argument can be made in the face of a rebutted presumption.
4. Attack the presumption or inference as a legal question. The opponent can argue that, as a matter of law, the presumption or inference should not be permitted to work against him in this case (e.g., no instruction given to court members by the military judge) because the logical connection between A and B is insufficient to permit a finding of B merely upon proof of A. (In the case of the accused as opponent, this argument will be based on constitutional due process standards. See section 0417, infra).

a. This argument might be based on the specific facts in the case (e.g., the way in which A arose here makes B inherently unlikely).

b. The argument might also be based on general or special broad-based knowledge [e.g., the sort relied upon by the Supreme Court in Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6 (1969)].

0417 CONSTITUTIONAL CONSIDERATIONS: DUE PROCESS LIMITATIONS ON THE USE OF PRESUMPTIONS AND INFERENCES. Despite the fact that the law of evidence recognizes presumptions and inferences, questions have arisen as to the propriety of their use in certain circumstances, particularly as they relate to constitutional considerations.

A. Proof of elements. Due process requires that the government establish guilt by proving "every fact necessary to constitute the crime" beyond a reasonable doubt. In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 363 (1970).

1. In Mullaney v. Wilbur, 421 U.S. 684 (1975), the Supreme Court held that the prosecution must prove not only criminality, but the degree of criminality, by proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and that the government cannot shift this burden to the accused by recharacterizing an essential element as something else (e.g., as a mitigating factor).

2. The Court of Military Appeals discussed the government's burden of proof as defined by Winship, Mullaney, and other Supreme Court cases, in United States v. Verdi, 5 M.J. 330 (C.M.A. 1978) (burden of proof never shifts to the accused to establish innocence or to disprove the facts necessary to establish the crime charged).

B. When may a permissible inference operate against the accused?

1. At one time, either a rational connection between a foundational and an inferred fact or just comparative "convenience of proof" was enough for a presumption to operate against the accused. Morrison v. California, 291 U.S. 82 (1934).

2. In Tot v. United States, 319 U.S. 463 (1943), the comparative convenience test of Morrison, supra, was discarded, and rational connection between foundational fact and inferred fact was found to be a necessary and sufficient condition.

3. Subsequently, in Leary v. United States, 395 U.S. 6, 36 (1969), rational connection was construed to mean probative sufficiency rather than mere logical relevance:

[A] criminal statutory presumption must be regarded as "irrational" or "arbitrary," and hence unconstitutional, unless it can at least be said with substantial assurance that the presumed fact is more likely than not to flow from the proved fact on which it is made to depend.

(Note: The Supreme Court uses the word "presumption" here to describe a permissible inference). In Leary, supra, a statute provided that possession of marijuana, unless satisfactorily explained, was sufficient to prove that the defendant knew that the marijuana had been illegally imported into the United States. The Court concluded that, in view of the significant possibility that any given marijuana was domestically grown and the improbability that a marijuana user would know whether his marijuana was of domestic or imported origin, the inference permitted by the statute was "irrational or arbitrary." Hence, the presumption was unconstitutional because it could not be said with substantial assurance that the presumed fact (the marijuana was imported) was more likely than not to flow from the proved fact (accused possessed marijuana) on which it was made to depend.

4. Does Leary's preponderance standard satisfy the requirement of proof beyond a reasonable doubt when an inference is used to establish an essential element against the accused? Probably not.

a. In two cases, however, the Supreme Court has expressly avoided deciding this issue. In both, the Court upheld inferences on grounds that they satisfied the beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard, without actually holding that is the necessary standard.

(1) Turner v. United States, 396 U.S. 398 (1970) (statutory inference).

(2) Barnes v. United States, 412 U.S. 837, 846 (1973) (in reference to a common law inference, the court noted "[s]ince the inference ... satisfies the reasonable-doubt standard, the most stringent standard the Court has applied in judging permissive criminal law inferences, we conclude that it satisfies the requirements of due process.").

b. The military rule appears to be the beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard. United States v. Ford, 23 M.J. 331 (C.M.A. 1987). A permissible inference must meet the beyond-a-reasonable-doubt standard in order to operate against an accused, at least where the inference supplies an essential element of the offense.

C. Instructions

1. Instructions regarding an inference should be carefully worded so as not to mislead the court members as to the nature and effect of the inference. Counsel should carefully scrutinize the military judge's instructions. See, e.g., Military Judge's Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, Inst. 3-90 Note 5 (Update 1993).

2. United States v. Lake, 482 F.2d 146 (9th Cir. 1973), specifies four considerations in evaluating an instruction concerning an inference:

- a. No mention is made of the word "presumption";
- b. although the defendant might produce evidence to disprove the inference, he is under no burden to do so;
- c. it is explained to the court members that they are not in any way compelled to accept the inference; and
- d. the instruction unequivocally places and maintains the burden of proof on the government.

PART THREE: STIPULATIONS

0418 INTRODUCTION. Stipulations are substitutes for evidence which is not otherwise in dispute. The proper use of stipulations allows counsel to save valuable time and effort and to focus litigation (and the attention of the trier of fact) on the important issues in a case; essentially, to produce a better trial and, hopefully, more justice. This section addresses the types, admissibility, and procedures for the use of stipulations at courts-martial.

0419 DEFINITION. A stipulation is an oral or written agreement between the trial counsel and the defense counsel with the express consent of the accused as to:

- A. The existence or nonexistence of any fact (a stipulation of fact);
- B. the contents of a writing (a stipulation of a document's contents); or
- C. the sworn testimony of a certain person if he / she were present in court to testify as a witness (a stipulation of expected testimony). R.C.M. 811.

Examples

Stipulations of fact: The accused is tried for hazarding a vessel. The facts of collision, date, location, and damage are not in dispute and, therefore, can be the subject for stipulation between the parties with the express consent of the accused; counsel would not be able to challenge the accuracy or existence of the fact.

Stipulations of a document's contents: The ship's deck log for the vessel contains entries indicating the weather conditions at the time of the collision, the heading and ordered speed of the vessel, and distances and bearings to navigational aids. The trial and defense counsel, with the express consent of the accused, could stipulate that the deck log did actually contain such entries, yet counsel would be able to challenge the accuracy of the entries (i.e., by offering evidence that the weather conditions were other than as indicated).

Stipulation of expected testimony: In the same trial for hazarding a vessel, if the commanding officer were present at trial, he would testify that the accused was the assigned OOD at the time of the collision and that he was in uniform and properly posted. The trial and defense counsel could, with the express consent of the accused, stipulate that the commanding officer would so testify, yet counsel could challenge the accuracy or credibility of the testimony.

Inasmuch as a stipulation is a bilateral agreement between the parties, it must be distinguished from "consent" to dispense with the introduction of certain evidence or a conscious, silent waiver concerning the introduction of evidence. Both of these are unilateral and generally may not operate to relieve a party from the necessity of offering evidence on an issue material to the case.

0420 TYPES OF STIPULATIONS

A. Stipulation of fact. A stipulation of fact admits the existence or nonexistence of certain facts; that is, the truth of the facts stated in the stipulation. Once the stipulation of fact is properly received by the court, the parties are bound in the sense that they may not introduce evidence to contradict the stipulated fact. An example of a stipulation of fact is set forth in United States v. Long, 3 M.J. 400 (C.M.A. 1977) (stipulation that substance seized from the accused's automobile was marijuana).

B. Stipulation of a document's contents. This type of stipulation is really a hybrid type of stipulation. This is a stipulation to the fact that the writing contains entries, yet the trier of fact will consider the entries themselves as an equivalent of testimony, giving no greater weight or evidentiary value to the substance of the entries merely because the parties agree that the entries exist. The parties are bound in the sense that they may not deny that the document contains the stipulated statements. However, they may raise independent evidentiary objections to the statements and introduce evidence to contradict the statements contained in the document.

C. Stipulation of expected testimony. A stipulation of expected testimony admits that, if a certain person were present in court as a witness, he or she would give certain testimony under oath. Such a stipulation does not admit the truth of the indicated testimony, nor does it add anything to the weight or evidentiary nature of the testimony. The parties are bound in the sense that they may not deny that, if called as a witness, the individual would give the stipulated testimony. However, they may raise independent evidentiary objections to the statements in the testimony and may introduce evidence to contradict the statements in the testimony.

0421 ADMISSIBILITY

A. General

1. A stipulation may not be properly accepted into evidence where any doubt exists as to the accused's understanding of the stipulation procedure and its significance. R.C.M. 811(c). The military judge normally ensures such understanding by asking the accused if she has read the stipulation (if written) or heard counsel's statement of the stipulation (if oral), understands its contents, understands that she is not bound to stipulate, understands the effect of the stipulation, and determines that she (the accused) has not been pressured or coerced into entering the stipulation. If it is a stipulation of fact, the military judge will ask the accused if she admits the facts as stipulated are true and that such facts cannot be later controverted by her.

2. Joint or common trials. One accused may not, without the co-accused's express consent, stipulate to facts incriminating the latter. See United States v. Thompson, 11 C.M.A. 252, 29 C.M.R. 68 (1960). When, in a joint or common trial, a stipulation is received which was made by only one or some of the accused, the members of the court should be instructed that the stipulation may be considered only with respect to the accused person or persons who joined in it. R.C.M. 812 discussion, MCM, 1984.

3. A stipulation that, if true, would operate as a complete defense to an offense charged should not be received in evidence. R.C.M. 811(b) discussion, MCM, 1984.

B. Confessional stipulations

1. In United States v. Bertelson, 3 M.J. 314, 315 n.2 (C.M.A. 1977), the court defined a "confessional stipulation" to be "a stipulation which practically amounts to a confession. We believe that a stipulation can be said to amount 'practically' to a judicial confession when, for all facts and purpose, it constitutes a de facto plea of guilty, i.e., it is the equivalent of entering a guilty plea to the charge."

2. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has held that such a stipulation is permissible if the military judge makes a detailed inquiry to ensure that the consent of the accused to it is knowing, voluntary, and intelligent. See also United States v. Honeycutt, 29 M.J. 416 (C.M.A. 1990). The court equated such a stipulation to a plea of guilty and, therefore, it imposed the same judicial scrutiny as mandated by United States v. Care, 18 C.M.A. 535, 40 C.M.R. 247 (C.M.A. 1969), in the extraordinary situation where this type of fact stipulation might be desired by the accused. The court emphasized, however, that the government cannot circumvent Art. 45, UCMJ, and thus the accused may not be forced to forego litigation of any motion or defense as a condition of this type of stipulation. United States v. Bertelson, supra.

a. In United States v. Aiello, 7 M.J. 99 (C.M.A. 1979), the court summarized the requirements Bertelson placed upon the military judge:

(1) The military judge must personally apprise the accused:

(a) that the stipulation may not be accepted without the accused's consent;

(b) that the government has the burden of proving beyond a reasonable doubt every element of the offense(s) charged; and

(c) that, by stipulating to the material elements of the offense, the accused alleviates that burden.

(2) The military judge must also conduct an inquiry similar to that required by United States v. Care, supra.

b. The discussion to Rule for Courts-Martial 811(c) delineates a more detailed inquiry by the military judge, noting that:

If the stipulation practically amounts to a confession to an offense to which a not guilty plea is outstanding, it may not be accepted unless the military judge ascertains: (A) from the accused that the accused understands the right not to stipulate and that the stipulation will not be accepted without the accused's consent; that the accused understands the contents and effect of the stipulation; that a factual basis exists for the stipulation; and that the accused, after consulting with counsel, consents to the stipulation; and (B) from the accused and counsel for each party whether there are any agreements between the parties in connection with the stipulation, and, if so, what the terms of such agreements are.

R.C.M. 811(c) discussion, MCM, 1984.

3. The use of confessional stipulations in appropriate cases (e.g., when a conviction is assured if a motion or objection is denied or overruled) may have certain advantages for the accused. First, since the government enters into pretrial agreements primarily to save time and money, the accused may be able to negotiate a favorable pretrial agreement as to the maximum punishment that the convening authority will approve. The accused then would be able to obtain the favorable sentence limitation provisions of the pretrial agreement while being able to plead not guilty and preserve any denied suppression motions for appellate review. For a detailed discussion of the waiver effect of a guilty plea in a case involving suppression motions under Mil.R.Evid. 304 or 311, see chapters XII and XIII, infra. A confessional stipulation may also limit the volume of evidence presented at trial and, therefore, the facts favorable to the government may be limited to the minimum necessary.

Additionally, if the confessional stipulation procedure is pursued, defense counsel should consider requesting an instruction that the accused's confessional stipulation is a matter to be considered in mitigation, the same as if he had pleaded guilty. While the accused is not entitled as a matter of law to such an instruction in a not guilty plea case, a strong argument can be made that such an instruction should be given since the effect of the accused's stipulation is the same as if he had pleaded guilty.

4. Although the confessional stipulation may be beneficial to both parties, trial counsel has an added burden to ensure that the military judge conducts proper Bertelson inquiries. The dangers are pointed out in two cases: United States v. Bray, 12 M.J. 553 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981)

(proceedings in revision necessary to inform accused of rights, with possible setting aside of findings of guilty) and United States v. Hagy, 12 M.J. 739 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981), petition denied, 13 M.J. 204 (C.M.A. 1982) (military judge failed to conduct inquiry when stipulation accepted, but defense presented evidence prior to findings that was consistent with factual stipulation but inconsistent with prima facie admission of guilt. The court held the factual stipulation ceased to be a confessional stipulation prior to findings and, hence, no warnings required. The court noted, however, that a prudent military judge should conduct an inquiry prior to accepting any factual stipulation admitting inculpatory facts necessary for a conviction.).

C. Stipulations of expected testimony. Stipulations of expected testimony can be used in any situation where a live witness could be called to testify (e.g., to give direct or circumstantial evidence on the merits of the case or on sentencing, or evidence relevant to witness credibility or character evidence). Stipulations of expected testimony are subject to the rules of evidence in the same manner as the live testimony of a witness. See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 608a (credibility of a witness may be attacked by opinion or reputation evidence).

0422 EFFECT OF STIPULATING

A. General

1. A party may withdraw from an agreement to stipulate or from a stipulation at any time before the stipulation is received in evidence. R.C.M. 811(d). The fact that a written stipulation was signed is not controlling.

2. Also, the military judge may, as a matter of discretion, permit a party to withdraw from a stipulation that has been received in evidence, and the stipulation must be disregarded by the court. R.C.M. 811(d).

3. Absent special circumstances, it will usually be inferred that parties to a stipulation intended it to remain effective in all subsequent phases of the same litigation (including a rehearing, new trial, or "other trial"). This inference of continuing intent will permit the acceptance of the stipulation in the later phase even over objection by the party against whom it is to be used. See, e.g., United States v. Mills, 12 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1981) (condition in pretrial agreement allowing for stipulation of expected testimony in sentencing upon rehearing held enforceable).

-- The inference of continuing intent to stipulate will not apply where the stipulation of fact was made pursuant to a guilty plea at the first trial and where the accused pleads not guilty at the later proceeding involving the same matter (e.g., at a rehearing, it will not be admitted over the accused's objection to prove his guilt, impeach his credibility, or to aid the government in any other manner). See United States v. Daniels, 11 C.M.A. 52, 28 C.M.R. 276 (1959).

Note: In light of the above, counsel desiring to enter into a stipulation for limited use (for example, at an article 32 investigation only) should ensure that this intent for limited use is made a clear part of the record of proceedings to prevent later contrary use by the government.

B. Stipulation of fact

1. Attack or withdrawal. Unless it is properly ordered stricken from the record or withdrawn, a stipulation of fact that has been received into evidence may not be contradicted by the parties thereto. R.C.M. 811(e).

2. Stipulated authenticity. The stipulation as to the authenticity of a document is a stipulation of fact that the document is what it purports to be. Such stipulations are commonly entered into concerning pages from the service records of the accused.

Note: Such a stipulation is not a stipulation as to the admissibility of the document, and thus the admissibility may still be attacked on other grounds, such as relevancy or competency. See United States v. Glazier, 26 M.J. 268 (C.M.A. 1988). This stipulation of authenticity should be distinguished from a mere waiver of the issue by failure to object, although the practical effect would be the same.

3. Effect of acceptance on court members. Once a stipulation of fact is properly accepted at a trial with members, it is then placed before them and they are authorized to accept the stipulation, but they are not bound to find the stipulated fact.

C. Stipulation of expected testimony

1. A stipulation of expected testimony does not admit the truth of the indicated testimony, nor does it add anything to the weight or the evidentiary nature of the testimony. R.C.M. 811(e).

2. Stipulated testimony may be attacked, contradicted, or explained in the same way as if the witness had actually testified in person. R.C.M. 811(e).

3. With court members, a stipulation of expected testimony is merely read into evidence. R.C.M. 811(f). Unlike a stipulation of fact, a written stipulation of testimony is never examined by the members, except in the rare case of a special court-martial without a military judge. In that case, the president of the court would examine it to determine admissibility.

PROCEDURES

A. Preparation. To avoid any misunderstanding, stipulations of fact or expected testimony should be prepared in writing and verbatim in advance of trial, and any disagreements as to content should be resolved at that time. While it is advisable to prepare the stipulation in writing, oral stipulations may also be presented and received at trial. Defense counsel should fully advise the accused as to the nature and content of any stipulation and obtain his or her concurrence. A stipulation may contain matter favorable to both the prosecution and the accused.

B. Use during trial

1. Oral stipulations. The following language is considered appropriate for counsel presenting an oral stipulation:

a. Oral stipulation of fact

TC: With the express consent of the accused, it is hereby stipulated by and between the prosecution and the defense that the following facts are true: the accused surrendered himself to military authorities at the station guardhouse, NETC, Newport, RI, on 1 August 19CY. At the time of his surrender, he was dressed in a Navy service dress blue uniform.

b. Oral stipulation of expected testimony

TC: With the express consent of the accused, it is hereby stipulated by and between the prosecution and the defense that, if John Jones were present in court and sworn as a witness, he would testify substantially as follows: "My name is John Jones. I am a member of the Toyson, Missouri, Police Department. On 1 August 19CY, Seaman Joe James came to me at the Bryant Avenue Police Station and told me that he was UA from his ship and wanted to turn himself in. At that time, Seaman Joe James was dressed in a Navy uniform."

Note: Oral stipulations—although permitted—should be avoided unless the matter is a simple one and can be concisely stated. Where the oral stipulation is detailed, and is to be recited by one party in open court, it may contain some objectionable statement or misstatement. The best solution is usually to recess for a time sufficient to prepare a written stipulation. At the very least, an article 39(a) session should be requested in a members case so that objectionable matter can be deleted if necessary.

2. Written stipulations

a. A written stipulation of fact should be placed before the court in the form of a prosecution or defense exhibit or an appellate exhibit, as appropriate. R.C.M. 811(f). For example:

TC: (Offering Prosecution Exhibit 8 for identification to defense counsel.) Does the defense care to examine Prosecution Exhibit 8 for identification?

DC: Yes, thank you. (DC inspects the exhibit.)

TC: (After showing the exhibit to defense counsel and the military judge) Prosecution Exhibit 8 for identification, which is a stipulation of fact entered into between the trial counsel and the defense counsel with the express consent of the accused, is offered in evidence as Prosecution Exhibit 8.

It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the prosecution and the defense, with the express consent of the accused, that the following facts are true:

Captain, USMC, Trial Counsel

GEORGE R. JOHNSON

b. A written stipulation of expected testimony is read into evidence. The writing itself is not shown to the members of the court, but should be marked and appended to the record as an appellate exhibit. R.C.M. 811(f).

It is hereby stipulated and agreed by and between the prosecution and the defense, with the express consent of the accused, that if John Jones, 545 Lyndale Avenue, South Toyson, Missouri, were present in court and sworn as a witness, he would testify substantially as follows:

On 1 August 19CY, I was a member of the Toyson, Missouri Police Department. On that date, Joe James came to me at the Bryant Avenue Police Station and told me that he was UA from his ship and wanted to turn himself in. At that time, Joe James was dressed in a Navy uniform.

GEORGE R. JOHNSON

JOE JAMES

Note: Before accepting a stipulation of fact or a stipulation of testimony, the military judge should assure himself that the accused understands the stipulation and its consequences and consents to its use. An inquiry of the accused should be conducted by the military judge.

Stipulations to the authenticity of service record book pages, common in court-martial practice, are usually entered into without the benefit of a writing.

C. Objections. The Military Rules of Evidence apply to the contents of stipulations. R.C.M. 811(e). Counsel may agree to stipulate, but may still wish to object to the admissibility of the substance of the stipulation. For example, if the government knows what a witness would testify if present, but claims the testimony is not admissible because it is irrelevant or hearsay not falling within an appropriate exception, the trial counsel could stipulate to the content of the expected testimony to save the government the expense of bringing the witness to the trial, yet still object to the admissibility of the expected testimony.

0424 CONCLUSION. In preparing a case for trial, counsel logically spend most of their time and effort on documentary or testimonial evidence. This is where counsel will "dazzle the members with their footwork." However, with proper use of the "substitutes for evidence" considered in this chapter, counsel will be able to economize on use of their time and efforts (and the government's money). This will also improve the litigation of cases by focusing on the "real" issues of a case.

CHAPTER V

RELEVANCY

0501 INTRODUCTION. The concept of relevancy is basic to the law of evidence. An item of evidence cannot be admitted unless it meets the test of relevancy. Military Rule of Evidence 402 [hereinafter Mil.R.Evid.]. This is a reflection of the fact that our system of law is a rational one built on the application of logic. As the Federal Rules of Evidence Advisory Committee noted in its note to Federal Rule of Evidence 402 [hereinafter Fed.R.Evid.]:

The provisions that all relevant evidence is admissible, with certain exceptions, and that evidence which is not relevant is not admissible are "a presupposition involved in the very conception of a rational system of evidence." Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence 264 (1898). They constitute the foundation upon which the structure of admission and exclusion rests.

The requirement for relevancy of evidence has been mentioned previously in chapter I in regard to the "admissibility formula" ( $AE=A+R+C$ ). Of the three concepts in the formula, authenticity, relevancy, and competency, relevancy is perhaps the most important and pervasive concept. For example, authenticity and competency of witnesses is normally met fairly easily by an oath (Mil.R.Evid. 603) and showing of personal knowledge (Mil.R.Evid. 601 and 602). Frequently, the relevancy of the witness' testimony is the only point of dispute between the parties.

0502 SCOPE OF THE CHAPTER. This chapter will examine sec. IV of the Mil.R.Evid., "Relevancy and Its Limits." This section deals with a potpourri of aspects of relevancy, ranging from the definition of relevancy (Mil.R.Evid. 401) to the admissibility of the payment of a victim's medical expenses (Mil.R.Evid. 409), to a "shield law" to protect the victims of nonconsensual sexual offenses (Mil.R.Evid. 412). It must be remembered that the concept of relevancy is not limited solely to sec. IV of the rules. It is subsumed into other Military Rules of Evidence (e.g., the "helpfulness" or "assistance" tests of opinion evidence under rules 701 and 702 and the "balancing test" for the general hearsay exception under rule 803(24) all assume some degree of relevance analysis). These and other rules with some relation to relevancy are considered in their respective sections of the text, but cross-references are made as appropriate.

As expressed by the Advisory Committee in the note to Fed.R.Evid. 401, "the variety of relevancy problems is co-extensive with the ingenuity of counsel in using circumstantial evidence as a means of proof. An enormous number of cases fall in no set pattern, and this rule [401] is designed as a guide for handling them." Part one of this chapter will examine the definitions of relevancy (Mil.R.Evid. 401), the general rule on the admissibility of relevant evidence (Mil.R.Evid. 402), and the "exclusionary rule" which may keep even relevant evidence from the fact-finder in a case (Mil.R.Evid. 403). The reader is cautioned at this point that these three rules must be read together; each has its own importance, yet none can stand completely alone. This point will be reiterated on occasion throughout the chapter, but the reader should bear it in mind as an implicit consideration, even if not explicitly stated in the text.

Some relevancy situations recur with sufficient frequency to create patterns susceptible of treatment by specific rules. Mil.R.Evid. 404-412 are of this variety. For ease of analysis, these rules can be divided into three groups, each of which will be examined separately. Mil.R.Evid. 404-406, dealing with the admissibility of character and habit evidence, are considered in part two of this chapter. As we will see, these rules are stated in terms of positive admissibility of appropriate evidence.

Mil.R.Evid. 407-412 are primarily rules of exclusion. They reflect policy determinations that certain types of evidence, although logically relevant under the general rule, should be made inadmissible for certain reasons. These serve as illustrations of the application of the exclusionary principles of Mil.R.Evid. 403 applied to recurring situations. Part three of this chapter examines Mil.R.Evid. 407-411 on miscellaneous situations. Mil.R.Evid. 412, because of its unique and extremely important nature, is considered in part four of this chapter. Mil. R. Evid. 413 and 414 are primarily rules of inclusion, reflecting policy decisions to admit certain evidence. These rules are discussed in part five of this chapter.

NOTE: The rules in sec. IV talk in terms of the "admissibility" of evidence rather than strictly "relevancy." Section IV use of the term "admissibility" relates to the language of rule 402 that "all relevant evidence is admissible" (emphasis added) and does not presume to be a conclusionary or mandatory pronouncement. Mil.R.Evid. 402. Authenticity and competency remain part of an overall admissibility determination.

PART ONE: GENERAL RELEVANCY

0503 GENERAL. Despite the fact that admissibility subsumes relevancy, the nature of the concept of relevancy is such as to evade definition. "Relevancy," as the Advisory Committee notes, "is not an inherent characteristic of any item of evidence but exists only as a relationship between an item of evidence and a matter properly provable in the case." Fed.R.Evid. 401 Advisory Committee note.

The overall goal of the general rules on relevancy might be summed up in the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee's note to rule 401: "Problems of relevancy call for an answer to the question whether an item of evidence, when tested by the processes of legal reasoning, possesses sufficient probative value to justify receiving it in evidence."

0504 DEFINITION OF RELEVANCY. Mil.R.Evid. 401 indicates: "Relevant evidence means evidence having any tendency to make the existence of any fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence."

A. *Language of the rule

1. Mil.R.Evid. 401 is taken verbatim from the Fed.R.Evid. Under this rule, evidence is relevant if it has "any tendency" (emphasis added) to make the existence of a fact in the case "more probable or less probable." Mil.R.Evid. 401. The evidence does not by itself have to prove the ultimate proposition for which it is offered. Anything that can help rationally decide a case is relevant. See, e.g., United States v. Ives, 609 F.2d 930 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 919 (1980), where the court held that weak, even remote, defense evidence of mental responsibility was erroneously rejected by the judge. As noted by the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee:

The standard of probability under the rule is "more . . . probable than it would be without the evidence." Any more stringent requirement is unworkable and unrealistic. As McCormick 152, p. 317, says, "[a] brick is not a wall", or, as Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 10 Rutgers L. Rev. 574, 576 (1956), quotes Professor McBaine, "[i]t is not to be supposed that every witness can make a home run." Dealing with probability in the language of the rule has the added virtue of avoiding confusion between questions of admissibility and questions of the sufficiency of the evidence.

Fed.R.Evid. 401 Advisory Committee note.

The language of the rule somewhat broadens the military definition of relevancy developed under pre-Mil.R.Evid. practice, as it abandons the former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 137, language that defined as "not relevant" evidence "too remote to have any appreciable probative value. . . ." Remoteness is now considered under rule 403, discussed infra, rather than as a limitation on the relevancy definition.

2. It should be noted that rule 401 does not use the word "materiality." The drafters of the Federal Rule, from which the Military Rule is taken, felt that the term "material" was loosely used and ambiguous. In pre-Mil.R.Evid. practice, the term "materiality" meant the same as relevancy, so this deletion of the term "materiality" should not affect military practice.

3. Some part of the common law terminology on the concept of materiality may survive, however, in the condition that relevant evidence must involve a fact "which is of consequence to the determination of the action." See Mil.R.Evid. 401 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-31. The ambiguous language "of consequence" has yet to be judicially determined to mean either an important issue or any issue actually in the case. Judging from the philosophy favoring admissibility under the rules, the conclusion probably will be a determination that "consequence" does not mean "important." In this regard, the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee notes that the "fact to be proved may be ultimate, intermediate, or evidentiary; it matters not. . . ." Fed.R.Evid. 401 Advisory Committee note.

4. A related issue is whether this "fact of consequence" need be disputed. The Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee states that:

The fact to which the evidence is directed need not be in dispute. While situations will arise which call for the exclusion of evidence offered to prove a point conceded by the opponent, the ruling should be made on the basis of such considerations as waste of time and undue prejudice (see Rule 403), rather than under any general requirement that evidence is admissible only if directed to matters in dispute. Evidence which is essentially background in nature can scarcely be said to involve disputed matter, yet it is universally offered and admitted as an aid to understanding. Charts, photographs, views of real estate, murder weapons, and many other items of evidence fall in this category. A rule limiting admissibility to evidence directed to a controversial point would invite the exclusion of this helpful evidence, or at least the raising of endless questions over its admission.

Fed.R.Evid. 401 Advisory Committee note.

Yet Saltzburg and Redden criticize this approach:

The first sentence of the final paragraph of the Advisory Committee's Note, infra, states that '[t]he fact to which the evidence is directed need not be in dispute. . . .' In our view the wording "fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action" requires that all proof be directed to the issues in dispute. Contrary to the suggestion of the Committee, illustrative evidence would not be barred under such a reading, as long as the illustrative evidence was reasonably related to a disputed issue. We believe the Advisory Committee's Note places undue reliance on Rule 403. Although we would probably reach the same result as the Committee in most cases, we think that it is important to emphasize the first step in a relevance analysis is to decide whether the trier of fact conceivably could be helped by evidence. If the answer is 'no,' the evidence should be excluded without reference to a balancing test which requires a specific demonstration of an extant evil before evidence is excluded.

S. Saltzburg and K. Redden, Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 154 (5th ed. 1990).

It remains to be seen which approach the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces will adopt. Defense counsel, however, must be careful to establish his position on the record by either objection or an offer of proof in order to preserve the review of parties position on appeal. See Mil.R.Evid. 103. Certainly a proper objection or offer of proof will help resolve the issues more correctly at the trial level before the case ever goes to appeal. See United States v. Leiker, 37 M.J. 418 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct 1056 (1994) (upon relevance objection, defense must make a proffer concerning the testimony's admissibility).

5. The reader should also consider the language "less probable" in the rule. Too frequently counsel think in terms of establishing the proposition that "X was the case." Evidence tending to establish that "X was not the case" is just as relevant under the rule. Either aspect increases our knowledge and enhances the likelihood of ascertaining the truth about the fact in issue.

B. Logical versus legal relevancy. The standard of relevancy adopted by rule 401 is usually termed "logical relevancy" as opposed to a theory of "legal relevancy." Logical relevance refers solely to the evidence's probative value, but ignores related dangers touching upon prejudice, collateral issues, time consumption, and unfair surprise. See generally McCormick, Evidence 184 (2d ed. 1972) and Trautman, Logical or Legal Relevancy—A Conflict in Theory, 5 Vand. L. Rev. 385 (1951). Legal relevancy generally requires that evidence submitted to the members have "something more than a minimum of probative value. Each single piece of evidence must have a plus value." 1 Wigmore, Evidence 28 (3d ed. 1940). Cf. United States v. Ravich, 421 F.2d 1196, 1203 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 834 (1970) (after quoting Wigmore's definition, the court noted that "others have taken an even more generous view," and cited the proposed Fed.R.Evid. 401). Pre-Mil.R.Evid. military practice tended to follow this higher "legal relevancy" standard. See former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 137, discussed infra.

To the extent that the Manual's definition includes consideration of "legal relevance," those considerations are adequately addressed by such other Rules as Rules 403 and 609. See, e.g., E. Imwinkelried, P. Giannelli, F. Gilligan & F. Lederer, Criminal Evidence 62-65 (1979) (which, after defining "logical relevance" as involving only probative value, states at 63 that "under the rubric of 'legal relevance,' the courts have imposed an additional requirement that the item's probative value outweighs any attendant probative dangers.")

It may seem to the reader that there really is little difference in result between the two approaches to relevancy. The distinction is one of burdens: Under "legal relevancy" the proponent has the entire burden of showing how the probative value outweighs the prejudicial value, while under the "logical relevancy" theory the proponent has a smaller threshold to cross and the burden of trying the balancing test is essentially on the opponent.

C. Determination of relevancy

1. General. Rule 401 furnishes no standards for the determination of relevancy, but it implicitly recognizes that questions of relevancy cannot be resolved by mechanical resort to legal formulas. Logic and experience are the main guides for determination of the relevancy issue by the military judge. See Thayer, A Preliminary Treatise on Evidence 265 (1898) ("The law furnishes no test of relevancy. For this, it tacitly refers to logic and general experience, assuming that the principles of reasoning are known to judges and ministers, just as a vast multitude of other things are assumed as already sufficiently known to them.") See, e.g., United States v. Allison, 474 F.2d 286, 289 (5th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 851, 9 S.Ct. 95 (1974) (court reversed conviction because entire transcript of defendant's grand jury testimony had been admitted even though large portion was not relevant; noting that "The determination of relevancy is not automatic or mechanical. Courts cannot employ a precise, technical, legalistic test for relevancy; instead, they must apply logical standards applicable to every day life. The relevancy or irrelevancy of particular evidence, therefore, turns on the facts of the individual case." See generally J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence 401[01] (1988).

2. Military judge's discretion. In view of the vagueness of the standards set forth in rule 401, it appears that the military judge is afforded broad discretion in ruling on issues of relevancy. See Mil.R.Evid. 403 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-32. See also Rosenberg, Judicial Discretion, 38 The Ohio Bar 819 (1965); United States v. Robinson, 560 F.2d 507 (2d Cir. 1977) (en banc), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 905 (1978). The judge should consider not only whether the admission of evidence is likely to advance the cause, but also whether its absence might produce negative inferences that would unfairly hurt a party (i.e., the absence of evidence might be probative to a jury). See generally Saltzburg, A Special

Aspect of Relevance, Countering Negative Inferences Associated with the Absence of Evidence, 66 Calif. L. Rev. 1011 (1978).

As an example of what the judge may be called upon to do, McCormick considers whether evidence of an attempt at suicide by the defendant may be introduced at his murder trial as relevant to show consciousness of guilt. McCormick concluded:

There are no statistics for attempts at suicides by those conscious of guilt and those not so conscious which will shed light on the probability of the inference. The answer must filter through the judge's experience, his judgment, and his knowledge of human conduct and motivation. He must ask himself, could a reasonable jury believe that the attempt makes it more probable that he was conscious of guilt, and if the answer is yes, the evidence is relevant.

C. McCormick, Evidence Handbook on the Law 438 (2nd ed. 1972).

3. Nexus required

a. Determinations of relevancy, therefore, are based on the presence of a nexus; that is, a relationship between the evidence offered for admission and a fact or issue of consequence to the case. In many instances it will be obvious why evidence is relevant, and no purpose would be served by spending valuable judicial resources rehearing what is clear to everyone participating at trial. But, in some cases, the relation of evidence to an issue in the case is obscure. The military judge may be unclear as to the relationship of the evidence to the facts and issues of the case and may require counsel to explain the purpose in offering the evidence. In order for the military judge to give proper limiting instructions under rule 105, and to strike a proper balance between probative value and prejudicial effect under rules 105 and 403, the judge must be sure that there is no doubt as to why the evidence is being offered. When a doubt arises, the military judge can ask counsel offering the evidence, and counsel should be prepared to explain in detail, the rationale for the offer of evidence. If counsel fails to explain satisfactorily the significance of the evidence, the military judge may exclude it without error. Compare United States v. Leiker, 37 M.J. 418 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1056 (1994) (defense counsel's failure to proffer why the objected to evidence was relevant constituted waiver of issue) with United States v. Dorsey, 16 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1983) (defense counsel's offer of proof displayed that the excluded evidence was relevant, material, and vital to the defense). For evidence produced by the government in rebuttal, the nexus of relevance must be determined in light of evidence first introduced and issues initially raised by the defense at trial. United States v. Wirth, 18 M.J. 214 (C.M.A. 1984).

b. Determination of nexus—three-part analysis. Where relevancy is not immediately apparent, the military judge and counsel should clearly identify the terms of the relevancy relationship in the particular case. This relationship can be identified by a three-part analysis; that is, the military judge and counsel should:

- (1) Describe the item of evidence being offered;
  - (2) identify the fact of consequence to which it is directed;
- and
- (3) state the hypothesis required to infer the consequential fact from the evidence.

Without this analysis, it is impossible to decide how the evidence may alter the probability of the existence of the consequential fact. If it cannot be demonstrated that an item of evidence may affect the trier's evaluation of the probability of a consequential fact, it should be excluded. Of course, information on credibility, or on the probability of an evidential hypothesis, will help a trier evaluate a line of proof. So will some charts, diagrams, and the like used by the experts. See chapter VII, infra.

c. Although the primary responsibility for meeting these requirements rests with counsel (Mil.R.Evid. 103), it may be in the military judge's best interest to assist in this demonstration, particularly when difficult instructional issues are likely to result.

d. Often, a determination of relevancy will depend upon the theory urged by counsel. Careful planning of counsel's argument is therefore essential when considering the relevancy of certain matters. Counsel should be aware of all issues in the case and how particular items of evidence may or may not be relevant to those issues.

Example: A desertion case where there exists an issue as to whether the accused intended to remain away permanently. The accused, on the merits, testifies that the reason he absented himself was to care for his ill wife. At first glance, it may appear that this testimony brings out merely an extenuating circumstance for the absence and is therefore irrelevant on the issue of guilt or innocence. The accused's testimony, however, if offered to show that the accused's actions conflict with the intent to remain permanently away, would be relevant to the issue of intent.

4. Potential rulings

a. The military judge has four basic choices with respect to how he should rule on relevancy issues:

- (1) Exclude the evidence;
- (2) admit all the evidence;
- (3) admit all the evidence subject to a limiting instruction; or
- (4) admit part of the evidence and exclude part.

Once again, it must be remembered that the judge is not considering the relevance of the evidence and the possible options in regard to Mil.R.Evid. 401 alone. There is a continuous interplay among rules 401, 402, 403, and other appropriate rules in the process of judicial reasoning. See United States v. McRary, 616 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 456 U.S. 1011, 102 S.Ct. 2306 (1982) for a discussion of the interrelation of rules 401, 402, and 403.

D. Conditional relevance. In some situations, the relevancy of an item of evidence depends upon the existence of a particular preliminary fact. For example, if evidence of a spoken statement is relied upon to prove notice, probative value is lacking unless the person sought to be charged with notice heard the statement. The problem is one of fact, and the applicable rules are those relating to the respective functions of the military judge and court members. See rules 104(b) and 901. See also Kolod v. United States, 371 F.2d 983, 987-89 (10th Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 389 U.S. 834 (1967). Mil.R.Evid. 401 does not deal with relevance in this sense.

Whenever an item of evidence is offered as tending circumstantially that is, inferentially to establish a proposition the truth of which is at issue in a case, it is essential to articulate honestly and fully the inference or series of inferences invited. Each specific step of reasoning must invariably match a premise usually unarticulated, which the judge judicially notices. Thus, where the contested proposition is whether D is the person who killed H, and the evidence is a love letter from D to W, H's wife, the inferential series runs from (1) the expression in the letter to (2) D's love of W to (3) D's desire for exclusive possession of W to (4) D's wish to get rid of H to (5) D's plan to get rid of H to (6) D's execution of the plan by killing H. The unarticulated premise conjoined with and supposed to justify the inferential steps are:

- (1-2) A man who writes a love letter to a woman probably does love her. (The term "probably" as used here means that the proposition of fact is more probable or likely true as to this man than an identical proposition as to a person of whom nothing is known.)

- (2-3) A man who loves a woman probably desires her for himself alone.
- (3-4) A man who loves a married woman probably wishes to get rid of her husband.
- (4-5) A man who wishes to get rid of the husband of the woman he loves probably plans to do so.
- (5-6) A man who plans to get rid of the husband of the woman he loves probably kills him.

Obviously the value of item (1) as probative of conclusion (6) varies inversely with the number and dubiousness of the intervening inferences. Application of premise (1-2) to item (1) cannot produce more than fractional certitude of intermediate conclusion (2) the qualifying term "probably" which had to be inserted in (1-2) shows that. And so on down the line. This type of reasoning is progressively attenuative. Here it fractionalizes at five successive points.

Despite such fractionalizing the judge often concludes that the initial item of evidence should be admitted. Relevance is present and there is enough weight or materiality to justify consideration by the trier. At the same time, though, he may also be forced to conclude, if he conscientiously follows through the attenuation, that the item of evidence standing alone would not sustain a finding of the ultimate conclusion desired. When this is so, and the burden of persuasion is upon the party offering the evidence, that party must undertake an accumulative process by collecting and presenting other items of evidence tending toward the conclusion. In the case imagined such other items might be (a) threats by D against H's life; (b) purchase of a pistol and ammunition by D; (c) procurement by D of a key to the front door of H's house; (d) D's presence in the neighborhood of the house shortly before and after the killing; and (e) the finding of D's hat in the house immediately after the killing. . . . The greater the number of independent items pointing toward a common conclusion, the greater the confidence in that conclusion, but no matter how many the circumstantial items may be, they can never produce absolute certainty. Nor will they, under the assumption above as to placement of burden of persuasion, even make the ultimate proposition or conclusion a question for the trier of fact in an ordinary civil case unless the judge believes that their total effect would justify reasonable men in deciding that the conclusion is more likely true than not.

Plainly enough it is the presence of more or less incalculable human factors which makes particularly substantial the lack of certitude in the hypothetical situations mentioned above. Human beings may resist temptation instead of yielding to it, may speak or write jocosely although with the appearance of seriousness, may have interests, intentions, or motives not readily perceptible to others. Higher degrees of certitude are readily and properly obtainable when the variability of human impulse and action is removed. Thus, if reliable observers of the commission of a crime agree that the guilty person was baldheaded, one-eyed, lacking two fingers on his right hand, swarthy of complexion, club-footed, and afflicted with a nervous tic and impediment of speech, the police may feel just confidence of having the right man if they pick up near the time and place of the crime a person with this entirely distinctive collection of characteristics. And, to prove presence at some time of a particular person in a room, the finding on walls and furniture of fingerprints exactly agreeing with his may be even more convincing.

0505      ADMISSIBILITY OF RELEVANT EVIDENCE. Mil.R.Evid. 402.

Rule 402.      Relevant Evidence Generally Admissible; Irrelevant Evidence Inadmissible

All relevant evidence is admissible, except as otherwise provided by the Constitution of the United States as applied to members of the armed forces, the Uniform Code of Military Justice, these rules, this Manual, or any Act of Congress applicable to members of the armed forces. Evidence which is not relevant is not admissible.

A. General rule. As discussed in the previous section, relevancy is defined by Mil.R.Evid. 401 in a broad manner. Rule 402 continues the statement of the general relevancy rules favoring the admissibility of all relevant evidence. This rule is taken without significant change from the Federal rule, the language being changed only to reflect military practice. It also reflects the traditional common law approach encouraging consideration of relevant or probative evidence. The effect of the rule is not significantly different from former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 137, which the rule replaces. See drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 402, MCM, 1984, app. 22-31.

B. Exceptions. Mil.R.Evid. 402 provides only a general standard of admissibility in that it provides that evidence falling into any one of five categories, although relevant, still may not be admissible because the evidence violates the:

1. Constitution of the United States, as applied to the military (e.g., fourth amendment protections against unreasonable searches). The last part of this subsection reflects the fact that the Constitution may apply differently to members of the military (e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 313 on military inspections).
2. Uniform Code of Military Justice (e.g., article 31(d) excluding even relevant confessions obtained by coercion).
3. Manual for Courts-Martial (e.g., R.C.M. 1001(c)(3), MCM, 1984 [hereinafter R.C.M. ____], relaxation of the Mil.R.Evid. with regard to matters in sentencing).
4. Military Rules of Evidence (e.g., a privilege under Section V of the rules may keep out relevant evidence; rules such as Mil.R.Evid. 403 and 609 with their balancing tests may also fall under this subsection).
5. Any congressional limitation which might specifically concern courts-martial. Although without a present example, this subsection can be read as a disclaimer of intention to affect congressional enactments that exclude evidence.

C. Irrelevant evidence. The rule states an absolute prohibition against the admission of evidence which is not relevant. A problem may arise with this prohibition should one party not object when the opposing party offers irrelevant evidence. Saltzburg and Redden offer a lucid analysis of the potentially troublesome area:

As a general proposition, it is correct to assert that irrelevant evidence is not admissible in litigation (assuming that a proper objection is made). There is one class of cases in which this general statement must be further refined i.e., when one party offers evidence that is properly classified as irrelevant and the other party, after failing to object, offers to meet the irrelevant evidence with additional irrelevancies. The notion of "fighting fire with fire" is an old one and the decision whether to admit irrelevant evidence in order to counter other irrelevant evidence is likely to be the same under the Federal Rules of Evidence as at common law. The Trial Judge must decide whether the interests of justice are better served by penalizing the party who failed to object or by treating the party that began the parade of irrelevant evidence as being in no position to complain. Among the factors that the Trial Judge is likely to take into account in making a ruling are: the damage that can fairly be attributable to the initial offer by irrelevant evidence; whether the party who failed to object intentionally sat on his rights; whether a limiting instruction to disregard all of the irrelevant evidence is likely to work in the particular case; the amount of time that it would take to hear further irrelevant evidence; and the extent to which a failure of one party to respond to irrelevant evidence might mislead a jury untrained in evidence law to think that the irrelevant evidence was beyond challenge and therefore somewhat probative.

S. Saltzburg and K. Redden, Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 156 (5th ed. 1990).

The best solution to the problem, however, is for the military judge to insist that counsel provide a relevancy analysis, as discussed in sec. C, supra, whenever there is any doubt as to relevancy. See sec. D.1., infra.

D. Application of the rule. Essentially, the rule requires that three questions may have to be addressed before evidence is admitted.

1. First, does the evidence qualify under Mil.R.Evid. 401's definition?
2. Second, will the evidence violate any of the five prohibitions listed in Mil.R.Evid. 402?
3. Third, will the evidence satisfy any rule that requires a judicial assessment of the probative value of the evidence and the possible reliability or prejudice problems presented by the evidence? See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 403, 611, 803(6), 803(24), 804(b)(5) and 1003.

E. Procedures

1. The drafters' analysis encourages the use of offers of proof when evidence of doubtful relevance is offered. Mil.R.Evid. 402 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-32. These are certainly appropriate in response to any relevancy objection.
2. Also, as discussed previously, it is possible, subject to the military judge's discretion, to offer evidence "subject to later connection." Mil.R.Evid. 104(b) (conditional relevancy). In members' cases, the conditional relevancy should be handled with great care to avoid the possibility of bringing inadmissible evidence before the members of the court. Even a cautionary instruction may be insufficient to correct the taint resulting from the members' exposure to otherwise irrelevant evidence that was admitted contingent upon establishing a condition that was never established at trial.

F. Broad potential impact. As the drafters' analysis notes:

Rule 402 is potentially the most important of the new rules. Neither the Federal Rules of Evidence nor the Military Rules of Evidence resolve all evidentiary matters; see, e.g., Rule 101(b). When specific authority to resolve an evidentiary issue is absent, Rule 402's clear result is to make relevant evidence admissible.

Mil.R.Evid. 402 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-31.

0506 EXCLUSION OF RELEVANT EVIDENCE. Mil.R.Evid. 403 indicates: "Although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the members, or by considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence."

A. General. The rules defining relevant evidence and declaring generally its admissibility, Mil.R.Evid. 401 and 402 respectively, strongly encourage the admission of as much evidence as possible. Rule 403 is the first of the rules in sec. IV of the Mil.R.Evid. that restrict this policy of encouraging admissibility of relevant evidence. The rules that follow rule 403 "are concrete applications evolved for particular situations. However, they reflect the policies underlying the present rule [rule 403], which is designed as a guide for the handling of situations for which no specific rules have been formulated." Fed.R.Evid. 403 Advisory Committee note. Thus, rule 403 is the general rule which may exclude from the court's consideration evidence of unquestioned relevancy. It may be used as a "catchall" objection to the admission of evidence if counsel cannot point to any other specific ground or if the military judge has ruled against counsel on another objection. As such, it may be considered the most important of the rules and, judging from Federal cases, the most cited.

The rule recognizes six grounds which may lead to the exclusion of relevant evidence. These grounds may be grouped into two categories. The first category is the "danger category" consisting of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, or misleading the members. The second, or "considerations," category contains the issues of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. In the initial drafts of the Federal rules, the "danger category" was designated for mandatory exclusion, but as finally adopted into the Fed.R.Evid. and subsequently into the Mil.R.Evid., the application of the rule to both categories of grounds is discretionary with the judge. J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence 403-4 (1981).

Exclusion of relevant evidence is warranted only where the "probative value" of the evidence "is substantially outweighed" by one or more of the grounds enumerated in the rule and the above paragraph. In order to appreciate the rule and its application, we must examine the grant of judicial discretion implicit in the rule, the balancing test used to determine whether there is "substantial" outweighing, and the significance of the grounds for exclusion—"unfair prejudice" in particular.

B. Discretion of military judge

1. General. The analysis accompanying rule 403 stresses the breadth of discretion which the rules vest in the military judge. S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi, and D. Schlueter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 434 (3d ed. 1991). In United States v. Teeter, 16 M.J. 68 (C.M.A. 1983), appellant was convicted of a brutal rape and murder. Part of the government's evidence included the accused's one-year-old statements about how such crimes could be committed. The appellant alleged that these statements should not have been admitted because their prejudicial effect outweighed their probative value. Affirming the conviction, the court stated that striking a balance between probative value and prejudicial effect is left to the trial judge. See also United States v. Thomas, 11 M.J. 388 (C.M.A. 1981) (the only limitation on the admissibility of evidence under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) is the proper exercise of the military judge's discretion to exclude evidence in accordance with Mil.R.Evid. 403); United States v. Gonzalez, 16 M.J. 58 (C.M.A. 1983) (neither Mil.R.Evid. 403, nor its Federal counterpart, permits a trial judge to "weed out" evidence on the basis of his or her own view of its credibility).

2. Special findings. Because of the extensive judicial discretion vested by rule 403, counsel should ensure that objections under its provisions are as specific as possible in order to narrow the military judge's discretion. One method of doing this is to request that the military judge state on the record his reasons for admitting or excluding the evidence. Other methods for counsel to use in limiting the military judge's discretion are: (1) Requests for, and submission of, proposed limiting instructions, or (2) offers to stipulate to the relevant portion of objectionable evidence. These two methods will be discussed in connection with our consideration of the "balancing test," infra.

C. Balancing test. To apply rule 403, the military judge must balance the probative value of the subject evidence against the "danger of unfair prejudice" or one of the other five grounds for exclusion listed in the rule. Most of the cases deal with the unfair prejudice ground, so, for the sake of clarity, we will refer to prejudice in the following discussion. The reader should remember that the other five grounds (i.e., confusing the issue, misleading the members, undue delay, waste of time, and needless presentation of cumulative evidence) could be substituted in the test. This is a highly subjective process requiring the judge to evaluate the proponent's need for the evidence as well as any possible prejudice to the opponent. The factors on each side of the "scale" for this "balancing test" are subject to the different policy considerations and are difficult to quantify; it is something akin to the proverbial apples-and- oranges comparison. Complicating the test is the fact that the "probative value" side starts with a thumb on the scales (i.e., the "substantially outweighed" language of the rule). Counsel must remember this language while arguing rule 403 objections.

While the weighing, or balancing process, must necessarily deal with the particular facts of the case, courts have developed certain guidelines.

1. The military judge should examine the probative value of the proffered evidence. Certainly the evidence must have some probative value, or relevancy, or it would not be admissible at all. Mil.R.Evid. 402. If the relevancy of the evidence is only slight (remotely relevant to an issue of consequence or directly relevant to an issue of little import), but it would likely be prejudicial, then any justification for its admission is only slight or virtually nonexistent. Counsel should remember that the appearance of probative value in the balancing test is dependent upon the theory of relevancy they espouse and the logical connections they can detail in argument. A quote from Judge Friendly in United States v. Ravitch, 421 F.2d 1196 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 400 U.S. 834 (1970), summarizes the logic of this consideration:

The length of the chain of inferences necessary to connect the evidence with the ultimate fact to be proved necessarily lessens the probative value of the evidence, and may therefore render it more susceptible to exclusion as unduly confusing, prejudicial, or time-consuming, but it does not render the evidence irrelevant.

Id. at 1240 n.10.

2. Secondly, the military judge should consider whether the same fact sought to be proven by the proffered evidence can be proven by alternative means. See Fed.R.Evid. 403 advisory committee note. Illustrative of this point is United States v. 88 Cases, Birely's Orange Beverage, 187 F.2d 967 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 342 U.S. 861 (1951). Pursuant to a libel charging adulteration of certain food, the United States seized for condemnation 88 cases of an orange beverage. At trial, the United States presented evidence that showed that the beverage did not contain vitamin C and introduced gruesome photographs of test animals who had died in apparent agony due to an experimental diet which lacked this vitamin. In explaining why the gruesome evidence could not be admitted, the court stated that the same fact could have been proved "simply and impressively yet without sensationalism . . . ." Id. at 975. The court then set forth a test that can be applied by others engaged in a balancing process: "[A]lthough sensational and shocking evidence may be relevant, it has an objectionable tendency to prejudice the jury. It is, therefore, incompetent unless the exigencies of proof make it necessary or important that the case be proved that way. . . ." Id.

Counsel should not read 88 Cases, supra, as standing for the proposition that gruesomeness alone is a sufficient basis for excluding evidence. In United States v. Burks, 36 M.J. 447 (C.M.A.), cert. denied 114 S.Ct. 187 (1993), the government introduced on-scene photographs of the murder victim as well as autopsy photographs. The court found that the photographs served the legitimate purpose of reflecting the violent nature of the attack and that although there was prejudicial effect, it did not outweigh the probative value. See also Rivers v. United States, 270 F.2d 435 (9th Cir. 1959), cert. denied 362 U.S. 920 (1960) (mere gruesomeness is not ground for exclusion of photos which were relevant in proving the commission of a smothering).

a. Stipulation. One alternative to the seeking of admission of prejudicial portions of the proffered evidence which counsel should consider is the use of a stipulation. Thus, when the government seeks to introduce evidence of a prior conviction, defense counsel should consider stipulating to the fact of conviction. In one case, a reviewing court held that the trial judge abused his discretion by admitting a record of a conviction after such an offer. See United States v. Spletzer, 535 F.2d 950 (5th Cir. 1976). Likewise, when a defendant charged with armed robbery fled the jurisdiction and was picked up while armed, a stipulation as to his flight would have avoided the prejudice arising from revelation of the circumstances of his arrest. United States v. Jackson, 405 F. Supp. 938 (E.D.N.Y. 1975). See also Mil.R.Evid. 403 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-34. The offer to stipulate may not always be sufficient, however, as there are two sides of the scale to consider.

In United States v. Bowers, 660 F.2d 527 (5th Cir. 1981), although color photographs of a battered child's lacerated heart had the potential to inflame passions, the court found the photos were necessary and could be admitted, even though the accused offered to stipulate.

3. Thirdly, the military judge must consider the "probable effectiveness or lack of effectiveness of a limiting instruction. . . ." Fed.R. Evid. Advisory Committee note. Where the adverse effect of relevant evidence may be cured by a cautionary instruction to the members, the need for exclusion may be outweighed. See, e.g., United States v. Catalano, 491 F.2d 268 (2d Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 825 (1974).

D. Unfair prejudice. The Federal Rules of Evidence Advisory Committee defined unfair prejudice as evidence that has "an undue tendency to suggest decision on an improper basis, commonly, though not necessarily, an emotional one." Fed.R. Evid. 403 Advisory Committee note. However, by restricting the rule to evidence which will cause "unfair prejudice," the draftsmen meant to caution courts that mere prejudicial effect is not a sufficient reason to refuse admission. Id. Mil.R.Evid. 403 is similarly concerned only with "unfair prejudice."

A very common error for novice counsel is to object to evidence as "prejudicial to my client." A party is always prejudiced by relevant, damaging evidence admitted by the opponent, and the law will not exclude evidence on the basis of "prejudice." Counsel must use "unfair prejudice," cite Mil.R.Evid. 403, and apply the balancing test.

Despite the breadth of judicial discretion under Mil.R.Evid. 403, and the availability of curative instructions, appellate courts have recognized unfair prejudice in a wide variety of cases. In United States v. Perry, 37 M.J. 363 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 919 (1994), the trial judge allowed evidence that an accused charged with cocaine use was a prior OSI informant who had familiarity with known drug users. The court held on appeal that this evidence neither proved nor disproved that the accused knowingly used cocaine and any probative value was substantially outweighed by the unfair prejudice. In United States v. Williams, 561 F.2d 859 (D.C. Cir. 1977), for example, the defense in a bank robbery case objected when the prosecution attempted to introduce evidence that stolen money was found in the apartment of the defendant's sister. Because the co-tenant of that apartment had already pled guilty to the robbery, the court found that the evidence, while slightly relevant, was extremely prejudicial. In United States v. Green, 548 F.2d 1261 (6th Cir. 1977), the government sought to introduce expert testimony comparing the illegal drug the defendant allegedly manufactured with LSD. The court found that the evidence was irrelevant and unfairly prejudicial, and excluded it. See also United States v. McManaman, 606 F.2d 919 (10th Cir. 1979); United States v. Anderson, 584 F.2d 849 (6th Cir. 1978); United States v. Harris, 18 M.J. 809 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984) (admission of extracts from Department of Justice pamphlet on drug enforcement error where much of the information was irrelevant and unfairly prejudicial). The Fifth Circuit reviewed a similar situation in United States v. Hall, 653 F.2d 1002 (5th Cir. 1981), a conspiracy trial of an alleged drug distributor. A drug agent testified that, due to the difficulties in arranging controlled purchases from large-scale dealers, no physical evidence existed. The court reversed because the inference was unfairly prejudicial. In United States v. Koger, 646 F.2d 1194 (7th Cir. 1981), the court held that evidence of a co-accused's conviction was unfairly prejudicial. The court reviewed a bizarre factual scenario in United States v. Richardson, 651 F.2d 1251 (8th Cir. 1981), where jurors learned that a key government witness had been threatened and shot just before the trial. The appellate court found unfair prejudice and reversed on the grounds that a mistrial should have been declared when the witness testified from a wheelchair.

Evidence of "bad acts" occurring prior to or subsequent to the charged offense may often be excluded as unfairly prejudicial. Although the admission of evidence of "bad acts" is governed by Mil.R.Evid. 404(b), an objection under Mil.R.Evid. 403 can often be successful even if the evidence of bad acts is relevant. See United States v. Jones, 570 F.2d 765 (8th Cir. 1978); United States v. Cook, 557 F.2d 1148 (5th Cir. 1977); United States v. Czarnecki, 552 F.2d 698 (6th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 939 (1977); United States v. Myers, 550 F.2d 1036 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 847 (1978); United States v. Hall, 588 F.2d 613 (8th Cir. 1978). Some illustrative examples include United States v. Holmes, 39 M.J. 176 (C.M.A. 1994), (unduly prejudicial for trial counsel to introduce evidence of accused's marijuana use 18 years prior and then argue that accused had been using drugs for the previous 18 years). United States v. Foskey, 636 F.2d 517 (D.C. Cir.

1980), a prosecution for drug possession, where there was evidence of the defendant's prior arrest for an identical offense while in the company of his present co-defendant. Both rules 404(b) and 403 barred this evidence. See also United States v. Thomas, 11 M.J. 388 (C.M.A. 1981). Additionally, where the accused was being prosecuted for indecent acts against his nine-year-old daughter, it was error (though harmless in light of the evidence) for the military judge to admit testimony from the accused's eleven-year-old son that the accused had committed several sex acts against the son some four or five years before the charged offense. United States v. Mann, 26 M.J. 1 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 824, 109 S.Ct. 72 (1988). But see United States v. Munoz, 32 M.J. 359 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 437 (1991) (extrinsic evidence that accused charged with sexually assaulting daughter sexually abused older daughter in a similar manner 12 years prior was admissible). Similarly, the prosecution may not introduce evidence of a defendant's possession of marked bills from an earlier robbery during the trial of an unrelated robbery. United States v. Calhoun, 604 F.2d 1216 (9th Cir. 1979). In United States v. Shavers, 615 F.2d 266 (5th Cir. 1980), the Fifth Circuit held that it was error to introduce evidence of a prior threat with a knife in a prosecution for assault on a different victim with a different weapon.

Cumulative or confusing evidence may also be unfairly prejudicial. For example, in United States v. Johnston, 41 M.J. 13 (C.M.A. 1994), the court held that the military judge did not abuse his discretion by excluding evidence of a negative urinalysis administered subsequent to the positive urinalysis before the court. There was no error in excluding this evidence as being unduly confusing. In United States v. Stark, 24 M.J. 381 (C.M.A. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1026 (1988), the court held that the military judge did not abuse his discretion in denying admission of videotapes, offered by the defense, of interviews of the accused by his civilian psychiatrist. The defense asserted that the probative value of this evidence, in that it would permit the court to view the research which formed the basis for the psychiatrist's opinion, outweighed any possible prejudice. The court found a danger of confusion and a potential inability for court members to consider the tapes for purposes other than the truth of the statements contained therein. See also United States v. Butcher, 557 F.2d 666 (9th Cir. 1977); United States v. King, 560 F.2d 122 (2d Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 925 (1977). But see United States v. Moreno, 649 F.2d 309 (5th Cir. 1981) (where the cumulative nature of the testimony rendered it nonprejudicial). Mil.R.Evid. 403 must be used equitably; if government evidence is admitted over the objection, the provision cannot be used to reject similar evidence offered by the defense. See United States v. Sellers, 566 F.2d 884 (4th Cir. 1977). The rule concerning cumulativeness can be used advantageously by the government. In United States v. Watkins, 36 M.J. 752 (A.C.M.R.), rev. denied, 38 M.J. 218 (C.M.A. 1993), the court held that a judge has broad discretion in determining if evidence is cumulative and the judge's decision to exclude additional evidence of the victim's violent nature would not be overturned.

There is some support for the proposition that the standard of rule 403 regarding weighing unfair prejudice against probative value is inapplicable in trials by military judge alone. In Gulf States Utilities Co. v. Ecodyne Corp., 635 F.2d 517 (5th Cir. 1981), a civil case, the court found that the trial judge's exclusion of evidence was not harmless error. The trial judge had reasoned that, since he would not have let a jury hear the evidence, he would not hear it in a bench trial. The Court of Appeals rejected this reasoning, finding that a judge is trained to recognize improper inferences and exclude them from his reasoning when he makes a decision. Thus, the court suggested that the portion of Mil.R.Evid. 403 dealing with weighing probative value against prejudicial effect had no logical application to bench trials.

E. Other grounds for exclusion. Although the unfair prejudice ground for exclusion of relevant evidence is the most commonly cited ground under Mil.R.Evid. 403, as previously noted, counsel must not forget to consider the other five grounds. For example, in United States v. Helton, 10 M.J. 820 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981), the Air Force Court of Military Review, citing rule 403, found that considerations of expenditure of time, digression from the issues in the case, and placement of undue weight on scientific evidence, among other reasons, justified exclusion of the results of polygraph testing. See also United States v. Luce, 17 M.J. 754 (A.C.M.R. 1984), petition denied, 18 M.J. 402 (C.M.A. 1984) (trial judge did not abuse his discretion in excluding evidence offered by the defense to rebut prosecution evidence attacking character of defense witness for truthfulness where the proposed testimony was of minimal probative value and related to motive for telling the truth rather than character for truthfulness).

Surprise is not one of the other allowable grounds for exclusion under Mil.R.Evid. 403. The Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee rejected surprise from the Federal rule, noting that "the granting of a continuance is a more appropriate remedy" and "the impact of a rule excluding evidence on the ground of surprise would be difficult to estimate." Fed.R.Evid. 403 Advisory Committee note. However, Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) requires the trial counsel, upon request, to give notice in advance of trial of any 404(b) evidence they intend to introduce at trial. The subjective belief of the trial judge that evidence is not believable is also an invalid basis for exclusion under rule 403. See, e.g., United States v. Thompson, 615 F.2d 329 (5th Cir. 1980) (rule 403 does not permit exclusion of evidence because the judge does not find it credible).

Consideration of such grounds as confusion of the members and waste of time points out the frequently forgotten fact that rule 403 is not just a defense tool. The trial counsel can invoke the rule to exclude marginally relevant defense evidence. See, e.g., United States v. Steffen, 641 F.2d 591 (8th Cir. 1981), cert. denied, 452 U.S. 943 (1981) (defense evidence too confusing); United States v. Clifford, 640 F.2d 150 (8th Cir. 1981) (defense evidence irrelevant and confusing); United States v. Sampol, 636 F.2d 621 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (defense impeachment evidence as to drug use too tenuous and possibly inflammatory); United States v. Williams, 626 F.2d 697 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 1020 (1980) (defense evidence held cumulative); cf. United States v. Johnson, 20 M.J. 610 (A.F.C.M.R. 1985) (trial judge erred in sustaining government's Mil.R.Evid. 403 objection to the admissibility of evidence of a negative urinalysis offered by the defense as misleading and confusing the issues).

F. Relationship with other rules. Although Mil.R.Evid. 403 cuts across the Mil.R.Evid. and can be applicable in almost every evidentiary situation or any stage of the trial, there are a few special interrelationships between rule 403 and other rules which deserve special mention.

Rules 403 and 404(b) are frequently cited together in decisions in the Federal court system. Although evidence of prior bad acts by the accused may qualify for admission under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b), rule 403 may constitute a "second line of defense" to keep the bad acts from being admitted by considering their prejudicial effect along with the probative value considered under 404(b). See United States v. Thomas, 11 M.J. 388 (C.M.A. 1981) and United States v. Dawkins 2 M.J. 898 (A.C.M.R. 1976) (pre-Mil.R.Evid. cases applying Federal rules).

Mil.R.Evid. 609(a), as amended in 1993 (change 6 to the MCM), applies the 403 balancing test to evidence of a prior felony conviction not involving dishonesty offered to impeach a witness' credibility. If a prior conviction of the accused is offered, a different balancing standard is applied. Here, the probative value must affirmatively outweigh prejudicial effect. See Mil.R.Evid. 609(a) (as amended in change 6 to MCM). Finally, evidence of a conviction over ten years old or ten years from the release of the witness from the confinement imposed for that conviction, whichever is later, is admissible if the military judge determines that its probative value substantially outweighs any prejudicial effect. Note the scales here are tipped heavily in favor of exclusion. See section 0713, infra.

Rule 608, character evidence, also interacts with rule 403. See, e.g., United States v. Pierce, 14 M.J. 738 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982); United States v. Leake, 642 F.2d 715 (4th Cir. 1981); United States v. Medical Therapy Sciences, Inc., 583 F.2d 36 (2d Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 1130 (1979); United States v. Bocra, 623 F.2d 281 (3d Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 875, 101 S.Ct. 217 (1980). In United States v. Davis, 639 F.2d 239 (5th Cir. 1981), the court held that it was error to exclude two defense witnesses who would have impeached the chief prosecution witness. They had been excluded since they were not included on a pretrial witness list. The court's decision was based on rule 403 and the sixth amendment. It is especially important to examine character evidence carefully, because limiting instructions may not suffice.

G. Summary. The importance of the proper application of rule 403 cannot be overemphasized. This can be seen to some extent by the references to rule 403 in the discussion of rules 401 and 402, supra. Counsel must focus on the language of the rule, be it "substantially outweighed" or "unfair prejudice," and apply it to the facts of their cases.

It must be remembered, however, that Mil.R.Evid. 403 is only a general check on evidence admissibility, not a license to ignore the specific limitations of other rules or rule 402's prohibition concerning irrelevancy. Mil.R.Evid. 403 can keep relevant evidence out of court, but it cannot get irrelevant or inadmissible evidence into court.

PART TWO: CHARACTER EVIDENCE

0507 INTRODUCTION

A. Scope. The first part of this chapter dealt with the general rules of relevancy. As discussed therein, rules 401 and 402 define the concept of relevancy and generally allow for the admission of relevant evidence; rule 403 gives the policy considerations for excluding relevant evidence in general situations. The rules (Mil.R.Evid. 404-406) examined in this part of the chapter apply the principles of these general rules to the specific area of character evidence. This is an area of substantial litigation in criminal cases as discussed infra. Mil.R.Evid. 404 addresses the use which can be made of character evidence in general, and extrinsic evidence in particular. Mil.R. Evid. 405 delineates the types of character evidence that can be used at trial if any character evidence is allowed under rule 404. Mil.R.Evid. 406, dealing with habit and routine practices, although not denominated by title as a rule of character evidence, is a related rule. Evidence of a habit or routine practice is evidence of previous conduct the use of which is generally barred by rule 404 and 405. Mil.R.Evid. 406 permits the admission of this type of evidence under limited circumstances. Accordingly, it is considered in this part of the chapter.

Evidence of the character of the accused is relevant at two distinct stages of a court-martial. First, it can be relevant during the merits of the case on the ultimate issue of the guilt or innocence of the accused. Second, it can be relevant after findings as a matter in consideration of punishment. Only the first use will be discussed in this chapter. Character evidence after findings will be covered in chapter XI on presentencing.

B. Character evidence in general. Character evidence is information relating to a person's distinctive traits, behavior, or qualities. Counsel often wish to use such information at trial without deciding exactly what it is or how they can use it.

1. What is character evidence? In trying to define "character," the reader may note that this is one of those words in the English language that is more difficult to define than to use. It is possible to list related concepts (i.e., specific character traits such as truthfulness, peacefulness, sobriety, and honesty). Mil.R.Evid. 404 is concerned with "traits" such as these. There is also the general character which we associate with people "she is a good girl" or "he is a bad man." This is essentially the "actual moral nature of a person." Under prior military law, an accused's general good character was admissible to prove he was innocent of any alleged offense. See former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 138f(2). The extent to which the prior Manual provision has been modified by Mil.R.Evid. 404 is the subject of continuing debate. Pertinent cases will be discussed later in this chapter.

a. Character must be distinguished from reputation. Reputation is the repute in which a person generally is held in the community in which he lives or pursues his business or profession. Mil.R.Evid. 405(d). A person's reputation can be said to "reflect" his character. Reputation evidence, together with opinion testimony, forms two methods of proving character. Mil.R.Evid. 405(a).

b. Character also must be distinguished from habit.

Character and habit are closely akin. Character is a generalized description of one's disposition, or of one's disposition in respect to a general trait, such as honesty, temperance or peacefulness. "Habit," in modern usage, both lay and psychological, is more specific. It describes one's regular response to a repeated specific situation. If we speak of character for care, we think of the person's tendency to act prudently in all the varying situations of life, in business, family life, in handling automobiles and in walking across the street. A habit, on the other hand, is the person's regular practice of meeting a particular kind of situation with a specific type of conduct, such as the habit of going down a particular stairway two steps at a time. . . . Character may be thought of as the sum of one's habits though doubtless it is more than this. But unquestionably the uniformity of one's response to habit is far greater than the consistency with which one's conduct conforms to character or disposition.

C. McCormick, Evidence 462-3 (1954).

2. Why use character evidence? Character evidence may be used for one of two fundamentally different reasons. First, it may be offered to disprove an element of a crime or to establish a defense when character itself is in issue. This situation is commonly referred to as "character in issue." Second, it may be offered for the purpose of suggesting that a person who has a certain character acted in conformity with his usual character at the time, or in the situation presently in issue. This is sometimes referred to as "circumstantial use" of character.

a. Character in issue. Character evidence offered to prove character when it is a consequential, material proposition, rather than to prove an act, does not fall within the prohibition of rule 404 and, consequently, is admissible. So is character evidence offered to prove an act, if it can be utilized without resort to the inference that a person of certain character is more likely than not generally to have committed the act in question. Such character evidence is controlled by general relevancy considerations under rules 401 and 402. The language of the rule does not explicitly state this, but the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee in its note to Fed.R.Evid. 404(a) notes:

Character questions arise in two fundamentally different ways.

(1) Character may itself be an element of a crime, claim, or defense. . . . Illustrations are: the chastity of the victim under a statute specifying her chastity as an element of the crime of seduction, or the competency of the driver in an action for negligently entrusting a motor vehicle to an incompetent driver. No problem of the general relevancy of character evidence is involved, and the present rule therefore has no provision on the subject. The only question relates to allowable methods of proof, as to which see Rule 405, immediately following.

Although most of the cases in which character is an issue appear to be civil cases, there are several situations in which it could appear in a criminal trial. By far the most common situation is the entrapment defense. The courts tend to treat the predisposition of the accused as an element of the defense of entrapment, and thus the character of the accused for lawfulness would be in issue. See United States v. Burkley, 591 F.2d 903 (D.C. Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 966 (1979) and Sorrells v. United States, 287 U.S. 435 (1932). Weinstein and Berger note two other situations where character may be in issue in criminal cases.

Character evidence is customarily received in Hobbs Act prosecutions. Since the government must prove that property was extorted from the victim by threats, the defendant's reputation for violence~~is~~ when known to the victim~~is~~ is relevant in ascertaining the victim's fear and its reasonableness. A similar use of character evidence occurs in connection with the Extortionate Credit Transactions Act.

J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence 404-21 (1988).

Although Mil.R.Evid. 404(a) does not deal with the admissibility of "character in issue," but deals only with the "circumstantial use" of character discussed below, it should be remembered that rule 405(b), discussed infra, is still applicable.

b. "Circumstantial use" of character evidence as inference. The use of character evidence circumstantially to create an inference that a person acted in conformity with his character on a particular occasion, normally at the time of the offense with which he is charged, is an exercise in logic. Common sense would indicate to most people that "dishonest" people are more prone to larceny than "honest" people and, more generally, that "good" people are less likely to commit crimes than "bad" people.

Because evidence of bad character of the accused may logically lead to an inference that the accused committed the offense charged, courts have consistently held that, if the prosecution is allowed initially to introduce such evidence, the trier of fact might improperly base its findings on the character of the accused and not on his actual guilt of the offense charged. As the Supreme Court explained in Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469, 476 (1948):

Courts that follow the common-law tradition almost unanimously have come to disallow resort by the prosecution to any kind of evidence of a defendant's evil character to establish a probability of his guilt. Not that the law invests the defendant with a presumption of good character, Greer v. United States, 245 U.S. 559, 38 S.Ct. 209, 62 L.Ed. 469, but it simply closes the whole matter of character, disposition and reputation on the prosecution's case-in-chief. The state may not show defendant's prior trouble with the law, specific criminal acts, or ill name among his neighbors, even though such facts might logically be persuasive that he is by propensity a probable perpetrator of the crime. The inquiry is not rejected because character is irrelevant; on the contrary, it is said to weigh too much with the jury and to so over persuade them as to prejudge one with a bad general record and deny him a fair opportunity to defend against a particular charge. The over-riding policy of excluding such evidence, despite its admitted probative value, is the practical experience that its disallowance tends to prevent confusion of issues, unfair surprise and undue prejudice.

Consequently, the rules governing the admission of character evidence on the ultimate issue reflect a compromise between the desire to make all relevant evidence available and the protection of the court against undue confusion of the issues.

Character evidence may be used logically to create an inference in two possible situations:

(1) As circumstantial evidence of the guilt or innocence of the accused (substantive character evidence); or

(2) as circumstantial evidence as to whether a witness, including the accused, is telling the truth at trial (impeachment character evidence).

The twin concepts of substantive and impeachment character evidence are related in that the goal of each is to demonstrate that a person is acting in conformity with his established character.

If offered only to show that a witness is or is not telling the truth at trial, the military judge, upon appropriate request by counsel, will consider it only for that purpose and in a members case will instruct the court members that they must not consider the evidence for any other purpose. See Mil.R.Evid. 105. This limiting instruction is the key difference between substantive and impeachment character evidence.

Substantive character evidence is governed by the concept of relevance found in Mil.R.Evid. 404(a) and 405. Impeachment character evidence is covered by the concept of credibility found in section VI of the Mil.R.Evid., most particularly rule 608.

0508        ADMISSIBILITY OF CHARACTER EVIDENCE. Mil.R.Evid. 404.

Rule 404. Character Evidence Not Admissible to Prove Conduct; Exceptions; Other Crimes

(a)    Character evidence generally. Evidence of a person's character or a trait of a person's character is not admissible for the purpose of proving that the person acted in conformity therewith on a particular occasion, except:

(1)    Character of the accused. Evidence of a pertinent trait of the character of the accused offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same;

(2)    Character of victim. Evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same, or evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the victim offered by the prosecution in a homicide or assault case to rebut evidence that the victim was an aggressor;

(3)    Character of witness. Evidence of the character of a witness, as provided in rules 607, 608, and 609.

(b)    Other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that the person acted in conformity therewith. It may, however, be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident, provided that upon request by the accused, the prosecution shall provide reasonable notice in advance of trial, or during trial if the military judge excuses pretrial notice on good cause shown, of the general nature of any such evidence it intends to introduce at trial.

A.    General. Mil.R.Evid. 404 is basically a codification of the common law. See Fed.R.Evid. 404 Advisory Committee's note. This rule replaces former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), paras. 138f and g, and is taken without substantial change from the Federal rule. Mil.R.Evid. 404 expands upon the Federal rule by including, in subsection (a)(2), the character trait of peacefulness of the victim of an assault; whereas the Federal rule limits the use of similar evidence to homicide cases. Two major sections make up the rule: subdivision (a) concerns general character evidence; subdivision (b) deals with proof of other crimes, wrongs or similar acts (called "extrinsic offense evidence" in the Federal courts, and previously known as "uncharged misconduct," or "misconduct not charged," in the military). These sections will be discussed separately infra: Rule 404(a) is covered in sections B-E, and rule 404(b) is discussed in section F.

B. Character evidence generally. Mil.R.Evid. 404(a) generally excludes the circumstantial use of a person's character or a trait of a person's character. The rule, however, does list three significant exceptions. These exceptions are predicated upon the status of the person (i.e., accused, victim, witness) whose character counsel wishes to establish. Within these three exceptions there is also a further division by types of admissible character evidence (i.e., pertinent traits of character or character evidence "to impeach or support the credibility of a witness. . ."). Mil.R.Evid. 404(a) drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-32.

1. Accused. An accused may offer evidence of a "pertinent trait" of his character. If he does offer such a pertinent character trait, the prosecution may rebut. Mil.R.Evid. 404(a)(1).

2. Victim

a. Evidence of a "pertinent trait" of character of the victim of a crime may be admissible when offered by an accused. The prosecution, however, may rebut the same. Mil.R.Evid. 404(a)(2).

b. Additionally, the prosecution may offer evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the victim in a homicide or assault case, provided the accused has presented evidence that the victim was the aggressor. See, e.g., United States v. Pearson, 13 M.J. 922 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982) (evidence of victim's character for peacefulness relevant to rebut accused's contention that victim struck him first, rev'd on other grounds, 17 M.J. 149 (C.M.A. 1984).

3. Witness. Evidence of the character of a witness may be admitted, as provided in rules 607, 608, and 609 (i.e., the credibility of the witness). Mil.R.Evid. 404(a)(3).

It should be noted that initial use of the first two exceptions is solely within the control of the defense. The prosecution cannot present character evidence under subsection (a)(1) or (2) until the defense "opens the door" by "putting the accused's character in issue" or by raising the issue of a victim's pertinent character or the allegation of the victim's aggression in an assault or homicide case. The terminology of "putting the accused's character in issue" can be misleading. It is not the same as having "character in issue," to which Mil.R.Evid. 404(a) is not applicable. Once the defense offers any evidence of pertinent character traits, however, the prosecution is free to rebut in kind. Thus, the defense controls the substantive use of character evidence, at least initially. An accused does not "open the door" merely by taking the stand. See United States v. Tomaiolo, 249 F.2d 683 (2d Cir. 1957); United States v. Masino, 275 F.2d 129 (2d Cir. 1960). By taking the stand as a witness, however, certain evidence of bad character may be admissible to attack the accused's credibility. Character evidence for impeachment use is available to either party at any time. See Mil.R.Evid. 607 and 404(a)(3). While neither party controls use of impeachment character evidence, the parties do have the ability to request limiting instructions under rule 105 when character evidence is used for this limited purpose.

The term "pertinent" in the rule means that the trait or traits are relevant to the offense charged or any other issue of consequence to the case. For example, in a trial for murder, defense evidence as to the good character of the accused for honesty is not admissible, for honest men may be as likely to commit murder as dishonest men. A relevancy analysis under Mil.R.Evid. 402 may be necessary to determine if a trait is pertinent under rule 404.

C. Character of the accused

1. Pertinent character traits. As discussed above, the defense is limited to substantive character evidence involving a "pertinent trait" of the accused. In United States v. Brown, 41 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1994) the court held that in a drug use prosecution, an accused is entitled to present evidence of being a good sailor and law abiding person. The accused therefore introduce evidence that he was strongly opposed to drug use as a matter of religious principle. United States v. Elliott, 23 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1986) (prejudicial error in larceny case not to admit evidence of accused's "trusting" nature as a pertinent trait where accused asserts he did not steal the two government TV's, but merely "innocently accepted" them as gifts from a new friend).

Other examples of admissible evidence of specific traits are:

Offense	Character Traits
Theft	Honesty
Drunkenness	Sobriety
Homicide	Peacefulness
Assault	Peacefulness
Negligence	Carefulness

Offering substantive character evidence is an important tactical decision for the defense. Once such evidence is offered, it may be "tested" on cross-examination by the trial counsel and rebutted during the government's case in rebuttal. See United States v. Trimper, 28 M.J. 460 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 965 (1989) (accused's statement that he "had never used drugs" opened the door for government to rebut with evidence of positive urinalysis; United States v. Shields, 20 M.J. 174 (C.M.A. 1985) (accused put character for peacefulness at issue opening door for government rebuttal). Such "testing" and rebuttal by the prosecution may well outweigh the impact of the original character evidence presented by the defense.

2. Evidence of general good military character. The rule 404(a)(1) provision allowing only pertinent traits of character appears to be a significant change from, and limitation upon, the old military rule which allowed the use of general good military character to demonstrate that the accused was less likely to have committed a criminal act. The drafters' analysis, however, provides that "[i]t is the intention of the Committee, however, to allow the defense to introduce evidence of good military character when that specific trait is pertinent. Evidence of good military character would be admissible, for example, in a prosecution for disobedience of orders." Mil.R.Evid. 404 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-32.

a. In the first military case to address this issue, United States v. Cooper, 11 M.J. 815 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981), the accused was convicted of possession of marijuana in violation of Article 134, UCMJ. In an attempt to prove innocent possession, defense counsel sought to demonstrate the accused's good military character under Mil.R.Evid. 404(a)(1). However, the military judge sustained trial counsel's objection, holding such evidence was not relevant to the offense charged and did not concern a "pertinent" trait of character. In affirming the conviction, the Air Force Court of Military Review initially determined that general good military character is not admissible unless the accused is charged with a unique military offense. It then sought to define that concept. Looking to the drafters' analysis, the court reasoned that crimes which are "exclusively military in nature," such as desertion or absence without leave, are covered by the rule. Id. at 816. The court refused to find that offenses charged under the general article (article 134) are uniquely military merely because they require proof of conduct to the prejudice of good order and discipline, or are of a nature to bring discredit upon the armed forces. Instead, the court mandated that trial judges "look to the military nature of the charged misconduct before determining if the accused's good military character is pertinent to the determination of guilt or innocence."

b. The Federal courts have tended to admit evidence that an accused has a character trait of being a "law-abiding citizen." Although such a trait reflects upon an accused's general character for being a "good" person, the Federal courts have accepted the trait as a "pertinent" trait of character under rule 404. See, e.g., United States v. Angelini, 678 F.2d 380 (1st Cir. 1982); United States v. Hewitt, 634 F.2d 277 (5th Cir. 1981). Federal courts will accept character evidence if it can be shown that the trait in question would make any fact of consequence to the determination of the case more or less probable than it could be without evidence of the trait. The courts use the criteria of relevancy under rule 401 in determining the issue (see United States v. Angelini, supra).

c. More recent decisions demonstrate that some military courts are taking a more flexible position with respect to admitting evidence of good military character. In United States v. Clemons, 16 M.J. 44 (C.M.A. 1983), the accused was charged with theft. His defense was that he took the item while acting as charge of quarters in order to teach the owners a lesson because they left their gear adrift. The accused wanted to introduce evidence of good general military character and evidence that he had a character trait for lawfulness. The trial judge ruled that such evidence was not reflective of "pertinent" traits of character in that the evidence reflected upon general character. The Court of Military Appeals held that the trial judge committed error; that "pertinent" under Mil.R.Evid. 404 was equivalent to "relevant," and that good military character and character for lawfulness were traits relevant to the defense of taking the items to teach the owners a lesson. Chief Judge Everett concurred, but also hinted that evidence of character for being a law-abiding citizen and good general character might always be relevant in courts-martial. See also United States v. Fitzgerald, 19 M.J. 695 (A.C.M.R. 1984) (evidence of good military character properly excluded in larceny prosecution because offense did not have sufficient nexus to performance of military duties, distinguishing Clemons); United States v. McConnell, 20 M.J. 577 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) (same result as Fitzgerald, supra); United States v. Piatt, 17 M.J. 442 (C.M.A. 1984) (accused should have been allowed to present evidence of his good character as a drill instructor in a court-martial where he was charged with assault upon a recruit); United States v. McNeill, 17 M.J. 451 (C.M.A. 1984) (evidence of accused's good general military character was admissible in prosecution for sodomy where he denied the offense and asserted his proper professional conduct on the day in question); United States v. Kahakauwila, 19 M.J. 60 (C.M.A. 1984) (because offense of possessing, selling, and transferring marijuana was charged as violation of naval regulations, evidence of accused's performance of military duties and overall military character was admissible to show that he conformed to demands of military laws and was not a person who would have committed such an act in violation of regulations); United States v. Pershing, 28 M.J. 668 (A.F.C.M.R. 1989) (failure of military judge to admit evidence of accused's good military character in prosecution for larceny constituted error); United States v. Lutz, 18 M.J. 763 (C.G.C.M.R. 1984) (although evidence of good military character is admissible as a trait of character when pertinent to the charges, it is necessary to look at the defense theory and offenses charged; in prosecution for sexual child abuse, evidence of accused's good military character held to be not pertinent and inadmissible). But see United States v. Wilson, 28 M.J. 48 (C.M.A. 1989) (military judge should have admitted evidence of accused's good military character with respect to sodomy, adultery, and indecent language charges involving wives of accused's military subordinates).

3. A helpful analysis for both counsel and the military judge in determining whether exclusion of evidence of the accused's good military character is prejudicial was provided by the Court of Military Appeals in United States v. Weeks, 20 M.J. 22 (C.M.A. 1985). The court held that evidence of good military character of an accused charged with selling marijuana in violation of naval regulations was admissible as substantive evidence, and suggested the following questions in order to test for prejudice from exclusion of such evidence: (1) Is the government's case strong and conclusive; (2) is the defense's theory of the case feeble or implausible; (3) is the proffered evidence material, and is the question of whether the accused is the type of person who would engage in the alleged criminal conduct fairly raised by the government's theory of the case or by the defense; and (4) what is the quality of the proffered defense evidence, and is there any substitute for it in the record of trial. This analysis was applied in United States v. Klein, 20 M.J. 26 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 474 U.S. 1009, 106 S.Ct. 534 (1985) (false official statements); United States v. Wilson, 20 M.J. 31 (C.M.A. 1985) (drug offenses); United States v. Belz, 20 M.J. 33 (C.M.A. 1985) (charges of conduct unbecoming an officer due to drug offenses); United States v. Traveler, 20 M.J. 35 (C.M.A. 1985) (drug offenses); United States v. Vandelinder, 20 M.J. 41 (C.M.A. 1985) (drug offenses); and United States v. Hurtt, 22 M.J. 134 (C.M.A. 1986) (drug offenses).

4. Instructions. For an instruction on the use of a pertinent trait of the accused, see Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, inst. 7-8(I) (1982).

D. Character of the victim

1. Under Mil.R.Evid. 404(a)(2), the defense may choose to offer evidence concerning any "pertinent" trait of character of the victim of a crime. This pertinent trait of character of the victim must be relevant to an issue in the case. See United States v. Agee, 23 M.J. 506 (A.F.C.M.R. 1986) (in an unprovoked assault, victim's "propensity" for engaging other persons in altercation irrelevant where defense failed to show accused had knowledge of the propensity). See also Mil.R.Evid. 401 and 402. For example, to help establish an abandonment of rank defense to a disrespect charge, the defense may offer evidence that the "victim" of the disrespect has a reputation for using profanity and taunting subordinates. Once the defense presents such evidence, the government may use opinion or reputation evidence to rebut the assertion. One pertinent trait of a victim's character that is usually not admissible under rule 404(a)(2), because of its specific exclusion, is evidence relating to the past sexual behavior of the victim of a nonconsensual sexual offense. Rule 412 preempts this area with its "notwithstanding any other provision of these rules" language. This rule is discussed in part four of this chapter.

2. Additionally, in any assault or homicide case, the government may offer evidence of the pertinent character trait of peacefulness of the victim to rebut evidence that the victim was the aggressor. Note that, in this instance, any claim of self-defense will be sufficient to allow the admission of this pertinent character trait evidence by the government; and the trial counsel may offer such evidence without waiting until the defense offers character evidence. The claim of self-defense automatically puts the victim's character for peacefulness in issue. See United States v. Iturralde-Aponte, 1 M.J. 196 (C.M.A. 1975).

3. For an instruction on the use of evidence of a victim's character, see Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, inst. 7-8(II) (1982).

E. Character of the witness. Mil.R.Evid. 404(a)(3) allows the use of character evidence for impeachment purposes, as provided in rules 607, 608 and 609. Stated in summary fashion, Mil.R.Evid. 607 permits the credibility of a witness to be attacked by any party; Mil.R.Evid. 608 permits use of character evidence to attack or support the truthfulness or untruthfulness of a witness under certain situations; and Mil.R.Evid. 609 permits the impeachment of a witness by evidence of conviction of crime. These rules are discussed in Chapter VII, part two, infra.

Unlike the situation where the defense controls the use of substantive character evidence under rules 404(a)(1) and (2), under 404(a)(3) either party may initiate the use of character evidence of a witness for the purpose of impeachment. See Mil.R.Evid. 607. Once a witness takes the stand to testify, his or her character for truthfulness is in issue and subject to attack.

When character evidence is used under 404(a)(3) for impeachment, a limiting instruction may be requested under rule 105. For a sample instruction, see Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, inst. 7-8(III) (1982). Whether counsel requests that the military judge give a limiting instruction is a question of trial tactics. Will the limiting instruction help or hinder the case? For instance, the granting of the limiting instruction may only serve to remind the members of damaging evidence.

F. Distinction between rules 404(a)(1) and (2) and rule 404(a)(3)

1. The key distinction between rules 404(a)(1) and (2), and rule 404(a)(3), is the ultimate use to which the evidence may be applied by the trier of fact. Evidence of "pertinent character traits" of the accused or a victim may be used in the determination of the accused's guilt or innocence (i.e., substantively). The character of a witness, as limited by Mil.R.Evid. 608 to the trait for truthfulness or untruthfulness, may be used only in a determination of the witness' credibility. Difficulties may arise when the accused or victim testifies as a witness. In this situation, the accused's or victim's pertinent character trait for truthfulness or untruthfulness goes to their credibility, while any "pertinent character trait" under rule 404(a)(1) and (2) may be used substantively.

2. As an illustration, consider the case where an accused is charged with the offense of assault. The defense counsel presents evidence of the accused's character trait for peacefulness and the accused testifies as a witness. The prosecution can rebut with evidence of the accused's reputation for violence and also present opinion or reputation evidence of the accused's character for untruthfulness. The defense can then counter with evidence of the accused's character for truthfulness. The military judge would instruct the members that they could consider the accused's character traits for peacefulness or violence in determining his guilt or innocence of the charge of assault, but they could consider his traits for truthfulness or untruthfulness only in determining his credibility as a witness, not in determining his guilt of the charge. The members may find it difficult to apply the concept that part of a person's character goes to his potential guilt of the charge while another part does not.

3. For an extensive discussion of this issue by the Court of Military Appeals, see United States v. Robertson, 39 M.J. 211 (C.M.A. 1994) (character evidence of accused's honesty was excludable on ground accused had not yet testified so his character was not at issue). United States v. Everage, 19 M.J. 189 (C.M.A. 1985) (although truthfulness of the accused would have been a "pertinent trait" if, for example, the accused had been prosecuted for making a false official statement, it did not bear directly upon his guilt or innocence of charged drug offenses).

G. Evidence of other crimes, wrongs or acts. Mil.R.Evid. 404(b). Traditionally, this area of the law in military justice has been called "uncharged misconduct." The Federal courts label it "extrinsic offense evidence." For our purposes, we will use the terms "uncharged misconduct" and "extrinsic evidence" interchangeably. The present rule 404(b) is substantially similar to former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 138g, in its effect. See United States v. Stokes, 12 M.J. 229 (C.M.A. 1982); United States v. Thomas, 11 M.J. 388 (C.M.A. 1981). It must be recognized that Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) specifically prohibits the use of past crimes, wrongs, or acts for the purpose of proving the character of an individual to show that the person acted in conformity therewith. Therefore, Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) is not really a rule of character evidence at all, since both substantive and impeachment character evidence is inadmissible to prove a person acted in conformity with his or her character. Rather, it is a means to alert the reader to the many avenues available for admitting evidence of other criminal acts. Only one evidentiary hypothesis for the use of uncharged misconduct (extrinsic offense evidence) is precluded: use of extrinsic offenses solely to establish the accused's character.

1. Prohibition against demonstrating character. The easiest way to understand subsection (b) of rule 404 is to separate its two sentences. The first sentence establishes that evidence of uncharged misconduct cannot be used to demonstrate the character of a person, usually the accused, in order to show that he has acted in conformity with his past acts. The principle at work is that specific acts may not be used to prove the kind of person someone is in order to show how he probably acted on a particular occasion. This is consistent with the general philosophy and language of Mil.R.Evid. 404(a) and the limitation on proof of character in Mil.R.Evid. 405. The sentence applies whether or not the extrinsic offense ever resulted in apprehension, referral, preferral, or conviction.

2. Admissible for other purposes. The second line of Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) indicates that such evidence of past crimes, wrongs, or acts may be admissible if offered to prove motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident. This is only a partial list of exceptions, thus providing the trial judge with discretion to adopt additional provisions. See United States v. Castillo, 29 M.J. 145 (C.M.A. 1989). This reading of the list of "other purposes" as examples of consequential facts is confirmed by the drafters' analysis to rule 404(b): "Rule 404(b) provides examples rather than a list of justifications for admission of evidence of other misconduct." Mil.R.Evid 404 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-32.

a. Use of uncharged misconduct on the merits. The most important aspect of subsection (b) is that it may be used to introduce evidence of the acts of an accused, even though he does not testify in his own behalf. This means Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) can be used as part of the government's case-in-chief as substantive evidence to be considered by the finder of fact in determining guilt or innocence, not just as a matter affecting credibility. It is no wonder that subdivision (b) is so heavily litigated. Any time that the prosecution attempts to offer other acts of the accused as part of its substantive proof, there is a very real problem of prejudice. See United States v. Beechum, 582 F.2d 898 (5th Cir. 1978) (en banc), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 920 (1979). These other acts ordinarily involve some kind of wrongdoing or misbehavior. No matter how carefully the court members are instructed that the evidence is not to be used in determining whether the accused is a good or bad person, there is a possibility of misuse. The worse the act, the greater the chance that court members may lose sympathy for the accused and decide against him because he is a bad person—something that the law does not allow.

b. Use of uncharged misconduct for impeachment purposes. This rule does not deal with the use of extrinsic offense evidence for purposes of impeachment. See Mil.R.Evid. 608 and 609; United States v. Owens, 21 M.J. 117 (C.M.A. 1985) (Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) permitted trial counsel to impeach accused by extracting on cross-examination his admission to a prior act of intentional falsehood under oath concerning prior convictions and arrests).

c. Relevancy analysis. Rule 404(b) is simply a specialized rule under the relevancy section of the Mil.R.Evid. Accordingly, as with any relevancy determination under rule 401, counsel offering extrinsic offense evidence must be prepared to (1) identify the consequential fact to which the proffered extrinsic evidence is directed (e.g., identity, motive, etc.); (2) establish the extrinsic offense and the accused's connection with it; and (3) articulate the evidentiary hypothesis by which the consequential fact may be inferred from the proffered evidence. See Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 108 S.Ct. 1496 (1988).

Once the proffered evidence is shown to be relevant and that it is not offered to demonstrate the prohibited area of character, Mil.R.Evid. 403 must still be considered. The drafters' analysis explicitly states that "Rule 404(b) is subject to Rule 403." Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) drafters' analysis. These two rules are frequently cited in tandem in Federal cases. It has been held, for example, in a prosecution for possession of drugs with intent to distribute, that the military judge erred in permitting a government witness to testify that the accused had been selling drugs for years and had, on one occasion, distributed drugs to the witness' child. Whatever the admissibility of the evidence under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) may have been, the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweighed any probative value which such evidence may have possessed. United States v. Brooks, 26 M.J. 28 (C.M.A. 1988); see also United States v. Cousins, 35 M.J. 70 (C.M.A. 1992) (improper for witness to testify that accused charged with cocaine use had used methamphetamine on 11 prior unrelated occasions).

To protect the interest of the accused, the defense counsel should ensure that the military judge realizes his responsibility to measure all tentatively admitted evidence against the criteria expounded in rule 403. Thus, the military judge must conduct a balancing test in which the probative value of the evidence is weighed against its potential for prejudice after determining that the evidence meets the requirements of rule 404(b). This two-step approach was followed in United States v. Conley, 523 F.2d 650 (8th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 920 (1976). The defense counsel can further protect the accused by proposing ways in which probative evidence in a particular case may be admitted without exposing the accused to undue prejudice. See, e.g., United States v. Dansker, 537 F.2d 40 (3d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 1038 (1977) (selective exclusion of evidence of defendant's prior acts, coupled with tailored limiting instruction, sufficiently reduced prejudicial impact). The military judge possesses a great deal of discretion in this area, and he is arguably authorized "to interpret the rules creatively so as to promote growth and development in the law of evidence in the interests of justice and reliable fact-finding." United States v. Jackson, 405 F. Supp. 938, 943 (E.D.N.Y. 1975). See Mil.R.Evid. 102. As Judge Friendly observed in United States v. Kahaner, 317 F.2d 459, 471-72 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 836 (1963): "True, the trial judge should, in an exercise of sound discretion, exclude evidence tending to show the commission of other crimes 'where the minute peg of relevancy will be entirely obscured by the dirty linen hung upon it.'"

d. Examples of "other purposes." The following examples of legitimate "other purposes" for the use of extrinsic offense evidence and some citations to military case law on uncharged misconduct are offered for the reader's consideration. The Federal cases on rule 404(b) are too numerous to detail and are easily researched for particular points.

- (1) When it tends to prove a plan or design of the accused.

Example: The accused is being tried for having obtained money from Z by going through a marriage ceremony with her, securing the funds on a false representation that he would invest them for her, and then absconding. Evidence that he pursued the same course with W, X, and Y is admissible.

Note, however, that in order for uncharged offenses to be relevant to show a common scheme, plan, or design, they must be shown to be more than similar to the charged offenses; they must be almost identical to the charged acts and to each other so as to naturally suggest that all those acts were results of the same plan. Compare United States v. Rappaport, 22 M.J. 445 (C.M.A. 1986) (evidence tending to establish only a propensity, rather than a plan, not admissible under 404(b)) and United States v. Brannan, 18 M.J. 181 (C.M.A. 1984) (uncharged drug offenses not sufficiently similar to charged offenses to justify admission to show scheme or plan) with United States v. Acton, 38 M.J. 330 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1056 (1994) (uncharged misconduct of accused showering with his children and showing pornographic movies admissible in sexual assault case to establish accused's brainwashing plan and scheme); United States v. Lake, 36 M.J. 317 (C.M.A. 1993) (evidence accused conspired and engaged in 10 prior drug sales admissible to show common plan and motive). United States v. Brooks, 22 M.J. 441 (C.M.A. 1986) (evidence that accused participated in uncharged drug sales and purchases permitted to show he aided and abetted a charged sale). See also United States v. Munoz, 32 M.J. 359 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 437 (1991) (testimony about the accused's sexual abuse of another daughter 11 years before trial was admissible to show plan; the court also relied on defense counsel's failure to object).

- (2) When it tends to prove knowledge or guilty intent in a case in which such matters are in issue.

Example: The accused is charged with receiving stolen goods knowing them to have been stolen. Evidence that, before the occasion charged, he had received stolen goods under similar circumstances is admissible as tending to prove that, on the occasion charged, he knew that the goods which were then received by him had been stolen.

Example: The accused is charged with larceny of property belonging to X. Evidence that the accused sold the property is admissible—even if the sale is itself an offense—since this evidence would tend to prove that he intended to deprive X of the property permanently.

The seminal case in this area prior to the Military Rules of Evidence was United States v. Janis, 1 M.J. 395 (C.M.A. 1976), where the accused was charged with unpremeditated murder of his infant son and the court found no error in admitting evidence that another son had died under similar circumstances three years earlier. In this case, the court established that three criteria must be satisfied before extrinsic offense evidence could be admitted. First, there must be a "nexus in time, place, and circumstances between the offense charged and the uncharged misconduct." Id. at 397. The court was very liberal in applying the test, finding that a three-year interval was not too remote. Second, the extrinsic offense would have to be established by "plain, clear and conclusive" evidence to be admissible. Id. Finally, the court adopted a rule 403 balance indicating that the extrinsic offense evidence would be excluded if it threatened the "fairness of the trial process," and its prejudicial impact outweighed its probative value. Id. Again the court was liberal, striking the balance in favor of excluding the evidence only if it was inflammatory. Cases applying Janis include United States v. White, 23 M.J. 84 (C.M.A. 1986) (evidence of prior injuries to child admissible using Janis analysis); United States v. Barus, 16 M.J. 624 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983) (similar incidents of drug abuse admissible under Janis test); United States v. Woodyard, 16 M.J. 715 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983) (proof the accused possessed homosexual literature was properly admitted to prove intent to commit sodomy); United States v. King, 16 M.J. 990 (A.C.M.R. 1983) (similar past acts of sexual improprieties met Janis criteria in sodomy case); United States v. Vilches, 17 M.J. 851 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984) (admission of prior uncharged acts of sodomy in court-martial or charges of nonconsensual sodomy, indecent assault, and wrongful fraternization); United States v. Cox, 18 M.J. 72 (C.M.A. 1984) (in prosecution of indecent liberties, pattern of lustful intent established in several specifications may be used as circumstantial evidence of intent in another specification); United States v. Brannan, 18 M.J. 181 (C.M.A. 1984) (although uncharged drug offenses were not sufficiently similar to charged offenses to justify admission to show a common scheme or plan, the evidence was admissible to rebut the defense of lack of criminal intent using Janis criteria); United States v. Garries, 19 M.J. 845 (A.F.C.M.R. 1985), aff'd, 22 M.J. 288 (C.M.A. 1986), cert. denied, 107 S.Ct. 575 (1986) (statement of accused that "if you don't come and get me, I'll kill her" admissible on issues of intent and motive in murder prosecution); United States v. Martin, 20 M.J. 227 (C.M.A. 1985), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 917, 107 S.Ct. 323 (1986) (evidence of uncharged misconduct, normally admissible in contested case under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b), not rendered inadmissible when accused pleaded guilty; analysis of government evidence on sentencing is first to determine if evidence tends to prove or disprove existence of facts permitted by sentencing rules, and if so, whether evidence is admissible under Mil.R.Evid.); United States v. Peterson, 20 M.J. 806 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) (military judge incorrectly applied "signature" and similarity tests to evidence of uncharged misconduct offered by government to prove intent, when they should be applied only to evidence of uncharged misconduct offered to prove modus operandi and common plan or design, respectively).

It should be noted, however, that the continuing viability of the standards set forth in Janis is questionable. The court of military appeals has stated, on at least two occasions, that Janis was a pre-Rules case and that Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) has simply superseded Janis. United States v. Brooks, 22 M.J. 441 (C.M.A. 1986); United States v. Mirandes-Gonzalez, 26 M.J. 411 (C.M.A. 1988). In United States v. Reynolds, 29 M.J. 105 (C.M.A. 1989) the court allowed testimony that the accused had committed similar acts of sexual misconduct on occasions previous to the charged offense. Although modus operandi evidence normally only enjoys logical relevancy to prove identity, the court allowed the evidence as a means to prove the accused's intent with respect to whether sexual intercourse was consensual. Without commenting upon the Janis test described above, the court established a new test for the admissibility of uncharged misconduct: (1) Does the evidence reasonably support a finding by the court members that the accused committed prior crimes, wrongs or acts?; (2) What fact of consequence is made more or less probable by the existence of this evidence?; and (3) Is the probative value substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice? Absent the explicit overruling of Janis, it would appear that Reynolds is a refinement of the Janis test.

In prosecutions for desertion based upon an unauthorized absence with the intent to remain away permanently, the Court of Military Appeals has sustained the admission into evidence of convictions for previous unauthorized absences as relevant to the question of whether the accused entertained the intent to remain away permanently. United States v. Renshaw, 9 C.M.A. 52, 25 C.M.R. 314 (1958); United States v. Graham, 5 C.M.A. 265, 17 C.M.R. 265 (1954); United States v. Deller, 3 C.M.A. 409, 12 C.M.R. 165 (1953); United States v. Powell, 3 C.M.A. 64, 11 C.M.R. 64 (1953).

However, not every record of previous unauthorized absence is indicative of the intent to remain away permanently during a later absence and, standing alone, unauthorized absence does not necessarily support an inference of an intent to remain away permanently. United States v. Wallace, 19 C.M.A. 146, 41 C.M.R. 146 (1969). If the record of previous absences does not shed light clearly on the accused's mental attitude with respect to the offense charged, it must be excluded from evidence. Id. at 148.

United States v. Wallace, supra, approved the admissibility of three prior unauthorized absences and provided some guidelines for determining whether or not such absences should be received into evidence:

- (a) The duration of the previous unauthorized absences;
- (b) the method of termination;
- (c) whether previous unauthorized absences are separate in time and circumstances from the second or succeeding unauthorized absences;
- (d) whether the prior unauthorized absence can fairly be considered a part of the course of conduct evidenced by the subsequent absences; and

(e) whether the entire record of unauthorized absences can fairly be viewed as portraying a person who refuses to remain with the service except when in confinement or some other form of restraint, thus indicating a defiant attitude of "I will not serve voluntarily."

Previously, there was a question as to whether evidence of uncharged misconduct which shows intent can be offered into evidence when there is no actual dispute as to intent. In United States v. Sweeney, 48 M.J. 117 (1998), the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces resolved the issue by holding that the military judge did not abuse his discretion by admitting evidence of the accused's threatening conduct towards his first wife, for the limited purpose of showing his subsequent intent to frighten his second wife. The court concluded that, since the government still maintained the burden of proof on each element, the evidence was admissible.

(3) When it tends to identify the accused as the perpetrator of the offense charged.

Example: Two adjoining buildings are burglarized on the same night and in a similar manner. It is permissible to show upon the trial of an accused for burglarizing one of the buildings that he participated in the burglary of the other, for this evidence has a reasonable tendency to establish that he participated in the burglary charged.

Example: The accused is charged with burglary. Evidence is admissible that the burglar left a pistol at the scene of the burglary and that the pistol had recently been stolen from X by the accused.

Example: The accused is being tried for inducing X to turn over a large sum of money by a peculiarly ingenious fraudulent scheme. Evidence that the accused obtained money from Y by the same scheme is admissible.

A carefully worded limiting instruction would be especially appropriate in these situations. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 17 M.J. 548 (A.C.M.R. 1983), petition denied, 18 M.J. 432 (C.M.A. 1984) (evidence of uncharged robbery committed 20 months before charged robbery admitted to show identity of perpetrator, after application of Janis criteria); United States v. Rappaport, 22 M.J. 445 (C.M.A. 1986) (where identity of accused was not in issue, it was error to admit evidence purporting to show modus operandi; additionally, uncharged acts purporting to show modus operandi must be so unusual and distinctive as to be like a signature). See also Reynolds, supra. But see United States v. Jones, 32 M.J. 155 (C.M.A. 1991) (accused put identity in issue by raising alibi defense, opening the door to proof of prior drug sales at the same location).

(4) When it tends to prove motive. See United States v.

Sellers, 12 C.M.A. 262, 30 C.M.R. 262 (1961), where evidence that the accused frequently gambled, that his checking account was overdrawn, and that he had written bad checks was admissible as tending to establish a motive for the offense of stealing from funds of which he was custodian.

(5) When it tends to show lack of accident or mistake or to negate a defense of entrapment.

Example: The accused is charged with an offense involving an accusation that he administered poison to X. The accused, expressly or by implication, defends on the ground that he administered the poison to X as a result of accident or mistake. Evidence that the accused had poisoned other persons is admissible if the circumstances of the other acts are so similar to the circumstances of the act charged that the other acts tend to show that the act charged was not the result of accident or mistake.

Example: The accused is charged with selling military property without proper authority. He defends on the grounds of entrapment, claiming that the sale was solicited by a government agent. Evidence that on previous relatively recent occasions the accused had sold military property without proper authority is admissible to show that on the occasion charged the accused was not an unwilling participant.

See United States v. Edmond, 37 M.J. 787 (A.C.M.R. 1993), rev. granted, 39 M.J. 428 (1994), where the court held that the government could introduce accused's similar acts of writing bad checks to show lack of mistake and the accused's lack of interest in maintaining sufficient funds. United States v. Conrad, 15 C.M.A. 439, 35 C.M.R. 411 (1965), where the court held that testimony that the accused had admitted committing other similar offenses and having a sexual problem was admissible to rebut a defense of accident to a charge of indecent exposure. See also United States v. Bryant, 3 M.J. 9 (C.M.A. 1977), where the court held that, when evidence of prior sales is offered to rebut the defense allegation of entrapment, the members must be specifically instructed that they may consider such evidence only for the purpose of determining the accused's general predisposition, and not for any inference that it might otherwise create concerning the specific predisposition to make this particular sale [citing United States v. Grunden, 2 M.J. 116 (C.M.A. 1977)].

e. Instructions. As has been noted previously, if evidence of extrinsic offenses of the accused is admitted under rule 404(b), a limiting instruction may be appropriate under Mil.R.Evid. 105 to ensure the members do not draw the conclusion from the 404(b) evidence that the accused is a bad person.

3. Conviction or acquittal. The language of Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) and the explicit statement of the drafters' analysis make it clear that the extrinsic offense need not have led to a conviction. But, what of the case where the offense has led to an acquittal at trial? There are really two separate aspects to this question. The first is simply whether Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) prohibits the use of such evidence, and the second is really the constitutional question of whether the double jeopardy clause of the fifth amendment prohibits any use of such evidence.

As to the Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) issue, the two leading military cases on this point are United States v. Hicks, 24 M.J. 3 (C.M.A. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 827, 108 S.Ct. 95 (1987) and United States v. Cuellar, 27 M.J. 50 (C.M.A. 1988), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 811, 110 S.Ct. 54 (1989). In Hicks, the accused stood charged with rape and the government called as witnesses against the accused two young ladies who testified that the accused had on previous occasions forced them to have sex with him by using the same modus operandi which he allegedly used in the case of the charged offense. The accused had actually been prosecuted at a court-martial for each of these two prior rapes and had been acquitted. He was, however, convicted of the charged rape and, on appeal, he contended that the evidence was inadmissible under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) because of the acquittal at the previous court-martial. In separate opinions, Chief Judge Everett and Judge Cox affirmed, finding the evidence to be admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b). Judge Sullivan did not participate. Subsequently, in Cuellar, C.M.A. reaffirmed its earlier decision in Hicks.

In Cuellar, the accused was charged with committing an indecent act upon a 10-year-old girl who was an overnight guest at his house. In order to show the accused's modus operandi, the government called two other young girls who testified that he had committed similar acts under similar circumstances against them several years earlier while they had been staying at his house overnight. The allegations of these other two young girls had resulted in criminal prosecutions against the accused in state courts, both of which resulted in acquittals. C.M.A. held that the testimony of the young girls was properly admitted under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) to show the accused's modus operandi. It should be noted, however, that C.M.A. went on to say that, under such circumstances, it is error for the military judge to deny the accused the opportunity to put on evidence that he was acquitted. In United States v. Schneider, 38 M.J. 387 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 2100 (1994) the accused was acquitted in state court of attempted murder. He was later tried at a court-martial on a new charge of attempted murder and of committing perjury at the state court trial. The court found no error in the trial judge's refusal to sever the charges as even if severance had occurred, the evidence of the other charge would have been admissible to prove motive under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b). See also United States v. Lidler, 46 M.J. 63 (C.A.A.F. 1996).

As to the constitutional issue, once again Hicks and Cuellar are the two leading military cases. The issue was complicated, however, by the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in Ashe v. Swenson, 397 U.S. 436, 90 S.Ct. 1189, 25 L.Ed.2d 469 (1970), but then clarified in Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342, 110 S.Ct. 668 (1990). In Ashe v. Swenson, the accused was prosecuted by state authorities for his role in allegedly robbing six individuals who had been engaged in a poker game. At the first prosecution, he was charged with robbing one of the six individuals and was acquitted. Six weeks later, he was charged with robbing another of the six players in connection with the same incident. In fact, most of the witnesses against the accused at the second trial were the same witnesses who had testified against him at the first trial. The U.S. Supreme Court held that the second prosecution was barred by the collateral estoppel doctrine of the double jeopardy clause of the fifth amendment. The Court noted that the single rationally conceivable issue in the first prosecution was whether the accused had been the man who robbed the six players and his acquittal therefore operated to bar any subsequent relitigation of this issue in a subsequent prosecution by the same sovereign. In Dowling, the defendant faced charges in Federal court for armed robbery. The government offered testimony about an earlier, yet similar, offense that had resulted in an acquittal in an earlier Federal trial. Since the testimony about the earlier trial did not go to the ultimate issue, it was admissible over defense objection.

Regarding the standards of proof, some Federal courts purport to require clear and convincing evidence [see, e.g., United States v. Calvert, 523 F.2d 895 (8th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 424 U.S. 911, 96 S.Ct. 1106 (1976)]. This is not in accord with prior military practice or a fair reading of rules 401 and 402. Interpreting Fed.R.Evid. 404(b), the U.S. Supreme Court has held that, in order to put on evidence of some prior bad act of the accused, the government need only put on enough evidence to satisfy the conditional relevance standard of Fed.R.Evid. 104(b) ("evidence sufficient to support a finding of the fulfillment of the condition"). Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681, 108 S.Ct. 1496, 99 L.Ed.2d 771 (1988). The court of military appeals has adopted the same interpretation of Mil.R. Evid. 404(b). United States v. Mirandes-Gonzalez, 26 M.J. 411 (C.M.A. 1988).

4. Defense use of bad acts. S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi, and D. Schlueter raise an interesting point as to the possible use of rule 404(b) by the defense.

Most judicial attention has focused on the typical case in which the prosecution is offering evidence against an accused. It should be remembered, however, that an accused might be able to offer evidence of a government's witness' bad acts for the defense's own purposes. For example, in order to demonstrate that the accused was not a co-actor in the charged offense, he might present extrinsic offense evidence demonstrating that the government's witness committed a past similar act without him [fn omitted]. In a drug prosecution, defense counsel may want to show that the same government informant who allegedly coerced the accused into dealing with him, has coerced other individuals into the same type of misconduct [fn omitted]. In other cases the accused might want to offer evidence of his own other acts . . . to explain why certain conduct charged by the government actually was part of a legal pattern of events. See, e.g., United States v. Garvin, 565 F.2d 519 (8th Cir. 1977).

5. Defense waiver. According to United States v. Munoz, 32 M.J. 359 (C.M.A. 1991), the limits of rule 404(b) may be further relaxed when the defense fails to object.

6. Trial counsel notice requirement. Change 7 to the MCM incorporates the amendment to Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) that requires trial counsel give notice of intended use of extrinsic character evidence if requested by defense counsel.

0509 METHODS OF PROVING CHARACTER. Mil.R.Evid. 405.

Rule 405. Methods of Proving Character

(a) Reputation or opinion. In all cases in which evidence of character or a trait of character of a person is admissible, proof may be made by testimony as to reputation or by testimony in the form of an opinion. On cross-examination, inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. In cases in which character or a trait of character of a person is an essential element of an offense or defense, proof may also be made of specific instances of the person's conduct.

(c) Affidavits. The defense may introduce affidavits or other written statements of persons other than the accused concerning the character of the accused. If the defense introduces affidavits or other written statements under this subdivision, the prosecution may, in rebuttal, also introduce affidavits or other written statements regarding the character of the accused. Evidence of this type may be introduced by the defense or prosecution only if, aside from being contained in an affidavit or other written statement, it would otherwise be admissible under these rules.

(d) Definitions. "Reputation" means the estimation in which a person generally is held in the community in which the person lives or pursues a business or profession. "Community" in the armed forces includes a post, camp, ship, station, or other military organization regardless of size.

A. General

1. Mil.R.Evid. 405 governs methods of proving character. It does not determine whether such evidence is admissible. Admissibility of character evidence is within the domain of rule 404. Nevertheless, the two rules are related in that the applicability of rule 405 is dependent on the purpose for which character evidence is offered. Once it is determined that character evidence is admissible, either because character is in issue or because the circumstantial use thereof is permissible under the exceptions enumerated in Mil.R.Evid. 404(a), rule 405(a) governs the methods of proving character.

2. The rule provides three methods for proving a witness' character: (1) By reputation testimony; (2) by opinion testimony, and (3) by evidence of specific conduct. The first two methods, reputation or opinion testimony, are available to prove character in any situation where it is admissible. The third method, proof by specific instances of conduct, is allowable only in the situation where the character of a person is an "essential element" of an offense or defense (i.e., not when character is used circumstantially, but when character is "in issue"). The only situation in military practice where character is an essential element is the predisposition of the accused in rebuttal to a posed entrapment defense.

Reputation and opinion testimony are discussed together in section 0509.B, infra, while proof by specific acts is covered in section 0509.C, infra.

3. Mil.R.Evid. 405 does not determine methods of proof when "evidence is being introduced not to prove that a person acted in conformity with his character, but to prove something else such as motive or intent under rule 404(b). In such a case, even though character is proved incidentally, any method of proof including extrinsic proof of other crimes, wrongs or acts is acceptable." J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence 405-16 (1988). Nor does rule 405 limit the methods of proof enumerated therein when character evidence is used to attack a witness' credibility. Mil.R.Evid. 608 and 609 govern modes of proof in such a case. Id.

B. Reputation and opinion evidence

1. Subdivision (a) mandates that the proponent of character evidence will generally be limited to reputation or opinion testimony. The proponent here means the proponent of a particular piece of character evidence. The reader will remember that the initial proponent of character evidence of a "pertinent trait" of the accused or the victim will be the defense, except in assault and homicide cases where the defense can "open the door" merely by raising the issue of self-defense.

2. Reputation and opinion are closely related, but different, concepts.

a. Reputation is defined in Mil.R.Evid. 405(d) and is essentially that information that the witness knows about an individual from having heard community discussion about him. Rule 405(d) broadly defines "community" to encompass virtually any duty station to which a servicemember could be assigned, thus increasing the chance that an accused will have a pertinent reputation of some form. The key to reputation evidence is that it is not the witness' personal belief, but what the witness knows of the collective belief of the community (or communities, since the accused and witness can be members of more than one "community"). Reputation evidence is really hearsay testimony, but it falls under the exception of Mil.R.Evid. 803(19).

b. Opinion evidence relates to the personal belief of the witness. It is likely that most witnesses who are able to testify to the reputation of a person will also have a personal opinion. In fact, much reputation testimony is probably just camouflaged opinion testimony. It is possible for a witness to testify differently as to opinion and reputation on a pertinent trait. Opinion testimony is allowed by Mil.R.Evid. 701.

3. Foundation. Before either reputation or opinion testimony is offered, counsel must ensure that an adequate foundation has been laid for its admission. This, too, is essentially a showing of relevancy. To establish proper foundation for the admission of opinion testimony, it must be shown that the witness has such an acquaintance or relationship with the accused that the witness is qualified to form a reliable opinion on the trait to which he will testify. See, e.g., United States v. McClure, 11 C.M.A. 552, 29 C.M.R. 368 (1960), where it was held that an article 32 investigating officer who has had no previous contact with the accused and whose only knowledge of the accused was obtained from his activities as an investigating officer was not qualified by either time, opportunity, or relationship to form any opinion as to the accused's combat capability or performance of military duties. Consequently, it was error to permit the officer to testify for the prosecution as a rebuttal character witness and state his opinion that he would not want the accused in his command or in combat. The same rule would seem to apply concerning reputation testimony. United States v. Tomchek, 4 M.J. 66 (C.M.A. 1977). For reputation testimony, the basic foundational requirement is an adequate relationship of the witness to a community. Saltzburg, Schinasi, and Schlueter suggest that four questions are appropriate for laying a proper foundation: (1) Is the character witness familiar with the individual's reputation in some relevant community? (2) Is the witness competent to speak for the community with respect to the individual's reputation? In other words, is the witness sufficiently linked to the community to really know of the individual's reputation? (3) Is the witness' reputation knowledge timely with respect to the issue it addresses? (4) Does the reputation relate to the character trait that can be proven under Rule 404? Affirmative answers to all four questions are necessary for admissibility. S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi, and D. Schlueter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 485 (3rd ed. 1991). See NJS Evidentiary Foundations for sample foundation questions.

4. Testing the opinion or reputation testimony. The most effective way of testing a witness' opinion or reputation knowledge is by cross-examining that witness with respect to specific instances of conduct. Mil.R.Evid. 405(a) authorizes this approach, which usually involves asking a witness "have you heard" type questions. "Have you heard" questions may not be appropriate when examining opinion witnesses. Here counsel may ask "do you know" questions, since it is the witness' own belief, not the community's, which is important. For example, if the defense decides to open the door and put the accused's character in issue, Mil.R.Evid. 405(a) permits the defense to do so by calling witnesses to testify as to their opinion(s) of the appropriate pertinent trait(s) of the accused or to testify as to the accused's reputation with regard to the appropriate pertinent trait(s). The trial counsel may "test" the validity of an opinion or reputation witness' testimony by asking if the witness knows or has heard of incidents in which the accused has acted inconsistently with the trait about which the witness has testified. For example, suppose a defense witness testifies that the accused enjoys a reputation for honesty in his command. The trial counsel may ask the witness if he has heard that the accused has stolen items from members of his unit. Obviously, no matter how the witness responds, the impact of his or her testimony is diminished.

a. The inquiry into relevant specific instances of conduct allowed on cross-examination by Mil.R.Evid. 405(a) must be distinguished from the proof of character by specific instances of a person's conduct under Mil.R.Evid. 405(b). In the former, it is the witness' credibility that is being tested by the inquiry; the trait of character is not being proved substantively. In the latter, the specific acts are being used as substantive proof of character.

b. Caveat. Concerning this "testing," the trial counsel must have "reasonable basis" to ask such a question of the witness, and the military judge will, upon request, instruct that such questions are not evidence and that, if the witness has heard of such an incident, that information must be considered only for its effect on the original reputation evidence offered by the defense and not for any other purpose. The limited use of this evidence avoids the problem of considering counsel's hearsay in asking the question.

c. In United States v. Webster, 23 C.M.R. 492 (A.B.R. 1957), petition denied, 8 C.M.A. 768, 23 C.M.R. 421 (1957), a defense witness stated his opinion as to the accused's honesty in a trial for larceny and also testified as to the accused's reputation for honesty. On cross-examination, the trial counsel inquired of the witness' knowledge of a previous conviction of the accused for using a false pass with intent to deceive. The court held that, although specific acts of misconduct may not be used to establish bad character, when a witness gives opinion testimony as to the accused's character, the basis for his opinion may be tested in the same manner as any other opinion testimony, including cross-examination as to knowledge of the arrest or accusation of the accused for a crime, or as to whether he has heard of a previous conviction of the accused.

With respect to the inquiry on cross-examination concerning rumors or reports of specific acts of the accused's misconduct, Wigmore states:

This method of inquiry on cross-examination is frequently resorted to by counsel for the very purpose of injuring by indirection a character which they are forbidden directly to attack in that way; they rely upon the mere putting of the question (not caring that it is answered negatively) to convey their covert insinuation. The value of the inquiry for testing purposes is often so small and the opportunities of its abuse by underhand ways are so great that the practice may amount to little more than a mere subterfuge, and should be strictly supervised by forbidding it to counsel who do not use it in good faith.

3A Wigmore, supra.

The leading case approving such a cross-examination technique is Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948), where the court indicated that a heavy responsibility is placed on the trial courts to protect the practice from misuse, and praised the trial judge for assuring himself that there was a reasonable factual basis for the prosecutor's questions. In Michelson, the prosecutor asked several defense character and reputation witnesses during cross-examination if they had heard that the accused had been convicted some 20 years prior to trial. He also asked them if they had heard that the accused had been arrested some 27 years prior to trial. In each case, the witnesses said no. The U.S. Supreme Court held that the judge's action was proper in permitting these questions, in view of the fact that he (1) instructed the jury on the limited use they could make of this testimony and (2) satisfied himself that the prosecutor had a good-faith belief that the events had actually occurred. A similar result was obtained in United States v. Pearce, 27 M.J. 121 (C.M.A. 1988), where the trial counsel called a government witness to testify against the accused in a prosecution for larceny and housebreaking. During the defense counsel's cross-examination of the witness, the witness rendered a favorable opinion of the accused's character for honesty. The trial counsel thereupon sought to test the witness' opinion on redirect examination by asking him if he had been "aware of the fact that Sergeant Pearce, the accused today, was a suspect and was under investigation by the CID for the larceny of four tires and other items from a Buick Regal, the replacement value of which was approximately $950.00"? C.M.A. held that it was proper for the trial counsel to ask this question under Mil.R.Evid. 405. This result is especially interesting because Mil.R.Evid. 405 on its face limits such a tactic to cross-examination. Yet, in Pearce, the trial counsel was conducting redirect examination of his own witness.

5. Rebuttal opinion and reputation. In addition to being able to "test" the opinion of the witnesses of the proponent of the character evidence, the opponent is also permitted to rebut the opinion or reputation evidence offered by the proponent with contrary opinion or reputation evidence during the opponent's own case. The opponent is not limited to the mode of proof selected by the defense, but may rebut reputation with opinion and vice versa. This rebuttal evidence is not limited in its use to lessening the impact of the original character evidence, but may be offered to prove the opposite character trait and that the accused acted in conformity therewith on this occasion. Mil.R.Evid. 404(a)(1).

6. Timeliness of opinion or reputation

a. Often overlooked are the time limitations placed upon the admissibility of reputation or opinion testimony. This limitation of timeliness embodies the aspects of relevancy and fairness. The testimony as to a pertinent trait of character should relate to the person's character at the controlling time (i.e., at the time of the alleged offense). See, e.g., United States v. Lewis, 482 F.2d 632 (D.C. Cir. 1973). Testimony offered in regard to character evidence on the credibility of a testifying witness should refer to the time of trial. United States v. Brown, 43M.J. 43 (CAAF 1995).

b. Provided that the opinion or reputation evidence meets the time test for relevancy, cross-examination inquiry into specific acts should be limited to acts occurring before the controlling time (i.e., that point in time the court wishes to test the character trait, usually the time of the offense). See United States v. Polsinelli, 649 F.2d 793 (10th Cir. 1981), where defense character witnesses should not be asked if their opinion of the accused would change if he is actually guilty of the charged offenses. There is no early time limit on acts which may be inquired about. See, e.g., United States v. Edwards, 549 F.2d 362 (5th Cir.), cert. denied sub nom. United States v. Matassini, 434 U.S. 828 (1977). But rules 403 and 611(a) can be used to prevent unfairly prejudicial or wasteful questioning.

C. Specific instances of conduct. The drafters of Fed.R.Evid. 405(b), from which Mil.R.Evid. 405(b) was taken, were aware that proving character by specific acts of a person was potentially dangerous:

Of the three methods of proving character provided by the rule, evidence of specific instances of conduct is the most convincing. At the same time it possesses the greatest capacity to arouse prejudice, to confuse, to surprise, and to consume time. Consequently the rule confines the use of evidence of this kind to cases in which character is, in the strict sense, in issue and hence deserving of a searching inquiry. When character is used circumstantially and hence occupies a lesser status in the case, proof may be only by reputation and opinion. These latter methods are also available when character is in issue. This treatment is, with respect to specific instances of conduct and reputation, conventional contemporary common law doctrine.

Fed.R.Evid. 405 Advisory Committee note.

To put it another way, under subdivision (b), specific conduct evidence is not admissible to demonstrate that an individual had a certain character trait and acted in conformity with it. Rather, specific instances of conduct can be used only to establish an essential element of an offense or defense (i.e., when character is "in issue" as discussed in section 0507.B, supra). Thus, even an accused who is permitted to prove a pertinent trait under rule 404(a) may not do so with specific act evidence. In United States v. Shelkle, 47 M.J. 110 (C.A.A.F. 1997) the court upheld the trial court's decision to exclude specific instances of an accused's character, holding that the good military character defense does not have character as an essential element. According to this rule then, the defense, for example, would not be able to prove the accused's character for honesty in a theft case by showing that, on a former occasion, the accused found a watch and turned it in to the chief-master-at-arms. By contrast, if the accused raises the defense of entrapment in a drug sale case, the prosecution should be able to show specific instances when the accused has solicited to sell drugs. Such incidents directly prove predisposition, a fact which negates the innocent state of mind which is an element of the defense of entrapment.

The Federal criminal cases which address the issue of whether an accused's character is an "essential element" or "in issue" are all in the area of the entrapment defense. See, e.g., United States v. Mack, 643 F.2d 1119 (5th Cir. 1981). Relatively few military cases arise in this limited area, and it seems likely that military appellate courts applying rule 405(b) will adopt the conservative position taken by the court in United States v. Giles, 13 M.J. 669 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982). In Giles, the court held that the trait of peacefulness was not an element of self-defense. Thus, the trial judge properly precluded the defense from offering specific instances of the accused's peaceful behavior and correctly limited the defense to opinion and reputation evidence.

The holding in Giles is in accord with pre-Mil.R.Evid. precedent on the issue of specific acts. See, e.g., United States v. Baldwin, 17 C.M.A. 72, 37 C.M.R. 336 (1967); United States v. Harrison, 5 C.M.A. 208, 17 C.M.R. 208 (1954). In the military, it is anticipated that, except for entrapment cases, Mil.R.Evid. 405(b) will not be utilized.

The reader must distinguish proof by specific instances under rule 405(b) and inquiry on cross-examination into relevant specific instances of conduct under rule 405(a), as discussed in section 0509.B.4, supra. The former, as substantive evidence, is a very narrow exception, but if it is admissible under rule 405(b), extrinsic evidence may be used.

Proof of specific instances of conduct may be permitted to rebut the direct testimony of the accused that he has never, or has not within a certain period of time, committed an offense of any kind or of a certain kind. This would be for the limited purpose of impeachment by contradiction.

D. Affidavits. Rule 405(c) is unique to military practice. It was taken verbatim from former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 146b. In effect, it allows defense counsel to initiate character litigation by using affidavits or other written statements in place of in-court testimony. The rule goes on to provide that, if the defense is permitted to use such documentary evidence, the government may then respond in kind.

Note that Mil.R.Evid. 405(c) evidence applies only to the accused and not other witnesses. Also, in order for such documentary evidence to be admissible, it must not violate other Mil.R.Evid.'s (e.g., the evidence of character contained in the affidavits would have to be admissible if offered by testimony).

As the drafters' analysis notes, subdivision (c) is a necessary device in a worldwide judicial system. Because the rule can be initiated only by the accused, there should be no sixth amendment confrontation problems with it. While the provision does permit the government to make use of similar evidence in rebuttal, the accused can avoid any unfavorable results here by merely foregoing its use himself. Mil.R.Evid. 405 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-33.

0510 HABIT OR ROUTINE PRACTICE.

Rule 406. Habit; Routine Practice

Evidence of the habit of a person or of the routine practice of an organization, whether corroborated or not and regardless of the presence of eyewitnesses, is relevant to prove that the conduct of the person or organization on a particular occasion was in conformity with the habit or routine practice.

A. General. Mil.R.Evid. 406 is taken without change from the Federal rule and is similar, in effect, to former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 138.

As noted previously, habit must be distinguished from character; habit is not a trait. Instead, it has been defined as a course of behavior of a person regularly reported in like circumstances. A.L.I. Model Code of Evidence 189 (1942). The two concepts of habit and character are related in the Mil.R.Evid. and Fed.R.Evid. because both can involve a person's conduct on a particular occasion being inferred from past conduct by that person. Behavior on the part of a group, which is equivalent to individual habit, is designated "routine practice of an organization." Unfortunately, rule 406 defines neither "habit" nor "routine practice."

The drafters' analysis to rule 406 states an intent to have "organization" include every military organization, regardless of size. MCM, 1984, app. 22-33.

B. Scope of rule. Mil.R.Evid. 404 and 405 generally bar evidence of previous conduct when offered to establish that an individual or organization has acted in conformity with its past. However, rule 406 specifically permits its use under two circumstances.

1. First, with respect to individuals, evidence of a person's habit is admissible to show that the individual's conduct on a specific occasion was consistent with his conduct on past occasions. An example of this would be an accused who uses as an alibi defense the fact that, at the time of the alleged robbery, he was at store A in another location purchasing his daily paper. He could introduce evidence that he has the habit of buying his paper at the same time every day at store A, and has done so for over two years. This could be used to show that, at the time of the alleged robbery of store B, the accused was acting in accordance with his habit of buying the paper at store A.

2. Second, evidence of an organization's past routine practices is admissible to demonstrate that the organization acted consistently with those practices. An example of this would be the traditional "presumption of regularity" recognized in military practice with regard to certain governmental activities (e.g., the preparation of service record documents). See Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) and (8) (business entry and official document exceptions to the hearsay rule). See also United States v. Weaver, 1 M.J. 111 (C.M.A. 1975) (presumption of regularity inherent in court proceedings).

C. Proof. Mil.R.Evid. 406 does not provide standards for determining when repeated instances rise to the level of habit. (This discussion will use habit to mean routine practice also.) The Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee opines that "[w]hile adequacy of sampling and uniformity of response are key factors, precise standards for measuring their sufficiency for evidence purposes cannot be formulated." Fed.R.Evid. 406 Advisory Committee note. Thus, it is for the military judge to exercise sound discretion in characterizing a person's behavior as habit.

A common sense examination of "habit" would indicate that: (1) specificity, (2) consistency, and (3) regularity are required for actions to rise to the level of habit. Saltzburg, Schinasi, and Schlueter suggest that answers to the following five questions may satisfy the rule.

- (1) How often has the individual been observed performing the same conduct?
- (2) How similar is the past conduct with the conduct sought to be proved?
- (3) How unique is the conduct?
- (4) How uniformly or consistently has the conduct been performed?
- And (5), does the conduct appear to be virtually automatic rather than discretionary in nature?

S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi, and D. Schlueter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 502 (3rd ed. 1991).

Similarly, the rule does not specify how habit can be proven. The original Federal rule, as promulgated by the Supreme Court, provided for proof by opinion testimony or proof by specific instances, but this section was deleted by Congress. J. Weinstein and M. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence 406-22 (1988). So, the choice of how habit may be proved is also for the judge's discretion. Proof by evidence of a series of past acts would seem logically more probative than proof by testimony of a witness' opinion of another person's habits. A truly valid opinion would be based upon observation or other knowledge of repeated specific acts. Evidence is most likely to be admitted when its proponent is able to demonstrate that the individual performed the past acts without planning. The more counsel can offer detail to demonstrate this, the more likely a military judge will be to view it as habitual. See, e.g., United States v. Krejce, 5 M.J. 701 (N.C.M.R. 1978) (government able to rely on a recruiting sergeant's past habits to establish a proper enlistment; conviction reversed on other grounds). Similarly, when applying this logic to routine business or organization practices, counsel should be concerned with the frequency of the conduct more than uniqueness. An event which continually occurs is more likely to be viewed as a routine practice than one which rarely and unpredictably happens. It should be remembered that a foundation must be laid as to how the witness obtained knowledge of the specific facts or otherwise formed an opinion. The better the foundation, the more likely the admission of the evidence. There is no requirement for corroboration of the habit for it to be admissible, nor for the presence of eyewitnesses to specific acts. See, e.g., Cereste v. New York, New Haven & Hartford R. Co., 231 F.2d 50 (2d Cir. 1956), cert. denied, 351 U.S. 951 (1957).

The reader is reminded that general relevancy under rules 401 and 402 is still a major factor in determining the final admission of evidence such as habit and that counsel should never forget the possible effect rule 403 has on the military judge's decision.

D. Summary of specific acts use. The general rule is that evidence of specific acts may not be used to prove character or any pertinent character trait. See Mil.R.Evid. 404(b). However, there are generally five uses to which evidence of specific acts may be put.

1. Inquiry into specific acts is allowed to test the credibility of a witness giving character opinion or reputation testimony. Mil.R.Evid. 405(a).

2. Proof of specific acts is allowed when character or a pertinent character trait is an essential element of an offense or defense. Mil.R.Evid. 405(b).

3. Proof of specific acts is allowed to demonstrate other purposes than character (e.g., motive, plan, identity). Mil.R.Evid. 404(b).

4. As a preliminary matter, specific acts may be used to demonstrate the existence of a habit or routine practice. If the military judge accepts the fact that certain actions demonstrated by the acts are habit, the habit may then be used to prove conduct in conformity therewith. See Mil.R.Evid. 104 and 406.

5. Inquiry as to specific acts is allowed to attack or support the credibility of a witness. These acts must relate to truthfulness or untruthfulness, no extrinsic evidence of the acts is allowed, and limiting instructions may be given if requested. See Mil.R.Evid. 608(b), discussed in chapter VII, part two, infra.

PART THREE: RULES ON RELEVANCY OF SPECIFIC INSTANCES

0511 INTRODUCTION. As noted in the introduction to this chapter, a series of rules in the second half of Section IV of the Mil.R.Evid. deals with the relevancy of frequently recurring factual patterns. These are primarily exclusionary in nature. See Mil.R.Evid. 407-411. They reflect policy decisions that for some reason otherwise logically relevant evidence is declared inadmissible, at least for specific purposes. With the exception of the plea bargaining scenario of rule 410, the factual patterns set forth in rules 407-411 are predominantly directed to civil, not criminal, litigation. For the most part, these rules are taken from the Federal rules without change and, while offering little comment in their analysis of these rules, even the drafters of the Mil.R.Evid. speculate as to the applicability of some of these rules to court-martial practice. See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 409 and 411 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-33. Thus, the dearth of prior military and civilian criminal case law in this area would seem to bear them out.

0512 SUBSEQUENT REMEDIAL MEASURESRule 407, Subsequent Remedial Measures

When, after an event, measures are taken which, if taken previously would have made the event less likely to occur, evidence of the subsequent measures is not admissible to prove negligence or culpable conduct in connection with the event. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of subsequent measures when offered for another purpose, such as proving ownership, control, or feasibility of precautionary measures, if controverted, or impeachment.

A. Rationale. Rule 407 addresses incidents of negligent or culpable conduct and codifies for military criminal cases the standard practice of American courts in civil cases of excluding evidence of subsequent remedial measures as proof of an admission of fault. As noted by the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee in its commentary to Fed.R.Evid. 407:

The rule rests on two grounds. (1) The conduct is not in fact an admission, since the conduct is equally consistent with injury by mere accident or through contributory negligence. Or, as Baron Bramwell put it, the rule rejects the notion that "because the world gets wiser as it gets older, therefore it was foolish before." Hart v. Lancashire & Yorkshire Ry. Co., 21 L.T.R. N.S. 261, 263 (1869). Under a liberal theory of relevancy this ground alone would not support exclusion as the inference is still a possible

one. (2) The other, and more impressive, ground for exclusion rests on a social policy of encouraging people to take, or at least not discouraging them from taking, steps in furtherance of added safety. The courts have applied this principle to exclude evidence of subsequent repairs, installation of safety devices, changes in company rules, and discharge of employees, and the language of the present rule is broad enough to encompass all of them.

See also Falknor, Extrinsic Policies Affecting Admissibility, 10 Rutgers L. Rev. 574, 590 (1956).

The drafters' analysis notes that rule 407 has no foundation in previous Manual for Courts-Martial editions. Mil.R.Evid. 407 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-33.

B. Scope. The use of the phrase "remedial measures" apparently includes within the scope of the rule any post-accident change, repair, or precaution taken to avoid further problems. The drafters' analysis fails to indicate situations where these "remedial measures" might arise in military practice, but the most probable would be in prosecution for negligent homicide or for involuntary manslaughter resulting from a culpably negligent act under Articles 134 and 119(b)(1), UCMJ, respectively. Although negligent conduct is generally not sufficient to invoke criminal sanctions, military necessity has caused Congress to control and punish areas of conduct beyond those in the civilian community. In United States v. Kick, 7 M.J. 82 (C.M.A. 1979), the court affirmed a conviction despite appellant's contention that his negligent act should not have resulted in criminal liabilities. As in Kick, supra, most of these cases will involve vehicular accidents. As an example of a possible application of this rule, assume that A is in an automobile accident in which B, a passenger, is killed by being thrown from the car. Subsequent to the accident, A has seat belts installed in the car where he had previously removed them. A, charged with involuntary manslaughter, cannot have evidence of the seat belt reinstallation used as evidence against him as proof of culpability. However, his original act of removing the first set of seat belts would be admissible.

C. Other purposes. Mil.R.Evid. 407 does provide that under some circumstances whenever the evidence is offered for a purpose other than to show negligence or culpable conduct proof of an individual's subsequent actions may be admissible just as in civil cases. The rule lists some examples (e.g., to establish control of or ownership of an automobile that might have been used to commit an offense). For instance, in the example above, the fact of A's installation of the seat belts could be used to show his ownership of the car. Subsequent conduct might also be used to establish that the instrument of criminality was in the accused's possession when an offense occurred. This may have the effect of a party being able to do indirectly what it could not accomplish directly under the rule. For example, A is charged with involuntary manslaughter, having hit a pedestrian with his car's front bumper. It would be impermissible to use evidence of A's repair of the bumper to show that he was guilty of the manslaughter. However, it would be permissible to use the evidence of bumper repair to show A's ownership of the car involved in the incident. Coupled with a permissible inference that the owner of a car is its normal operator, this proof would go a long way toward convicting A of the offense.

If evidence of subsequent remedial measures is used for a purpose other than to show negligence or culpability, a limiting instruction under Mil.R.Evid. 105 would be appropriate. Care must be taken in drafting this instruction so as not to overly emphasize the evidence in the minds of the members. In some cases, the danger of emphasizing the evidence may lead counsel not to request any limiting instruction. It is simply a question for ad hoc determination.

It should be remembered that nothing in the rule requires the admission of evidence of subsequent measures, and the balancing test of rule 403, discussed in part one of this chapter, must be considered. In the seat belt example, even with limiting instructions under rule 105, the prejudicial value of the evidence of the new seat belt installation would likely outweigh its probative value as to ownership of the vehicle, especially since other methods of proving ownership would be possible.

A current annotation on this rule is [Annotation, Admissibility of Subsequent Remedial Measures Under Rule 407 of Federal Rules of Evidence], 50 A.L.R. Fed. 935 (1980).

0513      COMPROMISE AND OFFER TO COMPROMISE

Rule 408. Compromise and Offer to Compromise

Evidence of (1) furnishing or offering or promising to furnish, or (2) accepting or offering or promising to accept, a valuable consideration in compromising or attempting to compromise a claim which was disputed as to either validity or amount, is not admissible to prove liability for or invalidity of the claim or its amount. Evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiations is likewise not admissible. This rule does not require the exclusion of any evidence otherwise discoverable merely because it is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. This rule also does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negating a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution.

- A.    General. Mil.R.Evid. 408, taken from the Federal rules without alteration, discusses the admissibility of evidence originating in offers to compromise or to settle civil suits. It protects these discussions in much the same way that rule 410 protects plea negotiations. It reflects a policy judgment that free and frank discussions in negotiations leading toward settlement should be encouraged in order to avoid needless litigation. Because the rule concerns noncriminal proceedings, it has no foundation in previous Manual for Courts-Martial editions.

B. Scope

1. The drafters' analysis fails to indicate how Mil.R.Evid. 408 will apply to court-martial practice; however, circumstances may arise where the accused might be civilly liable for damages inflicted as a result of his criminal misconduct. Here, rule 408 would generally prohibit the admission of evidence concerning any offer to settle or statement made in connection therewith from being admitted during the court-martial itself. For example, if the United States brings a civil suit against a person, settlement negotiations in that suit should not generally be admissible in a related criminal proceeding. This might be applicable where the government is seeking to recover money obtained in an embezzlement scheme.

a. In this regard, it should be remembered that the rule only protects against the use of compromise offers relating to claims that are disputed as to either validity or amount. The Advisory Committee note to Fed.R.Evid. 408 states that "the effort . . . to induce a creditor to settle an admittedly due amount for a lesser sum" would not further the underlying policy of the rule and is therefore not protected. Yet, a careful distinction must be made between a frank disclosure during the course of negotiations such as "All right, I was negligent. Let's talk about damages" (inadmissible) and the less frequent situation where both the validity of the claim and the amount of damages are admitted." Of course, I owe you the money, but unless you're willing to settle for less, you'll have to sue me for it" (admissible). Likewise, an admission of liability made during negotiations concerning the time of payment and involving neither the validity nor amount of the claim is not within the rule's exclusionary protection. For example, in an embezzlement scheme, if there was a dispute as to the amount taken, the compromise discussions would be protected by the rule; but, if the discussion dealt only with a payment plan for an agreed-upon amount of embezzled money, the rule would not apply.

b. Similarly, the rule only protects offers involving a valuable consideration. What this means is that something of legitimate value must be offered. A threat to kill someone unless a settlement is reached would not be an offer of anything of value that the law regards as legitimate. Thus, it would be outside the coverage of the rule.

2. The leading case so far dealing with Mil.R.Evid. 408 is the case of United States v. Jensen, 25 M.J. 284 (C.M.A. 1987), in which a soldier was prosecuted at a general court-martial for allegedly raping a foreign national near his Army base in South Korea. During the government case-in-chief, the trial counsel offered evidence that the accused had made an offer to the victim to settle all her claims against him "under civil or criminal law" for a specified price. Citing Mil.R.Evid. 408, C.M.A. held that all evidence of the accused's offer to pay the victim money in settlement of her claim against him was inadmissible.

3. It may be that the most important function of this rule will be to assure someone facing both civil and criminal liability that simultaneous bargaining concerning both forms of liability will result in protection under both this rule and rule 410. There is, however, one problem with simultaneous bargaining. The legislative history of Fed.R.Evid. 410, which will be important in interpreting Mil.R.Evid. 410, indicates that statements made in the course of legitimate plea bargaining may not be used to impeach an accused at trial if bargaining breaks down. Rule 408 is less clear on the impeachment question. As noted in S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi, and D. Schlueter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 507-508 (3d ed. 1991):

Some commentators have suggested that the last sentence of the Rule would permit impeachment use of statements made in settlement negotiations. Others have argued that this approach would inhibit free and open bargaining in which the parties do not have to fear a mistake or a slip of the tongue. Our own position is that impeachment use should not be permitted since simultaneous bargaining would be impaired were Rules 408 and 410 read differently on the impeachment issue.

This seems to be the proper reading on this issue and comports with the intention of the drafters. Counsel would be well-advised, however, to avoid any potential problem in the use of statements made during negotiations by doing all negotiations for his or her client and by putting everything in hypothetical form.

C. No immunity. There is no immunity against the use of evidence that one party is entitled to obtain from the other just because the evidence was revealed for the first time during settlement. Under the rule, the settlement negotiations themselves are not to be used as evidence, but no part of the rule is intended to permit one party to immunize against use of evidence at trial that might otherwise be available. In essence, counsel can use proper discovery methods, as discussed in chapter II, to obtain this evidence, but cannot use statements of the parties or matters produced solely for negotiations to create evidence. For example, if, in the negotiations for repayment of monies obtained by a disbursing clerk in an embezzlement scheme, the government negotiator referenced certain pay documents, the defense could obtain copies of the pay documents with a request for matters within the control of military authorities. R.C.M. 701. However, the defense could not use statements relating to the pay documents made by government agents during the negotiations.

D. Other purposes. Just as in rule 407, it should be noted that the last sentence of the rule, read in conjunction with the opening sentence, makes it clear that the limitation on the use of evidence in this rule applies only when the evidence is offered to prove liability for, or invalidity of, a claim or the amount of a claim. It does not apply when the evidence is offered for another purpose, "such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, negating a contention of undue delay, or proving an effort to obstruct a criminal investigation or prosecution." But, if there is sufficient danger that the members would misuse evidence, rule 403 could be used to bar evidence otherwise admissible under the last sentence.

0514          PAYMENT OF MEDICAL AND SIMILAR EXPENSES

Rule 409. Payment of medical and similar expenses.

Evidence of furnishing or offering or promising to pay medical, hospital, or similar expenses occasioned by an injury is not admissible to prove liability for the injury.

A. Applicability. The drafters' analysis to rule 409 raises the question of whether this rule really has any cause to be within the Mil.R.Evid.

Unlike Rule 407 and 408 which although primarily applicable to civil cases are clearly applicable to criminal cases, it is arguable that Rule 409 may not apply to criminal cases as it deals only with questions of "liability normally only a civil matter. The Rule has been included in the Military Rules to ensure its availability should it, in fact, apply to criminal cases.

Mil.R.Evid. 409 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-33.

This reading of "liability" as a strictly civil matter seems overly restrictive and not fully in accord with their implicit readings of rules 407 and 408. If liability is interpreted to mean responsibility, then the rule would seem applicable in any case involving injuries and/or hospitalization, such as in assault and battery cases.

Example. In Okinawa, it is common practice that if a Marine injures or kills an Okinawan, the Marine is encouraged to comply with Okinawan custom and make a call on the victim or the victim's family and make a "condolence" payment. This "condolence" payment was utilized as a tangible means of expressing sympathy. Under such circumstances, the restrictions of rule 409 would appear to become applicable were the Marine to be tried subsequently at court-martial proceedings for an offense arising out of the incident that resulted in the injury or death. Thus, evidence of any payment made, promised, or offered by the Marine to the victim or the victim's family would be inadmissible; but, any statements he made to the victim or the victim's family inculcating himself could be admitted.

B. Scope

1. This rule bars admission only of payments or promises to pay, not factual statements or admissions made in connection therewith. Hence, in not protecting against the admission of such statements, this rule is less protective than rule 408. This was the Fed.R.Evid. drafters' intent. See Fed.R.Evid. 409 Advisory Committee note.

2. Saltzburg, Schinasi, and Schlueter raise an interesting issue as to the scope of "liability" under the rule:

Assuming that the Rule is applicable in courts-martial, there may arise a question whether a payment or promise to pay can be used to prove the identity of an assailant. Is identity different from liability? Arguments can be made both ways. One argument would be that identity is being used to establish criminal liability and should not be allowed. The countervailing argument is that liability is otherwise proved, and that the Rule only protects against using the evidence to show negligence or failure to meet a standard of care on the theory that the evidence is of only slight value; if used to prove identity, arguably the evidence has greater probative force. At the moment, there is little law supporting either argument.

S. Saltzburg, S. Schinasi, and D. Schlueter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 510 (3rd ed. 1991).

0515 PLEAS AND PLEA BARGAINING

A. History. This discussion deals with Mil.R.Evid. 410 as it presently exists; however, comparison to the original rule is encouraged.

1. Rule 410 was the first Mil.R.Evid. to be modified pursuant to Mil.R.Evid. 1102 when the corresponding Fed.R.Evid. was changed. In fact, the present military rule reflects the second amendment to the Federal rule. An equivalent to the present Fed.R.Evid. 410 may also be found at Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 11(e)(6). For a complete history of the evolution of the Federal Rule, see S. Saltzburg and K. Redden, Federal Rules of Evidence Manual 370-371 (5th ed. 1990). For our purposes, it is sufficient to note the text of the original and the amended Mil.R.Evid. 410 and to summarize the changes made by the amendment, the rationale for the rule and the significance of the rule, as amended, all of which will be discussed infra.

Rule 410. Inadmissibility of Pleas, Plea Discussions, and Related Statements

(a) In general. Except as otherwise provided in this rule, evidence of the following is not admissible in any court-martial proceeding against the accused who made the plea or was a participant in the plea discussions:

- (1) a plea of guilty which was later withdrawn;
- (2) a plea of nolo contendere;
- (3) any statement made in the course of any judicial inquiry regarding either of the foregoing pleas; or
- (4) any statement made in the course of plea discussions with the convening authority, staff judge advocate, trial counsel or other counsel for the Government which do not result in a plea of guilty or which result in a plea of guilty later withdrawn.

However, such a statement is admissible (i) in any proceeding wherein another statement made in the course of the same plea or plea discussions has been introduced and the statement ought in fairness be considered contemporaneously with it, or (ii) in a court-martial proceeding for perjury or false statement if the statement was made by the accused under oath, on the record and in the presence of counsel.

(b) Definitions. A "statement made in the course of plea discussions" includes a statement made by the accused solely for the purpose of requesting disposition under an authorized procedure for administrative action in lieu of trial by court-martial; "on the record" includes the written statement submitted by the accused in furtherance of such request.

2. The present rule was effective on 1 August 1981, pursuant to Executive Order No. 12,306 (1981). It is modeled after its Federal counterpart, as noted above, but some language changes were made to conform the rule to military situations and practice. For example, language in the Federal rule referring to an "attorney for the prosecution authority" was changed to refer to the convening authority, staff judge advocate, trial counsel, and other government counsel.

3. Changes. The present rule has three significant modifications to the

a. The rule now includes a "completeness" approach akin to rule 106's approach (concept of completeness).

b. The rule now expressly addresses statements made during in-court providency or judicial inquiries (in-court statements).

c. The scope of plea discussions protected by the rule is now limited to those involving the convening authority or appropriate government counsel (appropriate negotiators).

B. Rationale. In adopting a principle that plea bargaining and related statements are inadmissible, rule 410 follows a rationale similar to that of rule 408 dealing with offers of compromise - that is to say, a recognition that the criminal justice system depends on guilty pleas to dispose of the bulk of cases and frank discussions of such pleas should be encouraged. See, e.g., United States v. Arroyo-Angulo, 580 F.2d 1137, 1148 (2d Cir. 1978), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 913 (1978) ("The purpose of [Fed.R.Evid. 410] is to encourage frank discussions in plea bargaining negotiations . . .").

If a withdrawn guilty plea were allowed to be used against the accused as proof of his guilt, limiting instructions, at the very least, would have to be given to the court members. Even if a proper instruction could be drafted, it is recognized that the court members would have a great deal of trouble following them.

C. Pleas. Rule 410 considers two subjects: pleas and statements that are related, but present slightly different problems. First, the rule deals with pleas, either a plea of guilty that is later withdrawn or a plea of nolo contendere. Second, the rule deals with statements, either made in the course of a judicial inquiry regarding pleas or made in the course of plea bargaining. For clarity, they will be considered separately; this section on pleas, and section D on statements.

1. It has long been settled practice that Federal courts would not admit evidence of a withdrawn plea to a criminal charge in the trial of that charge against the party making the plea. See, e.g., Kercheval v. United States, 274 U.S. 220, S.Ct. 582 (1927). In the military, this practice has applied only to withdrawn guilty pleas, since pleas of nolo contendere, although included in the language of rule 410, are considered "irregular" pleas under R.C.M. 910, and thus the equivalent of a plea of not guilty. Thus, this provision of the rule does not change traditional practice.

2. Under the rule, evidence of a withdrawn plea of guilty or a plea of nolo contendere may never be used in any court-martial against the accused who entered the plea. For example, if the accused should plead guilty, then change his mind, plead not guilty and testify as to his innocence, the trial counsel could not impeach the accused with his original plea nor with any statement made in the course of any judicial inquiries made concerning the plea. There are two aspects of the rule, however, that do not protect an individual who has entered pleas of guilty or nolo contendere.

a. The fact that the accused changed his pleas can be used to impeach the accused who later testifies as a witness at the trial of any other person.

b. A plea of guilty that is not withdrawn, and any statement made in the course of negotiations resulting in the guilty plea, would not be rendered inadmissible under this rule. The reader should remember the distinction between being not inadmissible and being admissible. There is nothing in the rule which says that statements in negotiations leading to an unchanged guilty plea will be admissible at trial. The reader should also note, however, that C.M.A. has specifically held that it does not amount to a denial of the accused's right to remain silent for the government to use in aggravation statements made by an accused during a providency inquiry. United States v. Holt, 27 M.J. 57 (C.M.A. 1988).

D. Statements. The rule controls the admissibility of "statements" made under two conditions: (1) Statements rendered by the accused during a judicial inquiry regarding guilty pleas later withdrawn [see, e.g., United States v. Care, 18 C.M.A. 535, 40 C.M.R. 247 (1969) (requiring the military judge to personally question an accused regarding the facts and circumstances of an offense before accepting his plea of guilty)]; and (2) statements made in the course of plea discussions with appropriate government authorities that do not result in a plea of guilty or result in a plea later withdrawn.

1. Statements during judicial inquiry

a. Basic rule. Military courts have generally excluded from evidence any admissions made by an accused during the providency inquiry, or stipulations of fact used during the providency hearing, if the plea of guilty is withdrawn. See United States v. Barber, 14 C.M.A. 198, 33 C.M.R. 410 (1963), and discussion in Imwinkelried, [The New Federal Rules of Evidence - Part IV], Army Lawyer 12 (July 1973). An interesting application of this provision of rule 410 is contained in United States v. Shackelford, 2 M.J. 17 (C.M.A. 1977). There, the accused impeached his guilty plea during the providency inquiry. Subsequently, the case was tried before a court composed of members. After the accused testified on direct examination, the military judge asked him more than 50 questions aimed at displaying the untruthful nature of his testimony. In reversing the conviction, the court found that the military judge had unfairly disparaged the defense by improperly using information obtained during the providency inquiry. The court further held that such conduct has long been prohibited by the Uniform Code of Military Justice (see article 45), military precedent (see United States v. Barber, supra), and Supreme Court guidance (see Kercheval v. United States, supra). Judge Cook's concurring opinion particularly highlighted the impropriety of using the accused's guilty plea statements against him in such fashion. United States v. Heirs, 29 M.J. 68 (C.M.A. 1989) also involved an accused whose guilty plea was not accepted by the military judge. The court found that it was error for the SJA's response to the accused's post-trial submission to contain references to damaging statements made by the accused during providency.

b. Exceptions

(1) Although the rule precludes use for substantive or impeachment purposes of statements made by an accused during a judicial inquiry into the providency of his plea, it does indicate that, if the accused makes a false statement during the colloquy with the military judge, the false statement could be used as the basis for his prosecution for perjury or other false statement offenses. For this exception to apply, three conditions must be satisfied: (1) The false statement must be given by the accused under oath [see e.g., United States v. Abrahams, 604 F.2d 386 (5th Cir. 1979) (defendant not placed under oath before magistrate; statement to magistrate not usable in perjury proceeding)]; (2) it must be made on the record [which might include a written statement by the accused asking for disposition by administrative action; rule 410(b)]; and (3) it must be rendered in counsel's presence. R.C.M. 910(c)5 parallels this decision in providing that the military judge, before accepting a plea of guilty, must advise the accused that: "if the accused pleads guilty, the military judge will question the accused about the offenses to which the accused has pleaded guilty, and, if the accused answers these questions under oath, on the record, and in the presence of counsel, the accused's answers may later be used against the accused in a prosecution for perjury or false statement."

(2) Rule 410 also provides an exception to the use of statements made during judicial inquiry where part of a statement has been introduced and a portion or all of the remainder of the statement should "in fairness" to all parties be considered contemporaneously. This is similar to rule 106's "rule of completeness," and is intended to prevent distortion of the truth by one party. The normal situation in which this would arise is where the accused (who may waive the rule) introduces a statement originally. Cf. United States v. Doran, 564 F.2d 1176 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 435 U.S. 928 (1978) (accused testified on direct that he refused plea offer because he was innocent; on cross-examination, prosecutor was permitted to ask him about counteroffers made to government).

2. Statements during plea discussions. In order to gain the protection of the rule with regard to statements made during appropriate plea discussions, the accused and counsel must ensure that two requirements are met. First, there must be a plea discussion and, second, the discussion must be with appropriate persons.

a. Plea discussion. Not every legitimate discussion of a case with governmental agents may amount to a plea discussion. Compare United States v. Ross, 493 F.2d 771 (5th Cir. 1974) (government narcotics agent could not testify as to his discussion with the accused when the accused stated "If I take the blame is there a chance you will let my wife go?" The court excluded the statement, citing Santobello v. New York, 404 U.S. 257 (1971), because it concluded that few defendants would engage in plea bargaining if remarks uttered during the course of unsuccessful bargaining were admissible in a later trial as evidence of guilt; United States v. Herman, 544 F.2d 791 (5th Cir. 1977) (noting that rule 410 codified Ross, supra, the court found: "[s]tatements are inadmissible if made at any point during a discussion in which the defendant seeks to obtain concessions from the government in return for a plea.") with United States v. Robertson, 560 F.2d. 647 (5th Cir. 1977) (en banc) (inculpatory statements of a defendant pursuant to an agreement made with the government to be lenient with his wife were excluded. The court held that rule 410 did not bar this evidence because it did not involve a negotiation concerning the accused's own plea.); United States v. Cross, 638 F.2d 1375 (5th Cir. 1981) (because the accused's statements to the government were made in contemplation of leniency, but not in contemplation of pleading guilty, they were outside of rule 410's protections).

In determining whether there has been a plea discussion, many courts have adopted something close to the two-step approach in United States v. Robertson, 582 F.2d 1356 (5th Cir. 1978). The court will first look to the accused's subjective intent to bargain for a plea, then balance it against the objective circumstances that surround and define the intent, ultimately seeking to determine whether it was reasonable for the accused to believe an agreement was possible. See e.g., United States v. Castillo, 615 F.2d 878 (9th Cir. 1980) (both the objective and subjective criteria were missing). United States v. Barunas, 23 M.J. 71 (C.M.A. 1986). The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has taken an expansive view of rule 410, finding that it excludes reference to the fact that accused acknowledged guilt in a request for discharge in lieu of court-martial. [United States v. Bolagna, 33 M.J. 54 (C.M.A. 1991)], a letter to a commanding officer admitting guilt and pleading for leniency [United States v. Barunas, 23 M.J. 71 (C.M.A. 1986)], a spontaneous statement by an accused to his commanding officer requesting administrative action in lieu of court-martial [United States v. Brabant, 29 M.J. 259 (C.M.A. 1989)], and at a Christmas party, civilian defense counsel telling an assistant SJA that his client asked the urinalysis unit coordinator to substitute his positive sample with a "clean sample." United States v. Ankeny, 30 M.J. 10 (C.M.A. 1990).

b. Appropriate government negotiators. Under the rule, only plea discussions with the convening authority, staff judge advocate, trial counsel, or other government counsel amount to the kind of bargaining that permits an accused to prevent the use of his bargaining statements against him. Thus, a line is drawn between designated government representatives on the one hand, and military policemen and lower level commanders on the other. See United States v. Watkins, 34 M.J. 344 (C.M.A. 1991) (remarks made to CID investigator are not statements made during plea discussions). It is an effort to clarify what caused problems under the old rule for many courts. See, e.g., United States v. Robertson, 582 F.2d 1356 (5th Cir. 1978) (en banc) (statements to DEA agents); United States v. Herman, 544 F.2d 791 (5th Cir. 1977) (statements to postal officers).

In view of the fact that the rule includes statements made solely for the purpose of requesting administrative separation in lieu of trial by court-martial, a fair reading of this section would indicate that "convening authority" should include not only the convening authority of the court-martial but any commander acting officially on the case

c. The exceptions applicable to statements made during judicial inquiry are also applicable to statements made in the course of plea discussions.

E. Use of pleas and statements by accused. Rule 410 creates, in effect, a privilege for the accused. His failure to object constitutes a waiver of the use of the evidence against himself. See Mil.R.Evid. 103.

Generally, the court should give a defendant in a criminal case considerable leeway in introducing evidence of offers to plead or evidence of pleas that might be excluded were a prosecutor to offer them. There are two clear exceptions to this rule of leniency in applying rule 410.

First, the defendant should not be permitted to prove a withdrawn plea or an offer to plead in order to show that a government attorney had doubts about his guilt. See United States v. Verdoorn, 528 F.2d 103 (8th Cir. 1976). Affirming convictions for conspiracy and various substantive offenses arising out of a theft of an interstate shipment of beef, the Verdoorn court cited rule 408 and Federal Rule of Criminal Procedure 11(e)(6) (the counterpart to rule 410) for the proposition that criminal defendants cannot introduce evidence of plea bargaining by the government to show consciousness of a weak case. The case also serves as a reminder that a witness who pleads guilty and then cooperates with the government in another case can be impeached with evidence of the plea bargain (rule 609 notwithstanding) because the evidence tends to show bias or interest on the part of the witness. In essence, the prosecutor's view of the defendant's guilt or innocence is irrelevant.

Second, where there are joint trials, the introduction of such evidence by one defendant may prejudice a co-defendant. Cf. Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 123 (1968) (limitations on admissibility of co-actor's confession in a joint trial).

0516      LIABILITY INSURANCE

Rule 411. Liability Insurance

Evidence that a person was or was not insured against liability is not admissible upon the issue whether the person acted negligently or otherwise wrongfully. This rule does not require the exclusion of evidence of insurance against liability when offered for another purpose, such as proof of agency, ownership, or control, or bias or prejudice of a witness.

The provisions of Mil.R.Evid. 411 are taken without alteration from the Federal rule and have no previous military foundation. Although this rule is primarily a rule of civil, not criminal, applicability, it may affect a military accused who is charged with negligent homicide or involuntary manslaughter.

PART FOUR: RELEVANCY OF SEXUAL CONDUCT: THE "RAPE SHIELD" LAW IN THE MILITARY

0517        GENERAL

A.     Introduction. In recent years, state legislatures have followed a growing trend of protecting rape victims from the humiliation of having the details of their past sexual behavior publicly disclosed in court. In 1978, Congress followed the trend and enacted rule 412 of the Federal Rules of Evidence. The military followed suit, in September of 1980, by adopting Military Rule of Evidence 412 which is patterned with some modification after the Federal rule.

B.     History. Prior to the adoption of the "rape shield" laws, criminal trials involving rape and other nonconsensual sex offenses most often placed the alleged victim, as well as the accused, on trial. As the prosecution attempted to prove the elements of the offense, especially the lack of consent, the defense would counter by exposing the past unchaste reputation and history of sexual behavior of the victim. Courts would permit evidence of the past sexual behavior in the form of reputation or opinion evidence and specific acts not only for the purpose of showing consent, but for the purpose of impeaching the credibility of the victim. These rules were premised upon the concept that most women were virtuous by nature, and that an unchaste woman must therefore have an unusual character flaw which caused her to consent to sexual advances. Also, an archaic perception prevailed that an unchaste woman was inherently suspect and not, therefore, worthy of belief. Traditionally, in military courts, prior to the adoption of Mil.R.Evid. 412, the defense was able to introduce evidence of a victim's lack of chastity. Under former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 153b(2)(b), the defense counsel could impeach a sex offense victim, or try to show consent of the victim, by introducing evidence of the victim's past sexual behavior. This former provision permitted the defense counsel to introduce evidence "including the victim's lewd repute, habits, associations, or way of life . . ." which would tend to establish the unchaste character of the victim.

Mil.R.Evid. 412, however, generally precludes the introduction of evidence relevant to the past sexual behavior of the victim. The succeeding paragraphs set forth a discussion of the Rule and its procedural aspects.

0518        COMPARISON TO FED.R.EVID. 412 GENERALLY. Federal Rule of Evidence 412 was amended in December of 1994. Based upon Mil.R.Evid. 1102, these amendments became applicable to the military in June of 1995. The previous rule was in fact the federal rule. The 1998 amendment to the rule has made M.R.E. 412 tailored to military practice.

The 1994 amendment to the Federal rule has expanded the scope of the protection. Previously the rule gave protection to evidence of the victim's "past sexual behavior." As amended, the rule now also restricts evidence of a victim's alleged "sexual predisposition."

The 1998 amendment to the federal rule has also established certain procedural protections. A party intending to offer evidence of an alleged victim's prior sexual acts or predisposition must file a written warning 5 days prior to trial and inform the alleged victim of this filing. Prior to admitting this type of evidence, the court is required to conduct a closed Article 39(a) hearing, and afford the alleged victim a reasonable opportunity to attend and be heard.

0519 MIL.R.EVID. 412's QUALIFIED EXCEPTIONS

– Generally evidence offered to prove that an alleged victim engaged in other sexual behavior or to prove an alleged victim's sexual predisposition will be inadmissible because of Rule 412. There are however three exceptions:

1. Evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim offered to prove that a person other than the accused was the source of semen, injury, or other physical evidence;
2. evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim with respect to the person accused of the sexual misconduct offered by the accused to prove consent or by the prosecution; and
3. evidence the exclusion of which would violate the constitutional rights of the defendant.

0520 THE EXCLUSION OF WHICH WOULD VIOLATE THE CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHTS OF THE DEFENDANT

A. The test. It is the third exception under Mil.R.Evid. 412 which has given rise to the greatest amount of litigation. The initial test for this exception was delineated in United States v. Dorsey, 16 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1983). The Dorsey court held that the evidence should be admitted if the accused demonstrates: (1) the evidence's relevance to a fact asserted by the appellant; (2) that the testimony is material to that fact; (3) that the testimony is favorable to the defense; and (4) that the evidence survives the 403 balancing test (actually a different balancing test used in Dorsey but the amended 412 probably requires a 403 balancing). There are several cases in this area which merit discussion.

1. United State v. Sanchez, 44 M.J. 174 (CAAF 1996). The accused was charged with rape and tried to introduce evidence that the alleged victim had a series of one-night-stands with other military personnel and immediately after each liaison would express remorse and doubts "about her own self worth." The accused wanted to show that her reaction was similar on the night in question as she sought solace after the intercourse from another Airman and did not mention being raped while seeking solace. The trial judge stated that the proffer of the defense was insufficient to even require a 412 hearing. On appeal the trial judge was found to have not committed an abuse of discretion with this ruling. CAAF held that what the accused was trying to show was that because the victim engaged in one-night stands she was more likely to have engaged in consensual sex with the accused. This is precisely what the "rape shield" rule was designed to exclude. It is interesting to note that in a concurring opinion in this case, Senior Judge Everett opined that the proffer of this evidence relating to the alleged victim's motive to claim rape was speculative without an expert witness to explain the motive theory.

2. In United States v. Knox, 41 M.J. 29 (C.M.A.) 1994), the accused sought to introduce evidence that the alleged victim was a promiscuous bimbo who was easy and liked to party. The accused claimed that his knowledge of this evidence effected his state of mind and was constitutionally required to be admitted. The court held the defense theory that the accused was "invited to join an ongoing sexual event" and had nothing to do with whether the accused "honestly and reasonably believed" the victim was consenting. Therefore, this evidence was not constitutionally required to be admitted. Similarly in United States v. Greaves, 40 M.J. 432 (C.M.A. 1994), the court upheld the trial judge's decision to exclude the 412 evidence. The accused wanted to introduce evidence that the victim worked in a married men's bar, wore provocative clothing and earned a "large salary." The court said this evidence was irrelevant because the issue in the case was whether or not the victim was asleep during intercourse.

3. In United States v. Gray, 40 M.J. 77 (C.M.A. 1994), the accused was convicted of committing oral sodomy with a nine year old girl. The military judge, citing Mil.R.Evid. 412 excluded evidence that the alleged victim had previously engaged in oral sex with a neighbor. The court found error and stated that this evidence was constitutionally required to be admitted as it tended to show that the victim had sexual knowledge beyond her tender years prior to her encounter with the accused.

4. In United States v. Williams, 37 M.J. 352 (C.M.A. 1993), the defense discovered evidence post-trial that the alleged rape victim was involved in an ongoing extramarital affair at the time of the alleged rape. The court found error in the trial judge's denial of a rehearing based on this newly discovered evidence. The court found that this evidence was constitutionally required to be admitted as it impeached the victim's previous testimony and it demonstrated the victim's motive to lie about the rape in order to protect her extramarital affair.

5. In United States v. Dorsey, 16 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1983), the accused was charged with rape. The government evidence at trial showed that, shortly after the rape allegedly occurred in the accused's room in the barracks, the victim fled the scene and shortly thereafter, in an emotional and tearful state, reported the rape to several of her friends and subsequently to appropriate authorities. The accused testified that the victim had not only consented to the intercourse; in fact, the entire matter was her idea. By way of explaining why the victim would have been in such an emotional state so soon after an act of intercourse which she had supposedly suggested herself, the accused testified that she had just had sex with a friend of his earlier that same night and, when she then proposed to have sex with the accused, he had called her a whore. At this, she had burst into tears and fled the room. The accused proffered the testimony of his friend who, it was asserted, would have confirmed that the victim had indeed had intercourse with him consensually that same night. The military judge excluded this evidence, citing Mil.R.Evid. 412, and C.M.A. reversed, holding such evidence was constitutionally required to be admitted. C.M.A. noted that this evidence was not really being offered to show that the victim had in fact consented, but was rather being offered to corroborate the accused's explanation of one of the most damaging elements of the government's evidence against him—namely, the evidence of the emotional state of the victim shortly after the alleged rape.

6. In United States v. Colon-Angueira, 16 M.J. 20 (C.M.A. 1983), the accused was charged with rape. The military judge excluded evidence proffered by one of the victim's coworkers that the victim told her prior to the date of the alleged rape that her husband had been unfaithful and she was upset and angry about this. The military judge also excluded evidence from the same coworker that the victim had told her that she had sex with two other men after the date of the alleged rape. C.M.A. held that this evidence was constitutionally required to be admitted (though the error was found to be harmless in view of the overpowering government evidence on the issue of lack of consent in this case).

7. In United States v. Elvine, 16 M.J. 14 (C.M.A. 1983), the accused was charged with rape. At trial, the accused sought to cross-examine the victim regarding numerous acts of sexual intercourse with various different men since the date of the alleged rape. He also sought to offer evidence of the victim's reputation in the unit. Finally, the defense counsel also sought to cross-examine the victim at the sentencing hearing about various acts of sexual intercourse with her boyfriend since the alleged rape, in order to establish that the victim had resumed a normal sex life and had not suffered any permanent emotional trauma as a result of the intercourse with the accused. The military judge excluded all this evidence and C.M.A. affirmed, holding that such evidence was barred by Mil.R.Evid. 412 and was not constitutionally required to be admitted. Of particular interest here is C.M.A.'s holding that Mil.R.Evid. 412 applied as much at the sentencing hearing as at the trial on the merits.

8. Finally, in United States v. Jensen, 25 M.J. 284 (C.M.A. 1987), the accused was charged with raping a foreign national near the Army base where he was stationed in South Korea. The evidence showed the accused had been out drinking with several of his friends when they met the victim on the street. One of the accused's friends then took the victim into an alley where they had intercourse. The accused subsequently went into the alley with the victim and also had intercourse. At trial, the accused testified that his intercourse with the victim was consensual and he offered the testimony of his friend, who was prepared to testify that his own intercourse with the victim was consensual. The military judge excluded the testimony of the friend about the victim's intercourse with him, citing Mil.R.Evid. 412, and C.M.A. reversed, holding such evidence was constitutionally required to be admitted and that the military judge's failure to admit it denied the accused his sixth amendment right to confront his accuser.

9. The theme running through these cases appears to be that evidence of other acts of sexual intercourse will be deemed to be constitutionally required to be admitted if (1) the evidence has some significance for the case other than simply to show that the victim consented or (2) the other act of sexual intercourse was so closely related in time to the accused's sexual intercourse with the victim that, in effect, the two acts are part of the same transaction or occurrence.

0521 THE OTHER EXCEPTIONS - MIL.R.EVID 412(b)(1)(A) AND 412(b)(1)(B)

A. Mil.R.Evid 412(b)(1)(A). This exception allows the evidence to be admitted if it relates to specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim offered to prove that a person other than the accused was the source of semen, injury, or other physical evidence. This rule often comes into play where there is evidence of vaginal tearing or scarring and the defense is trying to show that the accused is not the source of these injuries.

B. Mil.R.Evid. 412(b)(1)(B). This exception allows the evidence to be admitted if it involves evidence of specific instances of sexual behavior by the alleged victim with respect to the person accused of the sexual misconduct offered by the accused to prove consent or by the prosecution. The amendment to rule 412 inserted the language "with respect to the person accused" vice "with the accused". This change was made to allow for evidence of the victim's dreams and fantasies relating to the accused in addition to the actual sexual acts. See Drafter's analysis. Additionally the amendments now allow the prosecution to introduce this evidence. This may allow a prosecutor to show prior sexual activity between the alleged victim always required to stop short of intercourse.

C. Timeliness. The exceptions do not on their face require a showing that the instances of past sexual behavior took place within a certain time period prior to the alleged offense. The lack of a time period, however, will not grant carte blanche authority to the defense to have admitted all prior acts of sexual misconduct regardless of the length of time that had transpired. A ten-year gap, for example, between a prior act of sexual intercourse between the accused and the victim and the alleged offense might be so far removed as to be considered irrelevant or more confusing than helpful. See Mil.R.Evid. 401 and 412(c)(3).

0522      PROCEDURAL REQUIREMENTS UNDER MIL.R.EVID. 412

A.     Timely notice. A party intending to offer evidence under subsection (b) of the rule must file a written notice at least 5 days before trial. The court in their discretion if there is good cause may require a different time for filing or permit filing during trial. The bottom line is to file your motion 5 days before trial.

B.     The format. Prior to amendment to the rule, you only had to give notice accompanied by an offer of proof if you intended to offer evidence under an exception to 412. You will encounter this in some of the older case law. With the amendment, a written motion must be filed specifically describing the evidence and stating the purpose for which it is offered. This motion is required to be served on all parties. The alleged victim is also to be notified of the substance of the 412 motion.

C.     The actual hearing. The court is to conduct a closed hearing before admitting evidence under the rule. This is generally a closed session Article 39(a) hearing. All parties and the victim have a right to attend and be heard. Additionally, the motion, related papers, and the record of the hearing are sealed and remain under seal unless the court orders otherwise. Counsel might also want to take the additional step of requesting the judge to issue a gag order concerning what occurred at this hearing to preclude parties from going to the press.

0523      SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS

A.     Applicability at Article 32 hearings. R.C.M. 405(i) states that Mil.R.Evid. 412 is applicable at Article 32 hearings. Unfortunately neither the amended Federal Rule nor the proposed Military rule give any guidance to the 32 officer as to how they are to apply the rule. It is unclear if 32 officers are to be conducting 412 hearings or if they are to just take the conservative approach and exclude any potential 412 evidence and therefore put the burden on the military judge to resolve the issue or order the 32 reopened.

B.     Applicability at sentencing hearings. It should be noted that C.M.A. has specifically held that Mil.R.Evid. 412 is fully as applicable at the sentencing hearing as it is during the trial on the merits. Thus, for example, a defense counsel who wishes to show the victim's prior sexual history as "extenuation and mitigation" of his client's rape of the victim is likely to be disappointed. United States v. Elvine, 16 M.J. 14 (C.M.A. 1983); United States v. Fox, 24 M.J. 110 (C.M.A. 1987).

0524 FINAL COMMENTS. Since Mil.R.Evid. 412 reflects a very recent trend in the law, a multitude of issues will not be resolved until litigated in the future. Counsel will therefore be in a position to argue creatively to the trial court about the interpretation to be given the specific language, policy, the intent of the rule. To be effective, however, counsel must fully comply with the procedural requirements of the rule.

PART FIVE: RELEVANCY OF PRIOR ACTS OF SEXUAL ASSAULT AND CHILD MOLESTATION - RULES 413 AND 414

0525 GENERAL

A. The enactment. Federal Rule of Evidence 413 and 414 were enacted and became applicable in Federal Courts on 9 July 1995. Pursuant to Mil.R.Evid. 1102, they became applicable in court-martial proceedings in January of 1996. There was a great amount of controversy in the enactment of these rules. The ABA came out with a position in opposition to their enactment. These rules were almost unanimously rejected at the judicial conference that reviewed these rules. Regardless, these rules have been enacted and are applicable in military practice. Executive Order 13086 modified the federal rules to make the rule conform with military practice. Because these rules are not included in the 1995 MCM, their text is provided below.

B. Text of Rule 413 - Evidence of Similar Crimes in Sexual Assault Cases

(a) In a court-martial in which the accused is charged with an offense of sexual assault, evidence of the accused's commission of another offense or offenses of sexual assault is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a court-martial in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the Government shall disclose the evidence to the accused, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least 5 days before the scheduled date of trial, or at such later time as the military judge may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule, "offense of sexual assault" means a crime under Federal law or the law of a state (as defined in section 513 of title 18, United State Code) that involved –

(1) any conduct prescribed by chapter 109A of title 18, United States Code;

(2) contact, without consent, between any part of the defendant's body or an object and the genitals or anus of another person;

(3) contact, without consent, between the genitals or anus of the defendant and any part of another person's body;

(4) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on another person; or

(5) an attempt or conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraphs (1)-(4).

(e) For the purpose of this rule, the term "sexual act" means:

(1) contact between the penis and the vulva or the penis and the anus, and for the purpose of this rule, contact occurs upon penetration, however slight, of the penis into the vulva or anus;

(2) contact between the mouth and the penis, the mouth and the vulva, or the mouth and the anus;

(3) the penetration, however slight, of the anal or genital opening of another by a hand or finger or by any object, with the intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person; or

(4) the intentional touching, not through the clothing, of the genitalia of another person who has not attained the age of 16 years, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

(f) For the purpose of this rule, the term "sexual contact" means the intentional touching, either directly or through the clothing, of the genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

(g) For the purpose of this rule, the term "State" includes a State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, and any other territory or possession of the United States."

C. Caselaw.

United States v. Jackson (not reported, 1996 WL 444968 (D.Or.))—Accused was charged with raping a woman who drank heavily then either fell asleep or passed out. The government offered evidence that 6 years earlier accused tried to pull off pants and panties of a girl who had been drinking heavily in order to have sex with her against her will. Court held: inadmissible because it was irrelevant to the issue of consent in the charged case.

United States v. Davis, –MJ–(1997 WL 801442 (NMCCA 30 Dec 1977))—In this pre-413/414 case, the accused was charged with raping and molesting his teenaged stepdaughter. At trial, the government was allowed to introduce 404(b) evidence that the accused had sexually abused another daughter outside the 5-year statute of limitations. The appeals court held the evidence was properly admitted at trial as probative to the issues of force and consent on the rape charge, since it tended to show a pattern or plan of parental conditioning and was therefore not simply offered to show the accused acted in conformity with his prior conduct. In a footnote, the court noted the MRE 413 and 414 would now probably allow the evidence simply to show propensity to commit the charged offense.

D. *Text of Rule 414 - Evidence of Similar Crimes in Child Molestation Cases

(a) In a court-martial in which the accused is charged with an offense of child molestation, evidence of the accused commission of another offense or offenses of child molestation is admissible, and may be considered for its bearing on any matter to which it is relevant.

(b) In a court-martial in which the Government intends to offer evidence under this rule, the Government shall disclose the evidence to the accused, including statements of witnesses or a summary of the substance of any testimony that is expected to be offered, at least 5 days before the scheduled date of trial or at such later time as the court may allow for good cause.

(c) This rule shall not be construed to limit the admission or consideration of evidence under any other rule.

(d) For purposes of this rule, "child" means a person below the age of sixteen (16) and "offense of child molestation" means an offense punishable under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, or a crime under Federal law or the law of a State that involved –

(1) any sexual act or sexual contact with a child proscribed by the Uniform Code of Military Justice, Federal law, or the law of a State;

(2) any sexually explicit conduct with the children proscribed by the Uniform Code of Military Justice, Federal law, or the law of a State;

(3) contact between any part of the accused's body, or an object controlled or held by the accused, and the genitals or anus of a child;

(4) contact between the genitals or anus of the accused and any part of the body of a child;

(5) deriving sexual pleasure or gratification from the infliction of death, bodily injury, or physical pain on a child; or

(6) an attempt or a conspiracy to engage in conduct described in paragraphs (1) through (5) of this subdivision.

(e) For the purposes of this rule, the term "sexual act" means:

(1) contact between the penis and the vulva or the penis and the anus, and for the purposes of this rule contact occurs upon penetration, however slight, of the penis into the vulva or anus;

(2) contact between the mouth and the penis, the mouth and the vulva, or mouth and the anus;

(3) the penetration, however slight, of the anal or genital opening of another by a hand or finger or by any object, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person; or

(4) the intentional touching, not through the clothing, of the genitalia of another person who has not attained the age of 16 years, with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade, or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

(f) For the purposes of this rule, the term "sexual contact" means the intentional touching, either directly or through the clothing, of the genitalia, anus, groin, breast, inner thigh, or buttocks of any person with an intent to abuse, humiliate, harass, degrade or arouse or gratify the sexual desire of any person.

(g) For the purpose of this rule, the term "sexually explicit conduct" means actual or simulated:

(1) sexual intercourse, including genital-genital, oral genital, anal genital or oral anal, whether between persons of the same or opposite sex;

(2) bestiality;

(3) masturbation;

(4) sadistic or masochistic abuse; or

(5) lascivious exhibition of the genitals or the pubic area of any person.

(h) For the purposes of this rule, the term "State" includes a State of the United States, the district of Columbia, Puerto Rico, Guam, the Virgin Islands, and any other territory or possession of the United States."

E. Caselaw.

United States v. Larson, 112F.3d 600 (2d Cir. 1997)—Prior sexual acts occurring 16-20 years before trial, offered for purposes other than to show criminal propensity, were admissible under both FRE 404(b) and 414 to show criminal intent to engage in sexual conduct with a minor.

United States v. Meachem, 115 F.3d 1488 (10th Cir. 1997)—Accused was charged with molestation of a niece during an interstate trucking trip. Government offered evidence that the accused molested two stepdaughters more than 30 years before. Court held: No abuse of discretion to admit the evidence under FRE 414 because it was "relevant and not more prejudicial than probative." It was relevant to show the accused's intent to sexually molest his niece when he asked her to accompany him on the trip. As for the 403 issue of staleness, the court stated "congressional history indicate[s] there is no time limit beyond which prior sex offenses by an accused are inadmissible." The court held that 403 balancing is still applicable to FRE 414, but that courts are to liberally admit evidence of prior uncharged sex offenses.

DOES A 403 BALANCING OCCUR UNDER THESE RULES?

A. Yes. The drafter's analysis accompanying Executive Order 13086 demonstrates the drafter's intent that the courts apply Rule 403 balancing to such evidence. Contained in the legislative history is the quote: "In other respects, the general standards of the rules of evidence will continue to apply, including the restrictions on hearsay evidence and the court's authority under Evidence Rule 403 to exclude evidence whose probative value is substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect." Drafter's analysis citing 140 Cong. Rec. S. 12,990.

B. Caselaw

In Frank v. Hudson, 924 F. Supp. 620 (D. N.J. 1996), the court stated that a 403 balancing is to be done and that Fed.R.Evid. 413-415 are permissive rules of admissibility, not mandatory rules of admission (relying upon a DOJ memo).

United States v. Guardia, 955 F.Supp 115 (D.N.M. 1997)—Doctor charged with criminal sexual penetration during gynecological exams. Evidence of inappropriate touching of breasts and buttocks of other patients excluded under 403 evidence as unduly confusing since it would require additional expert testimony to establish appropriate medical standards.

United States v. Sumner, 119 F.3d 658 (C.A. 8th Cir. 1997)—Where district court refused to admit evidence under 414 because "it allows any kind of evidence to show propensity" and is unconstitutional without a 403 balancing test, 8th Cir. Held that FRE 403 applies implicitly to all 414 evidence and on remand directed the lower court to perform a 403 balancing test. 8th Cir did not reach the question whether, even after a 403 balancing test is applied, introduction of 414 evidence violates accused's constitutional due process or equal protection rights.

United States v. LeCompte,—F.3d—(1997 WL 781217 (8th Cir. (S.D.)) Dec. 22, 1997)—Accused was charged with sexual molestation of a niece, and government sought to introduce evidence of uncharged molestation of another niece. The 8th circuit held the trial court abused its discretion in excluding evidence of the accused's prior uncharged sexual misconduct under FRE 403 in light of the "strong legislative judgment that evidence of prior sexual offenses should ordinarily be admissible."

C. Caselaw.

United States v. Jackson (not reported, 1996 WL 444968 (D>Or.))—Accused was charged with raping a woman who drank heavily then either fell asleep or passed out. The government offered evidence that 6 years earlier accused tried to pull off pants and panties of a girl who had been drinking heavily in order to have sex with her against her will. Court held: inadmissible because it was irrelevant to the issue of consent in the charged case.

United States v. Davis, –MJ–(1997 WL 801442 (NMCCA 30 Dec 1997))—In this pre-413/414 case, the accused was charged with raping and molesting his teenaged stepdaughter. At trial, the government was allowed to introduce 404(b) evidence that the accused had sexually abused another daughter outside the 5-year statute of limitations. The appeals court held the evidence was properly admitted at trial as probative to the issues of force and consent on the rape charge, since it tended to show a pattern or plan of parental conditioning and was therefore not simply offered to show the accused acted in conformity with his prior conduct. In a footnote, the court noted the MRE 413 and 414 would now probably allow the evidence simply to show propensity to commit the charged offense.

0527 HOW THESE RULES INTERACT WITH MIL.R.EVID. 404(B)

A. Legislative history. Senator Dole remarked that "the new rules will supersede in sex offenses the restrictive aspects of Fed.R.Evid. 404(b).

B. In United States v. Roberts, 88 F.3d 872 (10th Cir. 1996), the court held that Rule 413 provides a specific admissibility standard in sexual cases replacing 404(b)'s general criteria. The new rule will supersede in sex offense cases the restrictive aspects of Federal Rule 404(b).

C. In some ways Rules 413 and 414 may be more restrictive than Mil.R.Evid. 404(b). Under Rules 413 and 414 you have to show the "commission of another offense." This may be difficult especially in proving those elements relating to intent. Mil.R.Evid. 404(b), on the other hand, applies not only to other crimes but also to "other wrongs or acts." As an example, assume that the person is accused of sexual assault and that on a prior occasion he was observed by another through binoculars tying up a woman and engaging in sexual acts with her. This might not constitute the "commission of another offense" if this act was consensual. It may, however, be admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) to show modus operandi.

0528            OTHER AREAS OF CONSIDERATION

A.    Must there have been a conviction? When the Government seeks to introduce "the other offense," there is no requirement that the accused actually have been convicted of this other offense. The analysis similar to the 404(b) analysis conducted in Huddleston v. United States, 485 U.S. 681 (1985). In Huddleston, the Court stated that all that is required is that the evidence of the other crime is strong enough so that the trier of fact could reasonably find that the other crime was committed by the accused. In theory, there could have even been a prior acquittal of this other crime and it still may be admissible in the current trial under Rules 413 and 414. See Watkins v. Meloy, 95 F.3d 4 (7th Cir. 1996) (although not technically a Rule 413 case, the court found no restrictions on admitting a rape that the accused was previously acquitted of). There are no due process or double jeopardy issues. See Dowling v. United States, 493 U.S. 342 (1990).

B.    Isn't this propensity evidence? The short answer is yes. A quote from the Bills sponsor, representative Molinari, demonstrates this point. "The past conduct of a person with a history of rape or child molestation provides evidence that he or she has the combination of aggressive and sexual impulses that motivates the commission of such crimes and lacks the inhibitions against acting on such impulses." In Frank v. Hudson, 924 F.Supp. 620 (D. N.J. 1996), the court stated specifically that this evidence is admissible to show propensity. It is very likely that defense counsel will seek out recidivism experts in these cases. If the Government can argue that the accused has the propensity to commit these types of crimes, defense counsel will try to show that the prior crime is distinct and has no bearing on propensity.

C.    Charging considerations. It is important to remember that the Government only receives the benefits of Rules 413 and 414 in a limited number of cases. It is imperative that a charge relating to sexual assault or child molestation appears on the charge sheet.

D.    Won't there be trials within trials? There is a big fear that much of the trial will end up focused on these prior offenses rather than the charges at hand. The Government must prove the elements of the other crime and show that it constitutes an offense under State or Federal law. That being the case, the defense will most likely have to be given the opportunity to show that this other offense was not committed.

CHAPTER VI

PRIVILEGES

0601 INTRODUCTION. The law of privileges is one of the areas of greatest difference between the Federal Rules of Evidence and the Military Rules. Section V of the Military Rules contains detailed guidance concerning military privilege law. The Federal Rules' section on privileges, on the other hand, is confined to Federal Rule of Evidence 501, which provides that privileges "shall be governed by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience."

0602 LAWYER-CLIENT PRIVILEGE

A. The attorney-client relationship. An attorney-client relationship is created when an individual seeks and receives professional legal service from an attorney. In addition, there must be an acceptance of the attorney by the client and an acceptance of the client by the attorney before the relationship is established. United States v. Iverson, 5 M.J. 440 (C.M.A. 1978). Military Rule of Evidence 502 imposes certain requirements that must be fulfilled in order for the privilege to apply. For example, the privilege applies only to "confidential communications made for the purpose of facilitating the rendition of professional legal services to the client. . . ." Accordingly, if the communication between the attorney and the client is not confidential, see Mil. R. Evid. 502(b)(4), a lawyer-client privilege will not exist even if an attorney-client relationship has been established. Similarly, if a conversation between a client and an attorney has been held for a purpose which does not include obtaining professional legal services, then the privilege will not exist even if an attorney-client relationship clearly exists.

B. Problems with ambiguous terminology.

1. Who is a client? Although "client" is defined by Rule 502(b)(1) to include a public entity, in practice it is sometimes difficult to determine when the attorney-client privilege applies. For example, to what extent will information presented by a commanding officer to the command's staff judge advocate be protected by the attorney-client privilege? May the commanding officer claim an attorney-client privilege? Unless the commanding officer has a reasonable belief that such communications fall within the privilege, a court should rule that the statements are not protected. See United States v. Rust, 41 M.J. 472 (1995) (holding that a doctor's statements to a lawyer for the Air Force hospital were not privileged). To clarify this issue, staff judge advocates should make clear to their convening authorities that the Department of the Navy is the client served by each Judge Advocate unless detailed to represent another client by competent authority. JAGINST 5803.1A of 13 Jul 92, para. 6a.

2. Who qualifies as a "lawyer"? The attorney-client privilege can extend far beyond statements that a client actually makes to a lawyer. The privilege also applies to statements made to a lawyer's representative. See Mil. R. Evid. 502(b)(3). Under the right circumstances, statements made to a doctor who becomes part of the defense team would also fall under the attorney-client privilege. See United States v. Toledo, 25 M.J. 270 (C.M.A. 1987), on reh'g, 26 M.J. 104 (C.M.A. 1988), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 889 (1988). Defense counsel should notice, however, that Toledo makes clear that such an "attorney-client" privilege will not exist where the statement is made to a government physician who has not been formally appointed to the defense team.

In United States v. Mansfield, 38 M.J. 415 (C.M.A. 1993), the accused made incriminating statements to "defense team" psychiatrists who were exploring a potential insanity defense. These same psychiatrists testified on the merits in support of this defense. The Court of Military Appeals held that it was proper to allow the trial counsel to question the psychiatrists regarding the accused's incriminating statements since the attorney-client privilege terminated with respect to matters the defense placed in issue through their testimony.

In United States v. Turner, 28 M.J. 487 (C.M.A. 1989), a forensic toxicologist was assigned to consult with the defense in preparation for a cocaine-use trial. This expert, who was present with counsel at trial, was determined to be a "lawyer representative" and, thus, it was error, though not reversible, for the prosecution to interview him prior to trial.

3. What is a communication? The term "communications" is not explicitly defined within the rule. Military case law has considered whether evidentiary items that the accused gives to defense counsel are protected. In United States v. Rhea, 33 M.J. 413 (C.M.A. 1991), a calendar on which the accused's stepdaughter had made a notation indicating incidents of sexual intercourse with the accused was not a privileged attorney-client communication and was properly admitted into evidence; since the calendar and its writings were not privileged and could have been seized, the accused's act of turning the calendar over to his attorney did not make it privileged. The court noted that the calendar itself was not a communication. However, the accused's act of producing the calendar was a communication as to the source and authenticity of the calendar. Therefore the counsel was not free to disclose how the calendar came into his possession. In accordance with that guidance, the counsel requested an ex parte hearing with the trial judge who ordered counsel to provide the evidence to the government.

b. With regard to documents in the possession of the defense counsel, United States v. Province, 45 M.J. 359 (1996), the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces indicated that a defense counsel does not have an obligation to turn over a document (in this case stragglers' orders) if the government has equal access to another copy of the document. The court added that if "the Government had asked the defense for a copy of this document, alleging their copy had been lost or destroyed, then defense counsel would have been obligated to turn over the orders." The court also provided this advice to counsel facing such a situation: "We believe contacting one's state bar licensing body and using the ex parte hearing with the military judge for close questions like these would be advisable."

4. What is a confidential communication? Only statements made in order to facilitate the rendition of professional legal services qualify as confidential communications under Rule 502. Thus, for example, where the accused was an enlisted clerk assigned to an Army legal office, was apprehended for drug distribution, was then released to the custody of his OIC (who was a judge advocate), and he told the OIC that he wanted him to know that he was not a "big-time drug dealer," the statement did not fall within the scope of the attorney-client privilege. United States v. Wallace, 14 M.J. 1019 (A.C.M.R. 1982). Also, where the accused filled out an inventory form and gave it to his defense counsel with the understanding that it would be passed on to others, the communication was not privileged. United States v. Smith, 35 M.J. 138 (C.M.A. 1992). While not "confidential communications" under this definition, attorney work product will sometimes also be protected. See generally United States v. Vanderwier, 25 M.J. 263, 268-69 (C.M.A. 1987).

5. When does the privilege attach? At a social function, the accused's civilian defense counsel, in United States v. Ankeny, 30 M.J. 10 (C.M.A. 1990), related to the accused's squadron staff judge advocate certain incriminating information that was told to him by his client. The accused at that time was under investigation for drug use. The information disclosed related to an incident of soliciting the urinalysis officer to be derelict in his duties, a charge about which the government was previously unaware. The accused's conviction was based on evidence so obtained. The Court of Military Appeals held that the attorney-client relationship formed even before preferral of charges; thus, the disclosures were subject to the attorney-client privilege and the counsel's preliminary overtures to the staff judge advocate were part of "plea discussions" within the meaning of Military Rule of Evidence 410 and, as such, were inadmissible.

6. BCD strikers. In United States v. Evans, 35 M.J. 754 (N.M.C.M.R. 1992), the accused requested a BCD in his unsworn statement. The military judge then sua sponte asked if the accused had discussed the ramifications of a BCD with his counsel and if counsel had tried to talk him out of this request. The court held that this inquiry invaded the attorney-client privilege.

7. Joint clients. In United States v. Nelson, 38 M.J. 710 (A.C.M.R. 1993), two soldiers met simultaneously with the same civilian defense counsel. The court found that both of these soldiers had an intent to seek legal services and an expectation that their communications would be kept confidential. The court deemed the two soldiers to be joint clients within the meaning of Military Rule of Evidence 502(d)(5).

C. Who may exercise the privilege? Military Rule of Evidence 502(c) makes clear that the privilege belongs to the client. However, the privilege may be exercised not only by the client, but by any number of representatives on the accused's behalf. This rule applies even if the client is dead or, in a case where the client is an organization, disbanded.

D. Exceptions. There are a number of exceptions to the attorney-client privilege. The following are the most common exceptions in military practice.

1. Future crimes. Military Rule of Evidence 502(d)(1) removes coverage of the privilege when the client's communications concern involvement in future crimes. In United States v. Smith, 35 M.J. 138 (C.M.A. 1992), the accused gave his defense counsel a falsified inventory list to introduce at trial as a defense to larceny. The court found that the production of the list was not privileged and that the defense counsel could be required to testify against the accused. The court found the communication to be in furtherance of a crime or fraud (Mil. R. Evid. 502(d)(1)) and that there was no intent to keep this communication confidential.

Rule 502(d)(1) provides much less protection of confidential communications than Rule of Professional Conduct 1.6 (JAGINST 5803.1A of 13 JUL 92). The crime/fraud exception of Rule 1.6 only requires disclosure when the attorney believes the future criminal act is likely to result in imminent death, substantial bodily harm or significant impairment of national security or the capability of a military unit.

2. Imminent death/public safety exception. In United States v. Godshalk, 44 M.J. 487 (1996), the Court of Appeals for the Armed Force concluded an attorney did not violate her client's privilege when she released information regarding her client's suicidal tendencies. The court found that she was acting in her client's best interest to ensure that he surrendered and did not harm himself or others. The Court recognized an imminent death/public safety exception.

3. Ineffective assistance of counsel. Rule 502(d)(3) removes coverage of the privilege when an attorney and client become embroiled in a subsequent disagreement. Matters which were communicated during the privileged relationship may be used, to the extent necessary, by either side to protect their respective interests. This concept often comes into play in military practice through appellate allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel at trial. See United States v. Devitt, 20 M.J. 240 (C.M.A. 1985) (once a former client seeks reversal, claiming improper conduct on the part of counsel, there has been a waiver of the attorney-client privilege). Even if a defense counsel does not want to disclose privileged information, an appellate court may require that the defense counsel respond to an allegation of ineffective assistance of counsel. United States v. Lewis, 42 M.J. 1 (1995).

E. Violations of the privilege. What is the effect on the results of a trial when a privileged communication is improperly used against an accused? Rule 511(a) provides, "Evidence of a statement or other disclosure of privileged matter is not admissible against the holder of the privilege if disclosure was compelled erroneously or was made without an opportunity for the holder of the privilege to claim the privilege." In United States v. Ankeny, 30 M.J. 10 (C.M.A. 1990), the Court of Military Appeals applied this rule to hold that the government could not exploit information that a defense counsel revealed in violation of the attorney-client privilege.

F. Litigating the issue. The party invoking the attorney-client privilege has the burden of proving that the lawyer-client relationship existed and that the communications in question were confidential. However, "[i]n determining whether the lawyer-client privilege protects the communication in question, the military judge should resolve any doubt in favor of the accused." United States v. Rust, 41 M.J. 472, 479 (1995) (internal quotation marks omitted).

0603 HUSBAND-WIFE PRIVILEGE

A. Introduction. Military Rule of Evidence 504 closely parallels the spousal privilege rules that the Supreme Court adopted in Trammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40 (1980).

B. Spousal incapacity to testify. Under Rule 504(a), the right not to testify at all against a spouse belongs to the witness spouse, subject to the exceptions listed in Rule 504(c). If the witness spouse chooses to testify, the accused spouse cannot invoke the spousal incapacity rule to keep the witness spouse off of the witness stand. (Of course, the accused spouse can generally prevent the witness spouse from testifying about confidential marital communications.)

– Exceptions. There are four primary situations in which the witness spouse must testify against the accused spouse even if the witness spouse does not want to testify.

a. A spouse may not refuse to testify against the accused spouse when, at the time the testimony is to be given, the marriage has been terminated by divorce or civil annulment. Mil. R. Evid. 504(c)(1).

b. A spouse may not refuse to testify against the accused spouse when the latter is charged with a crime against the person or property of the other spouse or a child of either. Mil. R. Evid. 504(c)(2)(A).

c. A spouse may not refuse to testify against the accused spouse when the marital relationship was entered into as a sham, and remained a sham at the time the testimony was to be introduced against the other. Mil. R. Evid. 504(c)(2)(B). See Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604 (1953) (describing a factual situation that constitutes a marital sham).

d. A spouse may not refuse to testify against the accused spouse when the latter has been charged with importing the other spouse for prostitution, or other immoral purposes, or with transporting the other spouse in interstate commerce for immoral purposes. Mil. R. Evid. 504(c)(2)(C). Additionally, if an out-of-court statement has been made by the spouse of the accused, the statement could be admissible at trial, despite the exercise of spousal incapacity by the witness spouse, under an exception to the hearsay rule. United States v. Hughes, 28 M.J. 391 (C.M.A. 1989).

C. Confidential communications. Military Rule of Evidence 504(b) discusses how confidential communications made between the spouses during the marriage are to be treated. Generally, this rule provides that the privilege will protect those confidential communications made during the marriage even after the marriage has terminated. The rule states that the accused spouse may invoke the privilege to prevent the witness spouse from testifying about confidential marital communications. It also allows the witness spouse to similarly claim the privilege, but it retains the accused's ability to force disclosure of a privileged communication.

1. What is a communication? The term "communications" generally refers to utterances or expressions intended to convey a message; however, courts have recognized that there are instances where conduct, intended to convey a private message to the spouse will also qualify as "communicative." See, e.g., United States v. Martel, 19 M.J. 917 (A.C.M.R. 1985) (under facts of this case, accused's act of summoning his wife to the bedroom and pulling back the bed sheets to reveal piles of stolen currency and coins was communicative).

2. The confidentiality requirement. The communications must be intended to be confidential. Since the communications must be intended to be confidential, conversations made with third or fourth parties present will not be deemed confidential communications. See, e.g., United States v. Martel, 19 M.J. 917 (A.C.M.R. 1985). The term "confidential communications" may also include written documents, such as letters. The circumstances surrounding the writing of the letters will be closely scrutinized to determine whether they fit within the confidential communication privilege.

3. Exploitation of disclosed marital communications. An interesting evidentiary issue could arise in a situation where a spouse reveals the contents of a confidential communication to law enforcement officials, who in turn seek independent nonprivileged evidence against the accused. Once disclosed, can law enforcement officials use this evidence against the accused at trial, or is it inadmissible because it was derived from the disclosures made by the spouse? United States v. Ankeny, 30 M.J. 10 (C.M.A. 1990), suggests that law enforcement officials may not exploit a lawyer's revelation of attorney-client confidences. Since the Military Rules of Evidence's adoption, however, no military appellate court has addressed this issue in the context of the husband-wife communications privilege.

4. Exceptions. As with the spousal capacity prong of the marital privilege, there are situations where the accused spouse cannot claim the protections of the marital communications privilege.

a. A spouse may not refuse to testify against the accused spouse when the latter is charged with a crime against the person or property of the other spouse or a child of either. Mil. R. Evid. 504(c)(2)(A).

b. A spouse may not refuse to testify against the accused spouse when the marital relationship was entered into as a sham and was a sham at the time of the communication. Mil. R. Evid. 504(c)(2)(B).

c. A spouse may not refuse to testify against the accused spouse when the latter has been charged with importing the other spouse for prostitution, or other immoral purposes, or with transporting the other spouse in interstate commerce for immoral purposes. Mil. R. Evid. 504(c)(2)(C).

d. The Courts of Criminal Appeals are split over the existence of a "joint participant" or "co-conspirator" exception to the husband-wife privilege. This exception rests on the proposition that the public interest in preserving the family is not great enough to justify protecting conversations in furtherance of crime. The Air Force Court of Criminal Appeals has applied the joint criminal venture exception to Military Rule of Evidence 504's privilege for marital communications. United States v. Smith, 30 M.J. 1022 (A.F.C.M.R. 1990), aff'd on other grounds, 33 M.J. 114 (C.M.A. 1991). One Army Court of Criminal Appeals decision suggested in dicta that the joint criminal venture exception applies. United States v. Martel, 19 M.J. 917 (A.C.M.R. 1985). The most recent military appellate decision to consider the question, however, argued against recognizing the exception. In United States v. Archuleta, 40 M.J. 505 (A.C.M.R. 1994), an Army Court panel, without specifically holding, that the joint criminal venture exception is inapplicable to the husband-wife communication privilege created by Military Rule of Evidence 504(b). The Navy-Marine Corps Court, the Coast Guard Court and the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces have yet to address this issue.

e. In order to determine whether a valid marriage exists, the military judge will look to the law of the state in which the marriage was contracted. United States v. Poole, 39 M.J. 819 (A.C.M.R. 1994). However, the Defense of Marriage Act, Pub. L. No. 104-199, 110 Stat. 2419 (1996), would likely bar a court-martial from recognizing a homosexual marriage, even if such a marriage is allowed under a state's laws. That Act provides that "[i]n determining the meaning of any . . . regulation . . . of the United States, the word 'marriage' means only a legal union between one man and one woman as husband and wife, and the word 'spouse' refers only to a person of the opposite sex who is a husband or a wife."

f. Waiver under Military Rule of Evidence 510. "An accused who testifies about matters discussed in a privileged communication waives the privilege even if the actual communication is not disclosed." United States v. Smith, 33 M.J. 114 (C.M.A. 1991).

0604 COMMUNICATIONS TO CLERGY PRIVILEGE

A. Introduction. There are very few published military and civilian cases dealing with the communications to clergy privilege. This situation is probably due to the fact that members of the clergy are extremely hesitant to reveal communications made to them. It is important, when discussing this privilege, to distinguish the application of Military Rule of Evidence 503 from restraints placed on clergy members by church edicts. For the privilege to attach: (1) The communication must be made either as a formal act of religion or as a matter of conscience; (2) it must be made to a clergy member as a spiritual adviser or to a clergy member's assistant acting in an official capacity; and (3) the communication must be intended to be confidential. United States v. Moreno, 20 M.J. 623, 626 (A.C.M.R. 1985). Denominational rules governing divulging confidences are varied and beyond the scope of this guide. The Supreme Court has explained that this privilege "recognizes the human need to disclose to a spiritual counsel, in total and absolute confidence, what are believed to be flawed acts or thoughts and to receive priestly consolation and guidance in return." Tammel v. United States, 445 U.S. 40 (1980).

The cases discussed below demonstrate Military Rule of Evidence 503's application.

B. Case illustrations

1. United States v. Napoleon, 46 M.J. 279 (1997). The accused was charged with stabbing another woman to death outside an Air Force NCO Club. While she was in pretrial confinement, a technical sergeant visited her several times. She knew the technical sergeant because they worked together; she also knew that he was a lay minister at a base chapel. The accused discussed her case with the technical sergeant, who prayed with the accused during one of his visits. During the accused's court-martial, the technical sergeant testified about admissions the accused made to him during one of these visits. In order for Military Rule of Evidence 503's privilege to apply, three conditions must be satisfied: (1) the communication must be made either as a formal act of religion or as a matter of conscience; (2) the communication must be made to a clergyman in his capacity as a spiritual advisor; and (3) the communication must be intended to be confidential. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces held that neither the first nor the second condition was met. The court held that she failed to show that she "reasonably believed" the technical sergeant was a "clergyman." In fact, the court concluded that he "came to the confinement facility as a concerned friend, not a clergyman." Id. At 285. Additionally, the court found that her admissions were not a formal act of religion nor were they made as a matter of conscience. The court concluded she "was seeking emotional support and consolation, not guidance and forgiveness." Id.

2. United States v. Kroop, 34 M.J. 628 (A.F.C.M.R. 1992). The accused was an Air Force lieutenant colonel who was involved in adulterous affairs with another officer and with an enlisted woman. The accused was convicted and, during its presentencing case, the defense tried to introduce into evidence a letter from a chaplain containing opinions about the cause of the accused's adulterous relationships. The military judge at the trial refused to admit the letter unless the defense waived the communications to clergy privilege and allowed inquiry into the chaplain's basis to form the opinions expressed in the letter. The Air Force Court of Military Review held that the letter should have been allowed into evidence without any need for inquiry into the chaplain's basis for forming his opinions.

3. United States v. Beattie, No. 25938 (A.F.C.M.R. Aug. 7, 1987). The accused met with an Air Force chaplain and told the chaplain he was looking for help and wanted to turn himself in for sexually abusing his children. The accused asked the chaplain where to go and what to do. The chaplain referred the accused to the family advocacy office and told the accused to notify his commander. The chaplain did not direct or order the accused to contact anyone. The accused then spoke to his commander and first sergeant, who referred him to the mental health clinic. At trial, the accused argued that the chaplain violated the communications to clergy privilege by referring him to his commander and the family advocacy office. The Air Force Court of Military Review ruled that the chaplain had not violated the privilege rule. The court reasoned that the clergy privilege prevents the disclosure of a confidential communication; it does not prevent a chaplain from giving advice when it is requested.

4. United States v. Moreno, 20 M.J. 623 (A.C.M.R. 1985). A soldier shot another soldier with whom he had been carrying on an extra-marital affair. An hour later, the accused—a Roman Catholic—went to an on-base chapel, but couldn't find a priest. He later went to a different on-base chapel where he spoke to a Baptist chaplain. The accused told the chaplain, "I've sinned. I've hurt somebody real bad," and admitted to shooting a woman in the barracks. The accused discussed the problems he had been having with his wife, his romantic relationship with the victim, and the fact that he "really got mad" at the victim before he shot her. The chaplain called the victim's command and learned that she was dead. The chaplain then said he would have to call the military police. The accused consented to the call. MPs arrived and apprehended the accused. Later in the day, MPs interviewed the chaplain. Without seeking the accused's permission, the chaplain told the MPs everything that the accused had told him. The chaplain also testified at trial, and again repeated everything the accused had told him. The Army Court of Military Review held that the chaplain's disclosures—both to the MPs and at trial—violated the clergy privilege. The accused's statement that "I've sinned" indicates that he went to the chaplain as a matter of conscience and that the statement was made to the chaplain in his capacity as a spiritual advisor. The court held that even if the accused intended the chaplain to tell the authorities where he was, there was no evidence that the accused intended the chaplain to reveal the contents of their conversation.

5. United States v. Garries, 19 M.J. 845 (A.F.C.M.R. 1985). The accused—an airman first class—and an Air Force sergeant were neighbors and attended the same off-base church. The sergeant was a deacon at the church. A half-month before the accused's wife was murdered, the accused went to the sergeant's house and asked the sergeant where their pastor was. The sergeant told the accused the pastor was out of town. The accused then asked the sergeant if they could speak together in the accused's car. During the ensuing conversation, the accused threatened to harm his wife. After the accused's wife was murdered, the sergeant revealed the conversation to Air Force investigators. The sergeant also testified about the conversation at the accused's court-martial. Between the date of the conversation and the court-martial, the sergeant was licensed and ordained as a minister. The Air Force Court of Military Review held that the conversation was not privileged because the accused did not reasonably believe that the sergeant, who was then a deacon, was a clergyman.

6. United States v. Richards, 17 M.J. 1016 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984). The accused, a disbursing clerk third class, met with a Navy chaplain and admitted that he had embezzled funds from his ship. At the chaplain's suggestion, the accused agreed to allow the chaplain to approach the ship's legal officer to discuss the matter without revealing the accused's identity. The legal officer indicated that it would be best for the accused to turn himself in before the command discovered who it was. The chaplain and the accused reviewed the accused's options; the accused chose to have the chaplain reveal his identity to the command. The Navy-Marine Corps Court of Military Review suggested that a chaplain need not give Article 31 warnings in the course of privileged communications with a servicemember. The court also held that the accused waived the privilege by asking the chaplain to identify him to his command.

7. In United States v. Isham, 48 M.J. 603 (Navy-Marine Corps Ct.CrimApp. 1998), the appellant made the statements for which he was convicted to communicating a threat during an appointment with the battalion chaplain. During this conversation, appellant said he was struggling with stress and depression and felt that he would hurt himself unless he got help. The chaplain ascertained that appellant had attended one suicide-prevention class. The chaplain further explained that while most of what was said during counseling session was confidential, the chaplain could not treat statements which show a plan to hurt himself or others in a confidential manner. The Navy-Marine Corps Court also concluded that both the appellant and the chaplain intended to limit the scope of further communication to only those necessary to get him further professional help and to avoid harm to appellant and others. The Court concluded that appellant may have allowed disclosure for the purpose of obtaining help. However, he did not waive his privilege in order for the information to be used against him at court-martial. The court then reaffirmed that if the communication was made to a spiritual advisor and was intended to be confidential, then the clergy-penitent privilege is absolute.

C. The "matter of conscience" requirement. Not every statement made by an individual to a clergy member is necessarily within the scope of the privilege. The statement must be made as a formal act of religion or a matter of conscience in order to qualify for such a status. An interesting case in this regard is United States v. Coleman, 26 M.J. 407 (C.M.A. 1988), where the accused was charged with committing indecent acts upon his nine-year-old daughter. After the incident came to light, his wife took the child and left him. The accused subsequently called his father-in-law, who was a minister, for help in putting his marriage back together. When the father-in-law asked if it was true that the accused had taken liberties with his daughter, the accused admitted that it was and asked his father-in-law to pray for him. The Court of Military Appeals held that the military judge properly admitted the testimony of the father-in-law regarding the accused's statement to him since it did not appear to have been made as a matter of conscience.

D. JAG opinion. Reflecting an apparent concern for a lack of understanding about this privilege in the field, a 1979 opinion of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy has addressed the issue of when the privilege attaches to a communication. The chaplain must consider the totality of the circumstances surrounding the communication before a decision can be made as to whether or not it falls within the privilege. "[T]he chaplain must determine the purpose for which the consultation took place, the capacity in which the chaplain was consulted, whether the disclosure was of the character likely to be regarded by the servicemember as confidential, and whether the consultation is rooted in essentially religious, spiritual, or moral considerations." JAG ltr JAG:13.1:RLS:cmt Ser 13/6071 of 10 Oct 1979. This opinion contains the following example:

If the unauthorized absentee approaches a naval chaplain because he is a superior naval officer in order to terminate an unauthorized absence, the relationship would appear to be secular, involving no confidential communications, and would require the chaplain to exercise authority no differently than would any other naval officer. This responsibility, depending upon current regulations, orders and directives, may include taking the member into custody and effecting the member's delivery to cognizant military authorities. On the other hand, if the chaplain is consulted by the absentee for the purposes, and in the relationship, discussed herein as giving rise to a clergyman-penitent privilege, any resultant confidential communication made by the member would be privileged from disclosure. In that connection, if the fact of the member's status as an unauthorized absentee is unknown to the authorities and is made known to the chaplain as a privileged confidential communication, the fact of such status may not be revealed absent the member's waiver of the privilege.

0605            GOVERNMENT INFORMATION

A.        *Classified information

1.        Military Rule of Evidence 505. Military Rule of Evidence 505 establishes a privilege that sometimes allows the government to avoid producing classified materials. The privilege itself may only be invoked formally by the head of the Department that has control over the materials. Mil. R. Evid. 505(c); see United States v. Flannigan, 28 M.J. 988 (A.F.C.M.R. 1989) (holding that the privilege cannot be invoked by the commander of the Air Force Office of Special Investigation). Rule 505(c) permits an agent for the head of a Department, such as the trial counsel, to invoke the privilege in court. In order for the privilege to apply, the government must show that the information was properly classified and that its disclosure would be harmful to national security.

2.        Underlying theory. The philosophy that underpins the defense's ability to sometimes obtain classified materials is the notion that it would be unfair to allow the government to bring an action in the first instance and thereafter block the accused's right to acquire evidence that he or she needs to support a defense. The military judge is tasked with the responsibility of balancing the government's need to protect the defense of the nation against society's and the accused's right to have a full consideration of all facts pertinent to the judicial truth-seeking process.

3. Procedures. Military Rule of Evidence 505(i) provides the military judge with a full array of procedural powers by which the merits of the government and defense positions can be intelligently evaluated. When it appears to any party that the court-martial may deal with an issue related to classified information, an initial article 39(a) session will be held in order to establish the ground rules by which the problem will be resolved. Mil. R. Evid. 505(e). This session is held in camera. In order for the privilege to apply, the government must demonstrate that "[t]he information reasonably could be expected to cause damage to the national security. . . ." Mil. R. Evid. 505(i)(3). To request the information, the defense should file a motion for appropriate relief. Mil. R. Evid. 505(d). The defense must state with great particularity the classified information it wishes to reveal at trial. Mil. R. Evid. 505(h)(3). The burden of proof seems to rest with the party (the government) claiming that the privileged information should not be disclosed. See Mead Data Cent. Inc. v. U.S. Dept. of Air Force, 566 F.2d 242 (D.C. Cir. 1977). It would be logical to assign the burden to the government, since all information relating to the motion is within the control of the government.

4. Scope. Military Rule of Evidence 505 applies at all stages of all proceedings. Mil. R. Evid. 505(a). Anyone who is exposed to classified information during the proceedings must cooperate fully with investigators who are gathering information for security clearance purposes. Mil. R. Evid. 505(g)(1)(D). Military defense counsel should alert civilian counsel to this obligation. See United States v. Pruner, 38 M.J. 272 (C.M.A. 1991) (discussing process for civilian defense counsel to obtain necessary security clearances).

B. Nonclassified information

1. Military Rule of Evidence 506. Military Rule of Evidence 506 is structured similarly to Rule 505. The respective parties' actions and their legal bases are virtually identical.

2. Independent bases for information. Information that is required to be disclosed by acts of Congress is not within the contemplation of the rule. Thus, Rule 506 does not limit the defense's right to obtain information under the Freedom of Information Act, 5 U.S.C. § 552 (1994), or the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500 (1994).

3. Underlying theory. The theory supporting the privilege is that governmental employees should be encouraged to be candid in their official communications. This, it is believed, is fostered by cloaking their conduct by a privilege. See United States v. Nixon, 418 U.S. 683 (1974).

4. Scope. The rule presents one significant problem. It does not specifically describe the nature of information exempt from disclosure. It merely indicates that the privilege attaches to governmental information that "would be detrimental to the public interest." Mil. R. Evid. 506(a). See also Mil. R. Evid. 506(i)(3) (stating that the Rule applies to information that "reasonably could be expected to cause identifiable damage to the public interest").

5. Burden of proof. The analysis to Rule 506(i)(4)(B) explicitly states that the burden of proof of nondisclosure is on the party seeking to withhold information.

6. Illustrative case. For an interesting application of Rule 506, see United States v. Rivers, 44 M.J. 839 (1996).

0606 IDENTITY OF INFORMANT PRIVILEGE (Key Number 1130)

A. Introduction. Military Rule of Evidence 507 establishes the nature and extent of the government informant privilege. Generally, it provides that the privilege must give way if disclosure of the informant's identity is necessary to the issue of guilt or innocence or if disclosure is necessary to litigate the validity of a search or seizure. Unless otherwise privileged under the Military Rules of Evidence, the communications of an informant are not privileged except to the extent necessary to prevent the disclosure of the informant's identity.

B. The privilege.

1. Informant. The term "informant" refers both to the good citizen reporter and to the traditional "confidential informant." In order for the privilege to be applicable, the information must be communicated "to a person whose official duties include the discovery, investigation or prosecution of crime." Mil. R. Evid. 507(a). Accordingly, an informant's identity would not be privileged when the communication was made to officials not involved in law enforcement.

2. Claiming the privilege. The privilege may be claimed by an "appropriate representative" of the United States, regardless of whether the information was received by federal, state, or state subdivision officers.

C. Exceptions

1. Disclosed identity. The identity of an informant is not privileged if it has already been disclosed to the opposing party. Mil. R. Evid. 507(c)(1).

2. Required for the accused's defense. The identity of an informant is not privileged if the military judge determines that disclosure "is necessary to the accused's defense on the issue of guilt or innocence." Mil. R. Evid. 507(c)(2). This rule provides no guidance as to when disclosure will be required. Each case will be decided on an individual basis.

a. In United States v. Watkins, 32 M.J. 1054 (A.C.M.R. 1991), aff'd, 34 M.J. 344 (C.M.A. 1992), the court held that denial of a defense request for the identity of the government's informant was proper. The defense only demonstrated a possibility that the informant had evidence which could be used to impeach a government witness and that this speculation was not sufficient to warrant disclosure.

b. In United States v. Silva, 580 F.2d 144 (5th Cir. 1978), the court concluded that the trial judge should have ordered disclosure of the informant's identity because:

(1) the informant allegedly introduced an undercover agent to the defendant, and the latter claimed mistaken identity as a defense;

(2) the informant was the only witness in a position to support or contradict testimony of the lone agent; and

(3) the informant allegedly had a revenge motive.

3. Constitutionally required. The identity of an informant is not privileged if the military judge, in a motion considering the legality of a search or seizure under Military Rule of Evidence 311, determines that disclosure is required by the Constitution as applied to the Armed Forces. Mil. R. Evid. 507(c)(3). See also McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300 (1967); Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978).

4. Informant as witness. Finally, the identity of the informant is not privileged if the informant takes the stand to testify.

D. Procedure. To raise the issue of the existence of the privilege, the defense counsel should make a motion requesting disclosure of the informant's identity. The rule is silent as to whether an in camera proceeding can be employed in making this determination. If the military judge rules that disclosure is required, and the prosecution elects not to disclose, the matter is referred to the convening authority. The convening authority could then order disclosure, terminate the proceedings, or take other appropriate action. If disclosure is not made after a reasonable period of time, the military judge may sua sponte, or upon motion, and after a hearing if requested, dismiss the charges or specifications which involve the informant.

0607 DOCTOR-PATIENT PRIVILEGE

A. General Rule. There is no doctor-patient privilege in the military, even if the doctor happens to be a civilian. Military Rule of Evidence 501(d) provides: "Notwithstanding any other provision of these rules, information not otherwise privileged does not become privileged on the basis that it was acquired by a medical officer or civilian physician in a professional capacity."

B. Exceptions.

1. HIV screening. Protection against involuntary disclosure exists in the area of HTLV-III (AIDS) virus screening. While not a rule of evidence, the Defense Authorization Act for FY 87 (§ 705(c) of Pub. L. No. 99-661, approved 14 Nov 86) and SECNAVINST 5300.30C of 14 March 1990, provide that no information obtained by the DOD during, or as a result of, an epidemiologic assessment interview with a serum-positive member of the armed forces may be used to support any adverse personnel action (e.g., courts-martial, NJP, involuntary separation (other than for medical reasons), unfavorable personnel record entry, etc.) against the member.

2. R.C.M. 706 boards. As a general matter, statements that an accused makes to during a R.C.M. 706 board's inquiry into mental competency are privileged. However, "[i]f the defense offers statements made by the accused at such an examination, the military judge may upon motion order the disclosure of such statements made by the accused and contained in the report as may be necessary in the interests of justice." Mil. R. Evid. 302(c).

3. Members of the defense team. A doctor or psychotherapist employed by or assigned to assist a lawyer falls under the lawyer-client privilege as a "lawyer's representative." United States v. Tharpe, 38 M.J. 8 (C.M.A. 1993).

0608 PSYCHOTHERAPIST-PATIENT PRIVILEGE

An interesting issue concerns the applicability of the psychotherapist-patient privilege to the military justice system. In Jaffee v. Redmond, 116 S. Ct. 1923 (1996), the Supreme Court established a psychotherapist-patient privilege under Federal Rule of Evidence 501. Military Rule of Evidence 501(a)(4) indicates that a court-martial will recognize a privilege provided for by the "principles of common law generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts pursuant to rule 501 of the Federal Rules of Evidence insofar as the application of such principles in trials by courts-martial is practicable and not contrary to or inconsistent with the code, these rules, or this Manual." Because a statement made to a psychiatrist is a statement made to a doctor, Military Rule of Evidence 501(d) would appear to preclude extending the privilege to such statements. What about statements made to psychologists and social workers who are not doctors? This issue is currently unresolved.

In fact, the Army Court of Criminal Appeals insinuated it would recognize a psychiatrist patient privilege in United States v. Demmings, 46 M.J. 877 (Army Ct.Crim.App. 1997). Sergeant Demmings, upset at the possibility of losing his wife of 8 years and daughter, became despondent. In an altercation with his wife, he threatened her with a gun and threatened to kill her and himself. After negotiators safely apprehended him with a pistol in his mouth, Sergeant Demmings was taken for an emergency mental evaluation. At trial, the psychiatrist testified extensively about Sergeant Demmings' statements and intentions during the assault. The Army Court, relying of Jaffee v. Redmond and Mil.R.Evid. 101(b), stated: "We could hold that confidential communications between an accused and mental health professionals in the course of diagnosis or treatment are protected." Id. At 883. The court distinguished between the physician-patient privilege and psychotherapist patient privilege, concluding they are separate and distinct privileges. Therefore, the court reasoned Mil.R. Evid. 501(d) does not preclude psychotherapist-patient privilege. The court then held that they need not decide the issue since appellant waived the issue by failing to assert the privilege at trial.

0609 OTHER PRIVILEGES

Military Rule of Evidence 501(d), which allows for the recognition of privileges that are required by the "principles of common law," offers an avenue for the application of additional privileges. A 1996 decision of the Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals suggests that a First Amendment news-gathering privilege exists which precludes military counsel from obtaining a television news crew's outtakes absent a showing that the evidence is highly material and relevant, necessary or critical to an issue at trial, and not obtainable from any other available source. United States v. Rodriguez, 44 M.J. 766 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. 1996).

CHAPTER VII

WITNESSES

0701 INTRODUCTION. Witnesses! The very word conjures up images of stirring courtroom dramatics — like Tom Cruise's devastating cross-examination of Jack Nicholson in "A Few Good Men." Yet, as counsel soon discover, the trial of an actual case is not so simple as it may appear in fiction. Witnesses are not as well scripted and predictable to deal with. As in fiction, though, a good part of the trial advocate's work is spent working with witnesses. They are the primary source of evidence at most courts-martial. Accordingly, a working relationship with the rules of evidence applicable to witnesses is important to the successful trial advocate.

0702 SCOPE OF THE CHAPTER. This chapter will examine those rules in Sections VI and VII of the Military Rules of Evidence [hereinafter Mil.R.Evid.], the "witnesses" sections that deal with the substantive and procedural aspects of using witnesses at courts-martial. It will also examine provisions of the Manual for Courts-Martial, United States, 1984 [hereinafter MCM, 1984], that relate to witnesses and their testimony at trial. This chapter will not consider trial tactics and the strategies for how best to use witnesses; nor will it deal with how to actually interrogate a witness. These topics are best considered by specialized commercial treatises and various trial advocacy publications of the Naval Justice School.

The chapter is divided into four parts, each reflecting a conceptual subdivision of the substantive and procedural rules of Sections VI and VII, Mil.R.Evid. Part one discusses the concept of competency and considers Mil.R.Evid. 601-606. The area of witness credibility under Mil.R.Evid. 607-610 and 613 is considered in part two. Section VII, Mil.R.Evid., which includes rules on opinion testimony and expert witnesses' testimony, is discussed in part three. Part four discusses the miscellaneous procedural rules such as Mil.R.Evid. 611, 612, 614 and 615, and related Rules for Courts-Martial. It also contains a general discussion of the stages of a court-martial and the technical procedures by which witness examination is conducted.

PART ONE: COMPETENCY

0703 INTRODUCTION (Key Numbers 1123, 1125). The admissibility of any evidence depends upon three characteristics: authenticity, relevancy, and competency. See Mil.R.Evid., Sections IV and IX. This is commonly referred to as the "admissibility formula" (AE=ARC). Evidence submitted to the court through the testimony of witnesses must comply with these characteristics. The competency and authenticity aspects of testimonial evidence will be discussed in this part of the chapter. Relevancy has been addressed in chapter V.

Section VI of the Military Rules of Evidence sets forth the various rules dealing with testimonial evidence. Rules 601-606 specifically address competency, the third characteristic of the admissibility formula. Before proceeding to examine the content and impact of Mil.R.Evid. 601-606 on the admissibility of testimony, some terminology and the procedures dealing with competency issues should be discussed.

A. Definitions. Witness competency is "the presence of those characteristics, or the absence of those disabilities, which render a witness legally fit and qualified to give testimony in a court of justice." Black's Law Dictionary 257 (rev. 5th.ed. 1979). It includes the general qualities that every witness must possess in order to be allowed to testify. In this regard, "general competency" and "specific competency" should be distinguished.

1. General competency refers to whether a witness possesses certain qualities that would preclude the witness from taking the stand and presenting any evidence at a trial. Witnesses who lack general competency are not legally qualified to testify at the court-martial on any issue. See Mil.R.Evid. 601.

2. Specific competency refers to a witness' legal ability to testify on a specific issue. It is the physical opportunity of witnesses to observe, hear, or otherwise experience the particular facts to which they testify. A witness may possess general competency to testify as a witness, yet lack specific competency to testify on a certain issue, either through lack of personal knowledge of facts relating to the issue (see Mil.R.Evid. 602) or because of the application of a privilege under Section V, Mil.R.Evid. (discussed in chapter VI, supra).

B. Distinguish competency and credibility. Competency differs from credibility. The former is a question that arises before considering the evidence given by the witness; the latter concerns the degree of credit to be given to the testimony. The former denotes the personal qualification of the witness; the latter the witness' veracity. Witnesses may be competent, and yet give incredible testimony; they may be incompetent, and yet their evidence, if received, may be perfectly credible. Competency is for the military judge to decide; credibility for the trier of fact, be it members or judge. See United States v. Matias, 25 M.J. 356 (C.M.A. 1987), cert. denied, 485 U.S. 968 (1988).

Counsel should be careful in their use of terminology. Credibility of witnesses is considered in part two of this chapter.

C. Raising the competency issue. The competency of a witness to take the stand and testify is in issue as soon as the witness is called to testify. Witnesses who lack general competency should not be permitted to testify at all. Accordingly, counsel should raise an objection before the witness is sworn. In a members case, the objection, any resultant voir dire of the witness, and any argument by counsel on the objection should be heard at an article 39(a) session.

The determination of general competency of a witness is a preliminary matter within the military judge's discretion. See Mil.R.Evid. 104(a) and the discussion of this rule in chapter III. Specific competency is also a matter for the military judge's determination, but special aspects of raising this issue will be reserved for discussion in section III, infra.

0704 GENERAL COMPETENCY. Mil.R.Evid. 601. (Key Number 1125)

A. General rule

Rule 601. General Rule of Competency

Every person is competent to be a witness except as otherwise provided in these rules.

The drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 601 clearly indicates the intent of the rule and the significance of the rule's reference to the exceptions "otherwise provided in these rules."

In declaring that subject to any other rule, all persons are competent to be witnesses, Rule 601 supersedes para. 148 of the present Manual which requires, among other factors, that an individual know the difference between truth and falsehood and understand the moral importance of telling the truth in order to testify.

Under Rule 601 such matters will go only to the weight of the testimony and not to its competency. The Rule's reference to other rules includes Rules 603 (Oath or Affirmation), 605 (Competency of Military Judge as Witness), 606 (Competency of Court Member as Witness), and the rules of privilege.

Mil.R.Evid. 601 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-41.

The Section VI, Mil.R.Evid. exceptions will be discussed in subsequent sections of this part; chapter VI of this study guide discusses privileges.

The clear objective of the rule is to provide court members with the greatest possible amount of arguably reliable evidence. The military appellate courts have followed the Rule's literal language to allow testimony from witnesses who would have been deemed incompetent under the common law. See, e.g., United States v. Lemere, 22 M.J. 61 (C.M.A. 1986) (holding that a 3 1/2-year-old child was not incompetent to testify); see also United States v. Lyons, 33 M.J. 543 (A.C.M.R. 1991) (holding that an 18-year-old mentally impaired, deaf male with a mental age of 3 was competent to testify).

B. Limitations. Are there now any limitations at all in the area of general competency? May anyone at all testify? It seems clear from the plain language of Mil.R.Evid. 601 that this is precisely what the drafters intended. It would appear, therefore, that the only limitation on any witness' ability to testify is found in Mil.R.Evid. 602 and 603, discussed infra. In general, those rules require that every witness must testify from personal knowledge and must do so under oath "administered in a form calculated to awaken the witness's conscience and impress the witness's mind with the duty to [testify truthfully]." Mil.R.Evid. 603. No other requirement of competency exists.

0705      SPECIFIC COMPETENCY. Mil.R.Evid. 602. (Key Number 1125)

A. General. Specific competency refers to a witness' physical opportunity to observe, hear, or otherwise experience the particular facts to which the witness testifies; essentially, whether the witness has personal knowledge of the matter about which the witness testifies. Mil.R.Evid. 602 is the Mil.R.Evid. dealing with specific competency.

Rule 602. Lack of Personal Knowledge.

A witness may not testify to a matter unless evidence is introduced sufficient to support a finding that he has personal knowledge of the matter. Evidence to prove personal knowledge may, but need not, consist of the testimony of the witness himself. This rule is subject to the provisions of Mil.R.Evid. 703, relating to opinion testimony by expert witnesses.

B. Rationale. Restated, Mil.R.Evid. 602 provides that witnesses may testify only about matters concerning which they have firsthand knowledge. The testimony must be based upon events perceived by the witness through one of the physical senses. The rule—an extension of the law's preference that decisions be based on the best evidence available—is grounded in the realization that the possibility of distortion increases with transfers of testimony, and that consequently the most reliable testimony is that which is obtained from witnesses who perceived the event first-hand.

C. Incredible testimony. Mil.R.Evid. 602 provides that "a witness may not testify . . . unless evidence is introduced sufficient to support a finding" of personal knowledge. (Emphasis added.) The "sufficient to support a finding" formula is also employed in Mil.R.Evid. 104(b) and 901. As in these other rules, the effect of the language is to compel admission if the proponent of the evidence makes a prima facie showing of the pertinent qualifying characteristic.

Nevertheless, the military judge retains the power to reject the evidence if it could not reasonably be believed (i.e., if, as a matter of law, no trier of fact could find that the witness actually perceived the matter about which the witness is testifying). See, e.g., United States v. Borelli, 336 F.2d 376, 392 (2d Cir. 1964), cert. denied sub nom., Mogavero v. United States, 379 U.S. 960 (1965) (witness for prosecution in conspiracy to violate narcotic laws action testified that narcotics "must have been" in certain suitcases). The Second Circuit Court of Appeals held that a competence "objection should have been sustained in the absence of a showing that [the witness] was giving 'an impression derived from the exercise of his own senses, not from the reports of others,' or from speculation based on the high price paid." Id. at 392 (emphasis added); United States v. Fernandez, 480 F.2d 726, 739 (2d Cir. 1973) (error for trial judge to permit witness to attach names to surveillance photographs being shown to jurors when agent had no personal knowledge and had not been qualified as expert to compare surveillance photographs with known photographs of defendant). Professor Morgan explains the test as one of "impossibility":

The court may not refuse to permit a witness to testify that he perceived a material matter merely because the court believes the witness to be obviously mistaken or obviously falsifying. It is only when no reasonable trier of fact could believe that the witness perceived what he claims to have perceived that the court may reject the testimony. Not improbability but impossibility is the test. Thus, the trial judge was affirmed in refusing to allow a plaintiff to testify that to his own knowledge, during an operation for amoebic ulcer a portion of his intestine above the rectum was removed. Obviously, he must have been giving the result of hearsay. In like manner whenever a witness testifies to matter that is contrary to undisputed physical facts, his testimony is to be disregarded. But where he swears that he has personal knowledge of a matter of which it is merely very unlikely that he was a percipient witness, his testimony will stand and may be credited by the trier, unless the opponent on cross-examination secures disclosure of facts demonstrating that his knowledge was second-hand or inferred knowledge.

J. Morgan, Basic Problems of Evidence 59-60 (1962).

According to Jack B. Weinstein and Margaret A. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence § 602-[02] (1994):

"Impossibility" is too strong a word. "Near impossibility" or "so improbable that no reasonable person could believe" better states the judge's role—to determine whether the witness has enough to add to warrant the time and possible confusion in hearing his testimony. In a criminal case where the proponent is the defense, the court should hesitate even more than in other instances in excluding testimony on Rule 602 grounds.

As long as the judge determines that the jury could find that the witness perceived the event to which the witness is testifying, the testimony should be admitted with the fact-finder then determining what weight, if any, to give to the testimony. This is the case even though the witness is not positive about what the witness perceived, as long as the witness had an opportunity to observe and did obtain some impressions. Uncertainty or hesitation only affects the weight of the evidence. See, e.g., Ross v. Firestone Tire and Rubber Co., 242 F.2d 914 (5th Cir. 1957). Stephen A. Saltzburg, et. al, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 621 (3rd ed. 1991). See also United States v. Kibler, 43 M.J. 725 (A.C.C.A. 1995) (Pretrial interviews did not effect the reliability of child-victim's testimony in prosecution for rape, thus, no taint hearing required to test for competence).

In summary, there is a difference between improbable evidence, which the trial judge should admit, and completely unbelievable evidence which should be excluded.

D. Relationship to hearsay rules. Mil.R.Evid. 602 is subject to the hearsay rule. Witnesses who are testifying to what they heard may do so unless what they heard is excluded under the hearsay rules of Section VIII, Mil.R.Evid. For example, a witness who testifies, "I only know what LtCol A told me. She said . . .," has personal knowledge of what he heard, but the testimony will not be admissible unless it qualifies under Section VIII of the Mil.R.Evid.

E. Establishing a foundation

1. The basis for the witness' personal knowledge is referred to as the "foundation." Mil.R.Evid. 602 provides that a witness may not testify unless a foundation has been established. Mil.R.Evid. 602 goes on to state that such a foundation may, but need not, be established through the witness' own testimony.

2. Counsel will ordinarily begin the direct examination without qualifying the witness in any formal sense. Only if it becomes apparent during the witness' testimony that a factual foundation is absent must an inquiry be conducted. Of course, if opposing counsel has interviewed the witness prior to trial, and has a good faith belief that the witness has no personal knowledge to support all or part of the testimony, the opposing counsel may seek an article 39(a) session before the witness takes the stand in order to avoid having the court members hear testimony that does not satisfy the rule. Note, however, that the witness need not be certain to have personal knowledge. M.B.A.F.B. Fed. Credit Union v. Cumis Ins. Soc'y, 681 F.2d 930 (4th Cir. 1982).

3. The preferred method is for counsel to lay a foundation on direct examination by asking questions that show that the witness was within such distance of the occurrence about which the witness is testifying that the witness was able to see, hear, smell, touch, or taste the matters described.

a. Laying the foundation:

- (1) The questioning should place the witness at the scene at the time of the event;
- (2) indicate who else was there; and
- (3) describe any other pertinent circumstances necessary to convince the court that this witness could make the observation.

b. This initial foundation-laying is especially important when counsel consider that one of the most common forms of witness impeachment is to attack the testimony's foundation or to do nothing during witness examination and then use the lack of a sufficient foundation to argue lack of credibility.

4. Objections on the basis of a lack of personal knowledge should be made at the earliest possible time. Once a witness has given testimony, a motion to strike is the only available remedy. Such a motion is never a perfect remedy, and rarely is it as desirable as barring inadmissible evidence before it is offered.

5. The foundation may be established by extrinsic evidence. For example, individuals A and B were standing at a street corner facing each other when the accused, C, drove his car into another car killing that car's driver. At C's trial, A, who was facing the collision, could testify where she was, whom she was with, and what she saw and heard. B, who was facing away from the collision, would be able to testify to the sounds of the collision which he heard. B could not, however, necessarily relate the sounds—and hence his personal knowledge—to the accused's collision, but A would be able to fill the gap in the connection of B's personal knowledge.

6. Opposing counsel should always consider testing a witness' basis of knowledge when testifying about uncharged misconduct. Such an examination can prevent inadmissible and prejudicial evidence from reaching the fact-finders and preclude the need to rely on the imperfect remedy of striking inadmissible testimony. United States v. Brooks, 22 M.J. 441 (C.M.A. 1986).

F. Expert opinions. The final sentence of Mil.R.Evid. 602 concerns the provision's interaction with expert or opinion testimony under Mil.R.Evid. 703. This sentence was inserted to underscore the drafters' intent that the requirement of personal knowledge would not limit an expert's testimony. Expert witnesses will be permitted to offer their opinions, even though such opinions may be based on information provided by others, and even though the information itself might not be independently admissible as evidence.

(Key Number 1125)

Rule 603. Oath or Affirmation.

Before testifying, every witness shall be required to declare that the witness will testify truthfully, by oath or affirmation administered in a form calculated to awaken the witness's conscience and impress the witness's mind with the duty to do so.

This rule is taken without change from Fed.R.Evid. 603.

A. Rationale. Along with cross-examination, the requirement of an oath is designed to ensure that every witness gives accurate and honest testimony. It supplies the "authenticity" element of the admissibility formula for witnesses. Although some critics have suggested that the oath is not really a substantial deterrent to false testimony, common law courts have traditionally imposed the requirement on the ground that it is some guarantee that the truth will be told. See, e.g., Note, A Reconsideration of the Sworn Testimony Requirement: Securing Truth in the Twentieth Century, 75 Mich. L. Rev. 1681 (1977).

B. Oath or affirmation. The rule allows the use of either an oath or an affirmation. "The rule is designed to afford the flexibility required in dealing with religious adults, atheists, conscientious objectors, mental defectives, and children. Affirmation is simply a solemn undertaking to tell the truth; no special formula is required." Fed.R.Evid. 603 Advisory Committee note. Any process that is sufficient to awaken the witness' conscience is satisfactory. Mil.R.Evid. 602. The idea is to find some procedure that will establish the witness' willingness to tell the truth and acceptance of responsibility for false statements.

1. Form of the oath. See R.C.M. 807(b)(2).

2. Trial counsel leg work. As a procedural matter, before a witness actually appears in court to take an oath, trial counsel should determine whether an oath or affirmation is appropriate and whether the witness desires the reference to God contained in the oath form. This will avoid both embarrassing the witness and confusing the court members.

3. Judicial inquiry. In order to ensure that the witness' conscience is "awakened," it may be necessary for the military judge to voir dire the witness pursuant to Mil.R.Evid. 104. See, e.g., United States v. Hardin, 443 F.2d 735, 737 n.3 (D.C. Cir. 1970) (key witness was an 11-year-old boy; court noted that he understood the meaning of the oath he took to tell the truth. "[He] testified that he understood that he would be punished if he told a lie and that, in this case, he might go to jail. It was also brought out that he attended Sunday School. . . ."); United States v. Allen, 13 M.J. 597 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982) (4-year-old witness' statement that "mommy puts hot sauce on my tongue if I lie" sufficient to establish she knew importance of telling the truth). Any such judicial inquiry, of course, should be conducted at an article 39(a) session in order to avoid any possibility of prejudicing the members. It was held to be proper for a three-year-old girl to testify against the accused after the trial counsel elicited from the girl her promise to tell the truth and her statement that she knew she would be spanked if she lied. United States v. LeMere, 16 M.J. 682 (A.C.M.R. 1983), aff'd on other grounds, 22 M.J. 61 (C.M.A. 1986).

C. Moral qualifications. The question remains as to whether Mil.R.Evid. 603 operates as a rule of competency authorizing a military judge to reject testimony if the judge considers the witness to be inherently untruthful (having no conscience or not being capable of having any conscience awakened). The Advisory Committee, in its note to Fed.R.Evid. 601, rejected the proposition that a judge can rule on such a "moral qualification" of a witness.

D. Refusal to take oath. A witness who refuses to promise to testify truthfully cannot testify. See United States v. Fowler, 605 F.2d 181 (5th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 445 U.S. 950 (1980), where the court affirmed the judge's refusal to allow a defendant to testify after he refused either to swear or affirm that he would tell the truth or submit to cross-examination. This would be an extremely rare event in a court-martial, absent a valid claim of privilege, due to the possible imposition of criminal penalties under Article 92, UCMJ, for military witnesses and Article 47, UCMJ, for all witnesses.

E. The recalled witness. If a witness is administered an oath or affirmation during a court-martial and is later recalled in the same court-martial, Mil.R.Evid. 603 does not require that the witness be resworn. It is sufficient if the military judge advises the witness, in an appropriate manner, to recall the significance of the oath or affirmation.

But, if a witness who was originally sworn at an article 39(a) session is recalled to testify on the merits before court members, it is appropriate to readminister the oath. Thus, court members would neither draw inferences from an apparent unequal treatment of the witnesses nor give the witness' testimony less weight because they did not hear an oath from the witness to be truthful.

0707 INTERPRETERS. Mil.R.Evid. 604.

Rule 604. Interpreters.

An interpreter is subject to the provisions of these rules relating to qualification as an expert and the administration of an oath or affirmation that the interpreter will make a true translation.

A. Requirements. This rule establishes certain requirements that pertain to the use of an interpreter. Although Mil.R.Evid. 604 is applicable worldwide, it is particularly important in overseas locations where non-English-speaking witnesses may be of significant importance.

1. First, the interpreter must be qualified in the same manner as any expert witness. See Mil.R.Evid. 702. This includes proof that the interpreter is competent to translate the foreign language into English and is able to perform this function during the trial itself.

2. To ensure that the translation will be accurate, this rule requires that interpreters swear or affirm that they will "make a true translation." This last requirement means that the interpreter will not analyze the testimony during translation, but will provide an exact English version of it. See R.C.M. 807 (interpreter's oath).

B. Transcript. An interesting question not addressed in the rule, or any other provision of the Manual for Courts-Martial, is what special transcription procedures, if any, should be required if an interpreter is employed at trial. The normal court reporter will not be transcribing what is said to or by a non-English-speaking witness, but will record what is said to or by the interpreter. If an audio recording of the entire proceeding is not kept for appellate review, evidence of possible inaccuracies may be lost. Thus, the Military Rules of Evidence Manual recommends that an open-microphone tape recording be made whenever an interpreter is used and retained throughout the course of judicial review of the case. Stephen A. Saltzburg, et. al, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 626 (3rd ed. 1991).

C. Interpreter as witness. As pointed out, counsel should remember that interpreters are witnesses with respect to the interpretation they provide. As such, interpreters are subject to the usual tests of credibility, including, in a proper case, cross-examination, impeachment, and contradiction by the testimony of other interpreters. It may even be advisable for the parties to supply their own interpreter to verify the accuracy of the court's interpretation.

D. Obtaining interpreters. Trial counsel should be aware of 28 U.S.C. § 1827 (1982), which requires the Director of the Administrative Office of the Federal Courts to establish a program to facilitate the use of interpreters in Federal courts by prescribing, determining, and certifying the qualifications of interpreters, and maintaining a list of qualified interpreters.

Overseas trial counsel may find it helpful to contact the appropriate U.S. Embassy or Consulate for a list of qualified interpreters.

In one rather unusual case, Fairbanks v. Cowan, 551 F.2d 97 (6th Cir. 1977), a father was permitted to interpret the language of his son who suffered from infantile paralysis and was able to utter only guttural sounds. To avoid any possible constitutional questions, the Court of Appeals stated that the trial judge would be well advised to use independent interpreters and not a potentially interested party. A similar situation occurred in United States v. Romey, 32 M.J. 180 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct. 337 (1991), where the court allowed a child witness to whisper her testimony to her mother who then repeated it for the court.

0708            COMPETENCY OF MILITARY JUDGE AS WITNESS.
Mil.R.Evid. 605. (Key Numbers 882, 1125)

Rule 605. Competency of Military Judge as Witness

(a)     The military judge presiding at the court-martial may not testify in that court-martial as a witness. No objection need be made to preserve the point.

(b)     This rule does not preclude the military judge from placing on the record matters concerning docketing of the case.

A.     *General application

1.     Mil.R.Evid. 605(a) is a simple statement of judicial incapacity. It categorically prohibits the military judge from serving as a witness while presiding at a court-martial.

2.     Taken without significant change from the Federal rule, Mil.R.Evid. 605(a) is related to Article 26(d), UCMJ, and continues prior military practice. As related in the drafters' analysis:

Although Article 26(d) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice states in relevant part that "no person is eligible to act as a military judge if he is a witness for the prosecution . . . " and is silent on whether a witness for the defense is eligible to sit, the Committee believes that the specific reference in the Code was not intended to create a right and was the result only of an attempt to highlight the more grievous case. In any event, Rule 605, unlike Article 26(d), does not deal with the question of eligibility to sit as a military judge, but deals solely with the military judge's competency as a witness. The rule does not affect voir dire.

3.     Automatic application. The rule provides an "automatic" objection.

To require an actual objection would confront the opponent with a choice between not objecting, with the result of allowing the testimony, and objecting, with the probable result of excluding the testimony but at the price of continuing the trial before a judge likely to feel that his or her integrity had been attacked by the objector. Thus, this is an exception to Mil.R.Evid. 103's general requirement of a timely and specific objection in order to preserve a claim.

B. Rationale. After noting that the likelihood of a judge testifying as a witness in a case over which the judge is presiding is slight, the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee offers the following rationale for the categorical prohibition in the rule.

The solution here presented is a broad rule of incompetency, rather than such alternatives as incompetency only as to material matters, leaving the matter to the discretion of the judge, or recognizing no incompetency. The choice is the result of inability to evolve satisfactory answers to questions which arise when the judge abandons the bench for the witness stand. Who rules on objections? Who compels him to answer? Can he rule impartially on the weight and admissibility of his own testimony? Can he be impeached or cross-examined effectively? Can he, in a jury trial, avoid conferring his seal of approval on one side in the eyes of the jury? Can he, in a bench trial, avoid an involvement destructive of impartiality? The rule of general incompetency has substantial support. See Report of the Special Committee on the Propriety of Judges Appearing as Witnesses, 36 A.B.A.J. 630 (1950); cases collected in Annot., 157 A.L.R. 311.

Fed.R.Evid. 605 Advisory Committee note.

It could be argued that Mil.R.Evid. 605 is not needed, as general due process considerations should prohibit the trial judge from testifying, thus siding with one party or the other. But the rule avoids any constitutional problem and any need for constitutional decision making.

C. Exceptions to the general prohibition. There are two situations that may arise in the court-martial process where the military judge is a witness or effectively a witness.

1. First, there is no incapacity with respect to a military judge testifying during subsequent proceedings which concern a trial over which he or she presided. This could occur with respect to limited rehearings ordered pursuant to United States v. DuBay, 17 C.M.A. 147, 37 C.M.R. 411 (1967), or United States v. Ray, 20 C.M.A. 331, 43 C.M.R. 171 (1971).

2. Second, a military judge could effectively become a witness by taking judicial notice of facts under Mil.R.Evid. 201. Counsel would not be able to cross-examine the bench with respect to the facts noticed as if the military judge were a witness, but the notice and opportunity to be heard provisions of Mil.R.Evid. 201 and its applicability to only well-known or reasonably unquestioned facts would appear to prevent the use of Mil.R.Evid. 201 to circumvent Mil.R.Evid. 605(a).

D. Docketing matters. Mil.R.Evid. 605(b) has no counterpart in the Federal Rules of Evidence. It was added because of the unique nature of the military judiciary in which military judges often control their own dockets without clerical assistance. In view of the military's stringent speedy trial rules, it was necessary to preclude expressly any interpretation of Mil.R.Evid. 605 that would prohibit the military judge from placing on the record details relating to docketing in order to avoid prejudice to a party. See United States v. Burris, 21 M.J. 140 (C.M.A. 1985) (chief trial judge of the circuit, who was originally scheduled to be the military judge in this case, should not have testified at the trial concerning defense allegations of delay).

0709            COMPETENCY OF COURT MEMBER AS WITNESS.
Mil.R.Evid. 606. (Key Numbers 882, 1125, 1275)

Rule 606. Competency of Court Members as Witnesses

(a) At the court-martial. A member of the court-martial may not testify as a witness before the other members in the trial of the case in which the member is sitting. If the member is called to testify, the opposing party, except in a special court-martial without a military judge, shall be afforded an opportunity to object out of the presence of the members.

(b) Inquiry into validity of findings or sentence. Upon an inquiry into the validity of the findings or sentence, a member may not testify as to any matter or statement occurring during the course of the deliberations of the members of the court-martial or to the effect of anything upon the member's or any other member's mind or emotions as influencing the member to assent to or dissent from the findings or sentence or concerning the member's mental process in connection therewith, except that a member may testify on the question whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the attention of the members of the court-martial, whether any outside influence was improperly brought to bear upon any member, or whether there was unlawful command influence. Nor may the member's affidavit or evidence of any statement by the member concerning a matter about which the member would be precluded from testifying be received for these purposes.

A. Rationale. The considerations that bear upon the permissibility of testimony by a military judge of the court-martial in which he or she is sitting have an obvious similarity to the problems evoked when a court member is called as a witness. By prohibiting all triers of fact from testifying, the drafters recognized that it is not possible for court members to sit as neutral arbiters and to evaluate, without bias, their own testimony. Other pragmatic considerations also support the rule. Counsel will generally desire to talk with a witness just prior to direct examination. This could not be accomplished if the witness is also a court member. More importantly, how aggressive could opposing counsel be in cross-examining or impeaching a witness if that same witness must later sit in judgment of counsel's case?

The Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee offers the following explanation:

The familiar rubric that a juror may not impeach his own verdict, dating from Lord Mansfield's time, is a gross oversimplification. The values sought to be promoted by excluding the evidence include freedom of deliberation, stability and finality of verdicts, and protection of jurors against annoyance and embarrassment. McDonald v. Pless, 238 U.S. 264, 35 S.Ct. 785, 59 L.Ed. 1300 (1915). On the other hand, simply putting verdicts beyond effective reach can only promote irregularity and injustice. The rule offers an accommodation between these competing considerations.

Fed.R.Evid. 606(b) Advisory Committee Vote.

B. Competency of members at trial

1. Mil.R.Evid. 606(a) is taken from the Fed.R.Evid. without substantive change. This rule deals only with the competency of court members as witnesses and does not affect other Manual for Courts-Martial provisions governing the eligibility of individuals to sit as members due to their potential status as witnesses. The rule does not affect voir dire.

2. Unlike Mil.R.Evid. 605(a), Mil.R.Evid. 606(a) is not one of strict incompetence, as its second sentence indicates that opposing counsel must object to such conduct in order to preserve any possible error for appeal.

3. Mil.R.Evid. 606(a) should rarely come into operation if counsel thoroughly prepare their cases and conduct a thorough voir dire of the prospective court members, inquiring into their personal knowledge of the case and their association with any potential witnesses.

4. The Military Rules of Evidence Manual raises the problem of what happens when the member becomes a potential witness during the trial.

While 606(a) mandates that counsel not plan on using court-members during their case-in-chief, it does not address what should be done when it is determined during trial that a court-member may have relevant testimony to offer. This event is more likely to occur in military than in federal practice, because many military communities are small and closely knit. The problem envisioned here could easily arise as follows: During trial the government learns that an unanticipated witness must be called. In response, defense counsel discovers that a court-member is the sole source of valuable impeachment evidence concerning that witness. However, Rule 606(a) will not permit the court-member to testify over a timely government objection. This result raises problems of constitutional magnitude, as the accused's ability to present his defense is severely limited.

In this situation, it is doubtful that the trial judge could allow the court-member to testify for the very reasons that give rise to Rule 606(a). Hence, trial counsel will insist upon a mistrial as the only appropriate remedy. It is unlikely that the judge can save the case by excusing the testifying court member, even if sufficient members are left to constitute a quorum. Government counsel still would feel that any attempt to impeach the court-member or to vigorously cross-examine him would prejudice his case in the remaining members' eyes.

Stephen A. Saltzburg, et. al, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 632 (3rd. ed. 1991).

C. Inquiry into validity of findings or sentence

1. The mental operations and emotional reactions of jurors in arriving at a given result would, if allowed as a subject of inquiry, place every verdict at the mercy of jurors and invite tampering and harassment. The authorities are virtually in complete accord in excluding evidence of courtroom deliberations. W. Fryer, Note on Disqualification of Witnesses, Selected Writings on Evidence and Trial 345, 347 (Fryer ed. 1957); 8 Wigmore

Evidence § 2349 (McNaughton Rev. 1961).

2. Prohibited matters. Subdivision (b) initially prohibits members from testifying about their or any other member's: (1) actual deliberations, (2) impressions, (3) emotional feelings, or (4) mental processes used to resolve an issue at bar. See United States v. Brooks, 42 M.J. 484 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (inquiry into member's voting process and, thus, any evidence obtained by inquiry was incompetent and could not form basis of ruling that set aside members' verdict); See also United States v. Boland, 22 M.J. 886 (A.C.M.R. 1986) (military judge should not have ordered post-trial voir dire of members because of their alleged failure to follow sentence instruction). Distinguish United States v. Washington, 23 M.J. 679 (A.C.M.R. 1986) from Boland, where the guidance of R.C.M. 1102 and United States v. Brickey, 16 M.J. 258 (C.M.A. 1983) was relied upon by the military judge in convening a "post-trial session" to dispose of a claim of error. Accord United States v. Scaff, 29 M.J. 60 (C.M.A. 1989). See also United States v. Gonzalez, 42 M.J. 373 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (where court held that Mil.R.Evid. 606(b) covers post-trial inquiries into the basis of a sentence adjudged by the MJ, as well as one imposed by members). The rule also states that, if the court members cannot testify, then their affidavits or similar documentary statements will not be admissible. See United States v. Thomas, 39 M.J. 626 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993), where Mil.R.Evid. 606(b) was used to reject a court member's affidavit alleging improper balloting techniques. See Mil.R.Evid. 509 for the related privilege as to court's deliberations.

3. Permitted inquiry. Mil.R.Evid. 606(b) allows court members to testify if the possibility exists of: (1) extra-record prejudicial information being brought to their attention, (2) outside influence being exerted upon them, or (3) command control being used to guide the proceedings' outcome. This aspect of subdivision (b) is virtually identical with its Federal counterpart, except that the drafters added a specific provision addressing command influence. The addition is required by the need to keep proceedings free from any taint of unlawful command influence and further implements Article 37(a) of the Uniform Code of Military Justice. Use of superior rank or grade by one member of a court to sway other members would constitute unlawful command influence for purposes of this rule. United States v. Accordino, 20 M.J. 102 (C.M.A. 1985). Mil.R.Evid. 606 does not itself prevent otherwise lawful polling of members of the court and does not prohibit attempted lawful clarification of an ambiguous or inconsistent verdict. Rule for Courts-Martial 922(e), however, states that polling is prohibited except as authorized under Mil.R.Evid. 606. The following military cases indicate the permissible application of Mil.R.Evid. 606.

a. In United States v. Bishop, 11 M.J. 7 (C.M.A. 1981), the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces relied specifically upon Mil.R.Evid. 606(b) in discussing when post-trial affidavits should be considered in determining whether the court members were improperly affected by "extraneous prejudicial information." In this case, the initial defense affidavit contended that certain court members had deliberately viewed the crime scene in order to determine which witnesses were testifying truthfully. In response, the government submitted additional affidavits stating that the members in question had not deliberately viewed the area, but were familiar with it "because their homes were nearby and they passed through the neighborhood." In affirming the conviction, the court found that "a fair reading of the affidavits before us does not show that the personal familiarity of the members had any effect whatsoever on their deliberations or decision in this case." Id. at 10. United States v. Johnson, 23 M.J. 327 (C.M.A. 1987); United States v. Ezell, 24 M.J. 690 (A.C.M.R. 1987); United States v. Hargrove, 25 M.J. 68 (C.M.A. 1987), cert. denied, 488 U.S. 826 (1988); United States v. Stone, 26 M.J. 401 (C.M.A. 1988); United States v. Combs, 41 M.J. 400 (C.A.A.F. 1995). In United States v. Strait, 42 M.J. 244 (C.A.A.F. 1995), the Court distinguished between evidence of information acquired by a member during deliberations from a third party or from outside reference material as extrinsic prejudicial information from that which is general or common knowledge that a member brings to deliberations which is an intrinsic part of the deliberation process.

b. See also United States v. Martinez, 17 M.J. 916 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984) (the scope of the permitted inquiry into the possibility that superior rank improperly influenced court-martial deliberations is strictly limited to a member's testimony as to objective facts bearing upon the issue, and testimony as to a member's subjective thoughts, impressions, motivations or emotions is prohibited); accord United States v. Loving, 41 M.J. 213, 237-38 (1994); United States v. Thomas, 39 M.J. 626, 632-36 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993); United States v. Carr, 18 M.J. 297 (C.M.A. 1984) (in view of extrinsic evidence of misconduct during deliberations and receipt of unsigned typewritten letter from member indicating that other members had been subjected to undue pressure from president to reach guilty verdict, military judge should have held post-trial article 39(a) session to investigate allegations).

D. Summary. The balance between the prohibition rule of subsection (a) and the permitted inquiry rule of subsection (b) is informatively summed up by the Military Rules of Evidence Manual:

By allowing court-members to testify under some circumstances, and not others, subdivision (b) represents the military drafters' adoption of a congressional compromise. The balance is struck between the necessity for accurately resolving criminal trials in accordance with rules of law on the one hand, and the desirability of promoting finality in litigation and of protecting members from harassment and second-guessing on the other hand. The result permits court-members to testify with respect to objective manifestations of impropriety—e.g., that inadmissible evidence was placed in their deliberation room, see United States v. Pinto, 486 F. Supp. 578 (E.D. Pa. 1980)—but prohibits their testimony if the alleged transgression is subjective in nature—e.g., allegations that the court members ignored the trial judge's instructions and convicted the accused because he failed to take the stand in his own defense, see United States v. Edwards, 486 F. Supp. 673 (S.D.N.Y.) [aff'd, 631 F.2d 1049 (2d Cir. 1980)]. Military and federal litigation demonstrates that 606(b) will prevent counsel from examining court-members to determine whether they followed the bench's instructions, violated their juror oaths, or were emotionally influenced by some event at trial. See United States v. Greer, 620 F.2d 1382 (10th Cir. 1980). See also Weinstein and Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, 631-634, for other examples of subjective and objective criteria.

0710 FINAL COMMENTS. Relevancy, as discussed in chapter V, is the factor of greatest importance to determine the admissibility of a witness' testimony in the usual court-martial. However, the question of whether a witness is competent, both generally and specifically, remains a vital consideration in determining the admissibility of the witness' testimony. The Military Rules of Evidence dealing with witness competency are simply stated, perhaps deceptively so. Yet counsel should never be lulled into forgetting their importance. Counsel must also remember that many of the common law competency considerations are now treated as questions of witness credibility. Credibility is discussed in the next part of this chapter.

PART TWO: CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES

0711 INTRODUCTION (Key Numbers 1141 - 1150). The concepts of competency and authenticity as they apply to witnesses were discussed in part one of this chapter, and the concept of relevancy was considered in chapter V. Thus, the admissibility formula (AE=ARC) has been discussed. It will now be assumed that a witness is about to testify. Now, the question for counsel is whether the military judge or court members will believe the witness' testimony. This aspect of witness believability, or credibility, is probably the most frequent question to be resolved at the trial level, although the reported cases may seem to indicate otherwise. To put it simply, the outcome of a trial very often depends solely upon the fact-finder's evaluation of the credibility of the witnesses testifying for either side.

A. Credibility. Credibility may be defined as a witness' "worthiness of belief." Determining a witness' credibility is a subjective judgment on the part of the military judge or court members and any number of factors may influence the determination.

Although the credibility of a witness is subject to an ad hoc determination, there are well-recognized rules to be applied by counsel in presenting evidence on witness credibility to a court-martial. This part of the chapter will examine these rules, but first it is helpful to consider the general concepts of how credibility is placed in issue and the three stages into which the credibility discussion may be broken.

B. Placing credibility in issue. The credibility of a witness, whether an ordinary witness or the accused, is immediately in issue once the witness is sworn and testifies. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(b) and 608(a). A witness' credibility, including that of the accused, is always a proper subject of inquiry on cross-examination. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(b); Alford v. United States, 282 U.S. 687 (1931). There may be limits placed on an examination into a witness' credibility, however. See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 608(b), which provides that "the giving of testimony, whether by an accused or by another witness, does not operate as a waiver of the privilege against self-incrimination when examined with respect to matters which relate only to credibility."

C. Stages in credibility determination. Three basic stages may be examined when discussing the credibility of competent witnesses. Each of these stages will be examined in a separate section, infra.

1. First, bolstering a witness' credibility before it has been attacked is normally impermissible. Mil.R.Evid. 608(a)(2). In some instances, however, the party calling a witness will be permitted to present evidence to enhance a witness' credibility before the opponent attacked it or even before the opponent had an opportunity to attack. See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 321(a)(1) (prior eyewitness identification). In United States v. Maniego, 710 F.2d

24 (2d Cir. 1983), it was held that the prosecutor could enhance the credibility of government witnesses, even absent an attack on their credibility, during the presentation of evidence since the defense in its opening statement opined that the prosecution's witnesses were all liars. In United States v. Henderson, 717 F.2d 135 (4th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1001 (1984), the Court of Appeals held that it was permissible to elicit on direct examination of a witness that he was promised a plea bargain if he testified truthfully and that such testimony was not impermissible bolstering because the government was not implying or admitting that had it specialized knowledge of the witness' veracity. But see United States v. Brown, 720 F.2d 1059 (9th Cir. 1983), where, in addition to testifying that he would receive a plea bargain if he testified truthfully, the witness further testified that he would submit to a polygraph as part of the deal. The Court of Appeals indicated that it disliked the practice of reinforcing the credibility of a witness (bolstering) and held that the government may not strengthen its "courtroom hand" by communicating to a jury that it has ways and means by which it can know its case is true.

2. Second, a witness may be impeached. Impeachment is the generic term for the process of attempting to diminish a witness' credibility in the eyes of the trier of fact. The process involves adducing proof that a witness is unworthy of belief. When a witness is impeached, the witness is not removed from the witness stand nor is counsel allowed to move to strike the witness' testimony on grounds that the witness has been impeached (although novice counsel may try this). The result of impeachment is that the trier of fact may consider the impeachment when weighing the credibility of the witness. Counsel may argue the effect of impeachment in closing argument. Impeachment can be divided into two general classes, intrinsic impeachment and extrinsic impeachment, although there is no difference in their uses.

a. Intrinsic impeachment is impeachment demonstrated during the testimony of the witness being impeached, whether by contradictory or self-effacing answers or otherwise in reply to proper questioning.

b. Extrinsic impeachment involves calling a witness other than the witness being impeached or otherwise presenting evidence to diminish the prior witness' credibility.

3. Third, a witness may be rehabilitated. During this stage, a party seeks to increase the witness' credibility in the eyes of the trier of fact after the other party has attempted impeachment.

D. Limited purpose. Evidence presented on the credibility issue must be considered upon request by counsel for the limited purpose for which it is offered, with an accompanying limiting instruction under Mil.R.Evid. 105. See, Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) ("for the purpose of attacking or supporting the credibility of the witness"); 609(a) ("for the purpose of attacking the credibility of a witness"); and 610 ("for the purpose of showing that . . . the credibility of the witness is impaired or enhanced").

It is possible, however, for evidence to be used not only for impeachment, but also as substantive evidence. The most common situation deals with inconsistent statements. These may be used for the purpose of impeachment under Mil.R.Evid. 613, as discussed infra, but they may also be used substantively under Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(A) provided that certain conditions are met. Mil.R.Evid. 801 is discussed in chapter VIII. See also United States v. Jackson, 12 M.J. 163 (C.M.A. 1981). The lesson to be learned is for counsel to be aware of the purpose for which the evidence is being offered—does it affect credibility only, or is it substantive evidence?

E. Scope of part two. Unlike the other parts of this chapter, this part will not follow a rule-by-rule approach in analyzing the area of witness credibility. Although Mil.R.Evid. 607-610 and 613 are the primary Military Rules of Evidence on witness credibility, it is more beneficial to adopt a functional approach to this issue since the Military Rules of Evidence are not exhaustive and a number of different types of techniques of impeachment are not explicitly codified.

The failure to so codify them does not mean that they are no longer permissible. See, e.g., United States v. Alvarez-Lopez, 559 F.2d 1155 (9th Cir. 1977) (Rule 412). Thus, impeachment by contradiction, . . . and impeachment via prior inconsistent statements, Rule 613, remain appropriate. To the extent that the military rules do not acknowledge a particular form of impeachment, it is the intent of the Committee to allow that method to the same extent it is permissible in the Article III courts. See, e.g., Rules 402; 403.

0712 BOLSTERING THE WITNESS BEFORE IMPEACHMENT (Key Numbers 1141, 1143, 1145)

A. General. The provisions of the Mil.R.Evid. do not specifically preclude counsel from bolstering the credibility of a witness before the witness is impeached. Mil.R.Evid. 608(a), however, does address the specialized situation of the use of evidence of truthful character to bolster a witness' credibility by providing that such evidence is "admissible only after the character of the witness for truthfulness has been attacked by opinion or reputation evidence or otherwise." Mil.R.Evid. 101 does state, however, that the "rules of evidence generally recognized in the trial of criminal cases in the United States district courts" and the common law rules of evidence will be applicable in courts-martial

"insofar as practicable" and provided they are not "inconsistent with or contrary to" the Uniform Code of Military Justice or the Manual for Courts-Martial. Thus, the standard Federal practice and the prior military practice of not generally allowing bolstering will still be followed. See, e.g., United States v. Mack, 643 F.2d 1119 (5th Cir. 1981). Likewise, the three common exceptions to this general rule are still applicable.

1. Corroboration. The witness' testimony still may be corroborated before his overall credibility is impeached. See generally E. Imwinkelried, P. Giannelli, F. Gilligan, and F. Lederer, Criminal Evidence 43-44 (1979). This is done by presenting evidence consistent with the testimony of the original witness.

2. Fresh complaint. Although the rules do not specifically recognize the "fresh complaint" exception, three rules should enable the admission of extrajudicial statements from victims of nonconsensual sex crimes. Thus, a "statement relating to a startling event or condition made while the declarant was under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition" is admissible as an exception to the proscription of hearsay under Mil.R.Evid. 803(2). No extrinsic evidence of the startling event or condition need be proffered; this prerequisite may be established by the declarant. If the defense alleges recent fabrication of, or improper motivation by, the victim, evidence of the circumstances surrounding the alleged crime are admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(B). Finally, Mil.R.Evid. 803(3) recognizes the admissibility of a "statement of the declarant's then existing state of mind, emotion, sensation, or physical condition [such as . . . mental feeling, pain and bodily health]" even though the declarant is available. Mil.R.Evid. 803(3).

3. Pretrial identification. The pretrial identification exception is preserved in Mil.R.Evid. 321(a)(1) and 801(d)(1)(C). Mil.R.Evid. 321(a)(1) codifies the decision in United States v. Burger, 1 M.J. 408 (C.M.A. 1976), and is especially important if the identifying witness is senile, has been intimidated, or is unavailable for trial as it provides that any person who observed the original identification may testify concerning it.

B. Additional consideration. Witnesses may testify before their credibility is attacked that they must testify truthfully to preserve a plea bargain or grant of immunity. See, e.g., United States v. Maniego, 710 F.2d 24 (2d Cir. 1983), and United States v. Henderson, 717 F.2d 135 (4th Cir. 1983), cert. denied, 465 U.S. 1001 (1984). If, however, the testimony goes beyond this, and the party calling the witness attempts to show that it possesses special knowledge of the witness' veracity, impermissible bolstering has occurred. See, e.g., United States v. Brown, 720 F.2d 1059 (9th Cir. 1983).

0713 IMPEACHMENT (Key Number 1143)

A. Who may impeach. Mil.R.Evid. 607. Mil.R. Evid. 607 allows a party to impeach his or her own witness. Mil.R.Evid. 607 broadly states that "the credibility of a witness may be attacked by any party, including the party calling the witness." Mil.R.Evid. 607 responds to the reality that "in modern criminal trials, defendants are rarely able to select their witnesses: they must take them where they find them." See Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973). See also United States v. Johnson, 3 M.J. 143 (C.M.A. 1977). Without mentioning Mil.R.Evid. 607, the Court of Military Appeals has specifically rejected the common law rule that counsel "vouch" for their witness' credibility, calling that rule "a vestigial 'remnant of primitive English trial practice.'" United States v. Perner, 14 M.J. 181, 183 n.2 (C.M.A. 1982).

The remaining paragraphs under this "impeachment" topic will deal with the various methods of impeachment normally allowed and used in court-martial practice.

1. General. The most common method of impeachment is not to keep the witness off the witness stand, but to attack the basis of the witness' competency and thus diminish the weight to be given to the testimony. This is normally done on cross-examination, but it may be done by extrinsic evidence. Although counsel often forget this method of impeachment since it is not specifically stated in the Mil.R.Evid., it is a permissible method and one generally recognized in Article III courts and as part of the military common law. See E. Imwinkelried, P. Giannelli, F. Gilligan, and F. Lederer, Criminal Evidence 50-51 (1979).

2. Common sense factors. In considering how to diminish a witness' credibility by attacking the basis for the witness' competency or by pointing out deficiencies in that basis, counsel must remember that there are no hard and fast standards. This is an area of broad judicial discretion controlled by general relevancy considerations under rules 401-403 and by the language of Mil.R.Evid. 104(e) on "evidence relevant to weight or credibility." Counsel may want to exploit such witness weaknesses as mental impairments.

3. Perception. Any number of factors can bear on a witness' perception, such as how the information was obtained; sensory defects as to sight, hearing, and smell; physical and emotional conditions—such as darkness, fright, and excitement—under which information was obtained; and the witness' ability to comprehend and remember the facts accurately.

4. Religious beliefs or opinions. An area of potential inquiry, especially as to the ability to understand or abide by an oath or affirmation under Mil.R.Evid. 603, would be a witness' religious beliefs. Mil.R.Evid. 610 expressly addresses this area by precluding any evidence of the beliefs or opinions of a witness for the purpose of showing that the witness' credibility is enhanced or diminished thereby. Such beliefs, however, may be relevant (and hence admissible) on some other grounds (e.g., to show that the witness has an interest in the case).

C. Evidence of character for truthfulness. Mil.R.Evid. 608(a). As has previously been noted, once a witness (including the accused) testifies, his or her credibility becomes an issue in the case. One aspect of having witnesses' credibility in issue is that evidence of their character is then relevant. See Mil.R.Evid. 404(a) and the discussion of character evidence in chapter V, part two, of this study guide. Mil.R.Evid. 608(a) limits the relevance of a witness' character to only one trait: truthfulness, and its converse, untruthfulness. (For our discussion, the term truthfulness is considered to include its converse.) Evidence of neither general character (good or bad) nor some other specific character trait of the witness is permissible proof of credibility. See, e.g., United States v. Blanchard, 11 M.J. 268 (C.M.A. 1981) (evidence of poor performance is not proper rebuttal of credibility evidence). See also Mil.R.Evid. 404(a); Mil.R.Evid. 608(a) drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-42; chapter V, part two of this study guide.

1. Initiating the attack. Under Mil.R.Evid. 608(a), a witness' character for truthfulness must be attacked as being bad before it may be rehabilitated. Thus, the rule does not allow bolstering. The initial attack need not be in the form of character evidence because Mil.R.Evid. 608(a) provides for a witness' character for truthfulness to be attacked "otherwise." Thus, the initial attack on a witness' character for truthfulness may be made by cross-examination. See United States v. Harvey, 12 M.J. 501 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981), aff'd, 14 M.J. 129 (C.M.A. 1983) (defense counsel's exhaustive cross-examination of a key government witness, characterized by trial defense counsel as total and complete destruction, was held sufficient to justify trial counsel calling a witness to testify on character for purposes of rehabilitating the original government witness); United States v. Everage, 19 M.J. 189 (C.M.A. 1985) (when the tenor of cross-examination can be characterized as an attack on the witness' veracity, evidence of truthful character may be offered to rehabilitate the witness).

It may be argued that United States v. Allard, 19 M.J. 346 (C.M.A. 1985), and United States v. Woods, 19 M.J. 349 (C.M.A. 1985), effectively support the proposition that the defense may always introduce evidence of the accused's good character for truthfulness if the accused testifies on the merits, since the trier of fact must decide whether to believe the government's evidence which shows that the accused's denial of guilt is untruthful. Further support for this proposition may be found in United States v. Varela, 25 M.J. 29 (C.M.A. 1987), where the court held that, in a prosecution for cocaine use, the accused was entitled to present evidence of his character for truthfulness after the trial counsel conducted a "somewhat limited" cross-examination of the accused implying that he would have to return his $16,000 reenlistment bonus if convicted.

2. Relevancy of character. The admissibility of testimony on this character trait for truthfulness still depends upon its relevancy. See Mil.R.Evid. 401 and 403. Therefore, when it comes to the character for truthfulness of a witness, we are interested in the witness' credibility at the time of trial. Generally, evidence of a witness' truthful character at some remote point in time should be excluded under Mil.R.Evid. 401 or 403; but this is another question that falls within the broad discretionary authority given military judges by the Military Rules of Evidence.

3. Proof of character. Mil.R.Evid. 608 speaks in terms of "evidence of opinion or reputation." It does not specifically refer to Mil.R.Evid. 405, which sets forth a complete treatment of the permissible methods of proving character. A fair reading of the Rules would indicate that the definitions of Mil.R.Evid. 405(d) as to "reputation" and "community" should be read into Mil.R.Evid. 608. Less clear is whether the Mil.R.Evid. 405(c) provision for affidavits is applicable under Mil.R.Evid. 608. The Military Rules of Evidence Manual argues for such a reading, but the courts have yet to resolve the issue. Stephen A. Saltzburg, et. al, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 645 (3rd ed. 1991). Until the issue of the use of affidavits is resolved, actually calling witnesses to testify as to another witness' character for truthfulness will continue to be the norm.

In any event, for such testimony to be admissible, the proponent must demonstrate that the witness has such acquaintance or relationship with the person so as to qualify the witness to form a reliable opinion. See, e.g., United States v. Perner, 14 M.J. 181 (C.M.A. 1982) (holding that a psychiatric technician's three encounters with the witness did not provide a sufficient basis for him to form a reliable opinion as to her character for truth and veracity). And, in United States v. Williams, 26 M.J. 487 (C.M.A. 1988), the court found reversible error where a government witness testified as to the accused's allegedly poor character for truthfulness where the witness' only contact with the accused consisted of observing him for some 90 minutes during an interview. Similarly, it was held to be proper for the military judge to exclude testimony from a defense witness as to the accused's allegedly good character for truthfulness where the defense witness had only met with the accused four of five times for marital counseling sessions and spoken to him a couple of times on the telephone. United States v. Jenkins, 27 M.J. 209 (C.M.A. 1988).

a. Laying the foundation for reputation evidence

– It must be shown that the witness who testifies about the first witness' reputation:

(a) Is a member of the same community as the witness to be impeached or rehabilitated; and

(b) is acquainted with the witness' reputation for truthfulness in that community.

"Community" in the military includes ship, station, unit, camp, or organization. Mil.R.Evid. 405(d). Remember that a witness may have a reputation in both civilian and military communities. See United States v. Reveles, 41 M.J. 388 (C.A.A.F. 1995); United States v. Breeding, 44 M.J. 345 (C.A.A.F. 1996).

b. Laying the foundation for opinion evidence

(1) It must be shown that the witness who testifies to his or her opinion of the first witness' truthfulness:

(a) Is personally acquainted with the witness to be impeached or rehabilitated; and

(b) is acquainted with the first witness well enough to have had an opportunity to form a reliable opinion of his or her trait for truthfulness.

(2) Although the Mil.R.Evid. do not specifically address the issue, it would seem to be permissible to continue the traditional military practice of asking the character witness who is giving an opinion, "Would you believe the witness under oath?" This was specifically allowed by MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 153(b)(1), and is a relevant method for "testing" the opinion of the testifying witness. United States v. Fields, 3 M.J. 27 (C.M.A. 1977).

4. Limitation with the accused. When the accused makes an unsworn statement, the prosecution is not allowed to introduce evidence as to the accused's character trait for untruthfulness. United States v. Cleveland, 29 M.J. 361 (C.M.A. 1990). Opinion and reputation evidence attacking an accused's credibility following an unsworn statement in which no claim of truth and veracity is asserted is impermissible. United States v. Williams, 23 M.J. 582 (N.M.C.M.R. 1986). This prohibition is based on the balance struck between the accused's right to make an unsworn statement and the government's weapon of impeachment. The only mechanism possessed by the government to protect the court-martial from a lying accused is the power to rebut the factual content of the accused's statement.

5. Testing the character witness. Mil.R.Evid. 608(b)(2) provides that a character witness can be asked questions about specific acts of the person whose credibility has been attacked or rehabilitated as a means of "testing" the character witness. This is parallel to the inquiry into specific acts of conduct permitted under Mil.R.Evid. 405(c) and discussed in chapter V, part two. It should be noted that the cross-examination must relate to the specific character trait of truthfulness, and the examiner must have a good faith basis for any questions that are asked. Also, as with inquiry or cross-examination under Mil.R.Evid. 405(a), the examiner is not allowed to offer extrinsic evidence to prove the acts, unless the acts are otherwise admissible (e.g., under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b), as reflecting upon motive, intent, plan, etc.). See Mil.R.Evid. 405 discussion in chapter V. Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) will be discussed further in subsection E of this part.

D. Prior convictions. Mil.R.Evid. 609. (Key Number 1146)

1. General. The third method of impeachment is to introduce evidence that a witness, including the accused, has been convicted of a crime by either a military or civilian court. The rationale for admitting this evidence is that convictions are relevant to credibility because they demonstrate that the witness has violated the law and witnesses who have violated the law are more likely to lie than witnesses who have not violated the law.

An obvious problem occurs with this rationale when an accused testifies as a witness and is impeached with a prior conviction. Court members might use the evidence of a prior conviction not only as evidence that the accused may be less credible, but also as evidence that the accused is a bad person who is more likely to have committed the charged offense. Accordingly, Mil.R.Evid. 609(a) draws a distinction between using a prior conviction to impeach the accused and using a prior conviction to impeach other witnesses. For a witness other than the accused, a Mil.R.Evid. 403 balancing test determines whether the evidence is too prejudicial to be admitted. Thus, a prior conviction would be excluded only if the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweighs the prior conviction's probative value. When the accused is a witness, however, the prior conviction will be admitted only if "the military judge determines that the probative value of admitting [the prior conviction] outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused." See United States v. Ross, 44 M.J. 534 (A.F.C.C.A. 1996). When a military judge does admit a prior conviction of the accused, the defense counsel should consider requesting a limiting instruction under Mil.R.Evid. 105.

In order to better understand Mil.R.Evid. 609 and its use for impeaching a witness, the topic of impeachment by conviction of crime has been divided into the following four subtopics: (1) for what types of crimes is the Rule applicable; (2) what constitutes a conviction of such a crime; (3) how recent must the conviction be; and (4) how can the conviction be proved.

2. Types of crime

a. Non crimen falsi convictions. Subdivision (a)(1) of the rule makes convictions for offenses punishable by death, dishonorable discharge, or imprisonment in excess of one year under the law of the prosecuting jurisdiction eligible for admission. With respect to previous military convictions, the rule specifically provides that the maximum punishment is to be determined by reference to the Manual for Courts-Martial's maximum punishments provisions. As a result, the level of court-martial adjudging a conviction is not relevant in determining whether the crime for which the witness was convicted falls under this rule. Only the maximum possible punishment listed for the offense in the MCM, 1984, will affect admissibility under subsection (a)(1).

(1) Not automatic. Subdivision (a)(1) contains two distinct balancing tests. As the greatest risk of unfair prejudice to the defense arises when the accused is impeached with a prior conviction, a military judge must determine that the probative value of admitting a prior conviction outweighs its prejudicial effect to the accused.

Ruling on the impeachment of all other witnesses will be governed by the general balancing test of Rule 403. Under Mil.R.Evid. 403, relevant evidence will be excluded if the probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice.

(2) The balance to be drawn. In determining probative value and prejudice, Federal courts have considered the following factors: (1) impeachment value of the prior conviction; (2) proximity in time and the witness' subsequent history; (3) similarity between the past crime and the charged crime; (4) importance of the testimony of the witness; and (5) centrality of the credibility issue. See, e.g., Gordon v. United States, 383 F.2d 936 (D.C. Cir. 1967), cert. denied, 390 U.S. 1029 (1968). Clearly, however, the military judge has enormous discretion in balancing the scales. In a prosecution for sale of marijuana, for example, the military judge did not abuse his discretion in permitting the trial counsel to impeach the accused's credibility by offering a 4-year-old special court-martial conviction for a 3-month unauthorized absence. United States v. Brenizer, 20 M.J. 78 (C.M.A. 1985).

(3) Judge's determination. Mil.R.Evid. 609(a)(1) does not require the military judge to make any special findings when applying the balancing test, nor does it require the military judge to rule on the admissibility of an accused's prior conviction before the accused takes the stand. In United States v. Cofield, 11 M.J. 422 (C.M.A. 1981), the court recognized that, when an accused desires to testify in his or her own defense, resolution of the question whether the probative value of the prior conviction will outweigh its prejudicial effect is extremely important and that defense counsel may seek a pretrial resolution by using a motion in limine. The court generally encouraged in limine resolutions, but recognized the problems of drawing a proper balance without knowing all of the facts in a case. See also United States v. Gamble, 27 M.J. 298 (C.M.A. 1988). It should also be noted, however, that the U.S. Supreme Court has held that, if the trial judge upholds the admissibility of a prior conviction of the accused, and the accused thereupon elects not to testify, the accused has waived any error in the judge's ruling for appellate purposes. Luce v. United States, 469 U.S. 38 (1984).

b. Crimen falsi convictions. Subdivision (a)(2) of Mil.R.Evid. 609 makes admissible convictions involving "dishonesty or false statement, regardless of punishment." The exact meaning of "dishonesty" is unclear and has been the subject of substantial litigation. It has been held, for example, that shoplifting is not a crime of falsehood for purposes of this rule. United States v. Huettenrauch, 16 M.J. 638 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983). See also United States v. Jefferson, 23 M.J. 517 (A.F.C.M.R. 1986) (shoplifting not crimen falsi); United States v. Frazier, 14 M.J. 773 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (drug offense and grand larceny not crimen falsi); United States v. Hayes, 553 F.2d 824 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 867 (1977) (smuggling could be crimen falsi if involving, for example, false statement on customs form, but not if merely involving stealth and secrecy). The drafters' analysis noted this lack of clarity and added that "pending further case development in the Article III courts, caution would suggest close adherence to [a] highly limited definition." Mil.R.Evid. 609 drafters' analysis. That "highly limited definition" to be considered until further case development in military courts is succinctly stated in the Congressional Conference Committee Report regarding the Federal Rules of Evidence:

By the phrase "dishonesty and false statement" the Conference means crimes such as perjury or subornation of perjury, false statement, criminal fraud, embezzlement, or false pretense, or any other offense in the nature of crimen falsi, the commission of which involves some element of deceit, untruthfulness, or falsification bearing on the accused's propensity to testify truthfully.

H.R. Rep. 1597, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 9, reprinted in 20 Sup. Ct. Dig. at 231.

For these crimen falsi convictions, under subdivision (a)(2), the balancing test of probative value versus prejudice to the accused is not applicable. Without (a)(1)'s balancing, all crimen falsi convictions may be admissible against any witness, absent problems of military due process and fundamental fairness or timeliness problems under Mil.R.Evid. 609(b). Most courts perceive such evidence as being automatically admissible, leaving no discretion to the military judge to conduct a balancing. See, e.g., United States v. Coates, 652 F.2d 1002 (D.C. Cir. 1981); United States v. Wong, 703 F.2d 65 (3rd Cir.), cert. denied, 464 U.S. 842 (1983). Whether the different balancing test of Mil.R.Evid. 403 may be applied to exclude crimen falsi convictions is an open question. See 3 Jack B. Weinstein & Margaret A. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence ¶ 609-[04] (1994). The Congressional Conference Committee Report on Fed.R.Evid. 609 states:

The admission of prior convictions involving dishonesty and false statements is not within the discretion of the court. Such convictions are peculiarly probative of credibility and, under this rule, are always to be admitted. Thus, judicial discretion granted with respect to the admissibility of other prior convictions is not applicable to those involving dishonesty or false statement.

H. Rep. 1597, 93d Cong., 2d Sess., reprinted in 20 Sup. Ct. Dig. at 231. See also United States v. Toney, 615 F.2d 277 (5th Cir. 1980).

If a conviction qualifies under (a)(2) as well as under (a)(1), then the limitation of the latter should be ignored. A substantial gray area exists with respect to offenses which are not crimen falsi per se, but which may actually have involved dishonesty or a false statement. Counsel relying on a conviction not plainly within (a)(2) should be permitted to demonstrate the conviction's crimen falsi characteristics by proving that the offense was committed through false statements or dishonesty. See United States v. Hayes, 553 F.2d 824 (2d cir.), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 867 (1977). A crime of larceny may not be a crimen falsi offense if the thief committed the crime by shoplifting, but a crime of larceny committed through trick or deception would be crimen falsi in nature.

3. Conviction

a. A court-martial conviction occurs when the sentence is adjudged. Mil.R.Evid. 609(f). United States v. Stafford, 15 M.J. 866 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 17 M.J. 22 (C.M.A. 1983), held that a civilian conviction occurs when findings are announced. An arrest, indictment, information, or record of nonjudicial punishment may not be used as a prior conviction.

b. Finality. There is no requirement that a conviction be final, except for convictions from a summary court-martial or a special court-martial conducted without a military judge. Mil.R.Evid. 609(e) provides that a conviction by either of these two forums is inadmissible until review has been completed pursuant to Article 64 or Article 66, UCMJ. It should be noted that the rule's reference to article 66 appears clearly to be a drafting error. Presumably it was the intent of the drafters to refer to appeals under article 69, not article 66. For general courts-martial and special courts-martial with a military judge, a court-martial is a "conviction" as soon as sentence is adjudged. See Mil.R.Evid. 609(f). The fact that an appeal is pending is admissible as bearing upon the weight to be given to the impeachment. See Mil.R.Evid. 609(e). There is even the possibility of a judicially created exception to Mil.R.Evid. 609(e) that would render a conviction inadmissible if the prior conviction is being appealed on Sixth Amendment grounds. See Spiegel v. Sanstrom, 637 F.2d 405 (5th Cir. 1981).

c. Summary courts-martial. Under what circumstances may a previous conviction by summary court-martial be used to impeach a witness' credibility under Mil.R.Evid. 609? In order for the prior summary court-martial to qualify as a prior "conviction" to impeach the witness' credibility under Mil.R.Evid. 609, however, the summary court-martial must have been one at which the witness being impeached was actually represented by counsel or else it must have been one at which the witness waived presence of counsel. United States v. Rogers, 17 M.J. 990 (A.C.M.R. 1984).

d. Pardon, annulment, or certificate of rehabilitation. Mil.R.Evid. 609(c) contains two limitations upon the use of prior convictions. These are based on the theory that, if a person is truly rehabilitated, the rationale for impeachment by evidence of prior conviction is no longer applicable. Both subdivisions under Mil.R.Evid. 609(c) initially require the exclusion of an otherwise admissible conviction when that conviction has been the subject of a pardon, annulment, certificate of rehabilitation, or other similar process.

(1) If the pardon or other similar process is predicated upon a finding that the witness has been rehabilitated, the conviction is inadmissible provided that the witness has not been convicted of a subsequent crime that is punishable by death, dishonorable discharge, or confinement for over one year. If there has been such a subsequent conviction, the effect of the pardon is canceled, and both convictions potentially are admissible for impeachment purposes—if the other requirements of this rule are met.

(2) If the pardon or similar process was based on a finding of not guilty, it does not matter whether the witness has been subsequently convicted. The prior conviction may never be used for later impeachment. It might still be used for some other purpose under the rules. See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 404(b).

e. Juvenile adjudication. Mil.R.Evid. 609(d) provides that evidence of juvenile adjudications generally is not admissible, and in no event may it be used against an accused. The rule permits impeachment of witnesses other than the accused if the military judge believes it is necessary to a fair resolution of the case, and the impeachment evidence would have been admissible had the witness previously been tried as an adult. This balance is in accord with Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974). In Davis, a witness, who was on probation for burglary as the result of a juvenile proceeding, allegedly observed the defendant near the location of the disposition of the fruits of the burglary close to the witness' home and 26 miles from the place of the burglary. The Court held that the defendant's right of confrontation was more important than a state policy of not revealing juvenile adjudications through impeachment of this key prosecution witness.

4. Timeliness of the convictions

a. General rule. Under Mil.R.Evid. 609(b), evidence of a conviction generally will not be admissible if it is more than ten years old.

b. Exception. Although there is a strong presumption against using dated convictions, it is possible to use an older conviction provided that three requirements are met. Those requirements found in Mil.R.Evid. 609(b) are:

(1) The interests of justice must require admission of the old conviction; and

(2) its probative value, supported by "specific facts and circumstances," must substantially outweigh its prejudicial effect; and

(3) the proponent of such a conviction must provide the other party with sufficient advance notice. The rule does not define the prior notice that is required. In the absence of a judicial definition, Saltzburg, Schinasi, and Schlueter suggest the following criteria be used:

(1) Opposing counsel should be given written notice, or an oral representation should be made on the record of the proponent's intentions to use such evidence; (2) where possible, the notice should be served at least 24 hours before the date of trial to permit in limine motions and rulings; (3) the notice should include a copy of any official, public, or other documentary evidence which will be used to establish the conviction; or (4) if such documentary evidence is not available, opposing counsel should be provided with a statement specifying where the witness was convicted, upon what charges, and based on what plea. The statement should also specify what appellate review has taken place. The proponent should be asked on the record why the interests of justice require the admission of the evidence. The opponent should be given a chance to be heard. And the trial judge should state his ruling and the reasons therefor on the record.

Military Rules of Evidence Manual, supra, at 671.

Counsel should note the specific language of the rule with regard to the second factor of the exception. This is not a simple Mil.R.Evid. 609(a)(1) or 403 balancing test. It is heavily weighted against admission of the evidence of conviction.

5. How proved. Mil.R.Evid. 609(a) states that convictions that qualify for admission may be proved in two ways: (1) Counsel may ask a witness if the witness has ever been convicted of a crime; or (2) counsel may introduce a public record demonstrating the conviction. The rule permits the direct examiner to make the tactical decision to "remove the sting" from potential impeachment on cross-examination by eliciting information about the conviction.

a. Counsel may generally ask a witness nonaccusatory questions on direct or cross-examination even if the questioner has no information that the witness has been convicted of any such offense. See United States v. Berthiaume, 5 C.M.A. 669, 18 C.M.R. 293 (1955). For example:

- (1) Have you ever been convicted of a felony?
- (2) Have you ever been convicted of a crime involving dishonesty or false statement?

b. If the witness answers "yes," other proof of the conviction is unnecessary to complete the impeachment. Counsel may point out the fact in argument.

c. If the witness answers "no," counsel may introduce evidence of the conviction during the case in reply or rebuttal.

d. It is not essential that counsel show the witness' conviction on direct or cross-examination (i.e., intrinsically). Proof of the conviction may be made by introducing in evidence an admissible record or other competent evidence of the conviction. See Mil.R.Evid. 609(a) and 803(22). Mil.R.Evid. 803(22) specifically provides a hearsay exception for proof of prior conviction.

e. In examining a witness concerning a prior conviction, questions should not be framed in an accusatory form unless there is clearly admissible documentary proof of the specific conviction.

f. If evidence of a prior conviction against the accused is used for impeachment purposes, defense counsel should consider requesting that a limiting instruction be given. See Mil.R.Evid. 105.

E. Specific instances of conduct. Mil.R.Evid. 608(b).

1. General rule. Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) provides that generally a party may not offer extrinsic evidence of specific instances of past conduct of a witness to either attack or support the witness' credibility.

a. Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) provides for an explicit exception to the general rule (i.e., the admission of extrinsic evidence of prior convictions). See Mil.R.Evid. 609.

b. There are also implicit exceptions allowing the use of extrinsic evidence of specific acts of conduct to show bias (Mil.R.Evid. 608(c)) or prior inconsistent statements (Mil.R.Evid. 613). See Mil.R.Evid. 609(b) drafters' analysis. Extrinsic evidence of specific acts is also permissible as it relates to impeachment by contradiction, discussed in subsection H, infra.

2. Inquiry on cross-examination. Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) permits the cross-examiner to inquire about specific instances of conduct for the purpose of supporting or attacking credibility provided that the specific instances are (1) probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness; (2) explicitly subject to the military judge's discretion concerning admissibility; and (3) related to the character trait for truthfulness or untruthfulness of either the witness being cross-examined or another witness as to whose character the present witness has testified. The acts that qualify to impeach a witness under Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) are those that involve crimen falsi (such as false swearing, perjury, fraud, etc.). Not all "bad acts," however, fall within Mil.R.Evid. 608(b). Compare United States v. Fortes, 619 F.2d 108 (1st Cir. 1980), where prior acts of drug trafficking were held not to be relevant as acts bearing upon truthfulness under Fed.R.Evid. 608(b), with United States v. Hunter, 21 M.J. 240 (C.M.A. 1986), where accused's prior involvement with marijuana was admissible to show accused's intent and motive to rebut defenses of entrapment and agency. Such inquiry can be especially important when such specific acts have not led to a conviction under Mil.R.Evid. 609 as discussed in the previous subsection of this chapter.

a. Extrinsic evidence. While the rule does allow impeachment by inquiry into specific instances, the questioner is precluded from introducing extrinsic evidence in support of this inquiry. Cf. Mil.R.Evid. 405(a). This is done to avoid a "trial within a trial", which may cause confusion and may tend to distract the court members from the main issues in the case. Thus, the questioner may inquire about a specific instance of conduct and, if the witness acknowledges the act, the impeachment or rehabilitation is complete and no further evidence is needed. If the witness denies the act, the questioner is "bound by the answer," in that the answer may not be contradicted by extrinsic evidence. See, e.g., United States v. Bosley, 615 F.2d 1274 (9th Cir. 1980). Being "bound by the answer" does not necessarily mean that the questioner must take the witness' answer and abandon any further inquiry once a denial of the act is given. See United States v. Owens, 21 M.J. 117 (C.M.A. 1985). Counsel may continue to pursue the inquiry until limited by the military judge under Mil.R.Evid. 611(a) and 403.

On the other hand, if the extrinsic evidence would be admissible without regard to the witness' answer—for example, if admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 404(b)—counsel could introduce the evidence, both for impeachment and for substantive use. See, e.g., United States v. Dorsey, 15 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1983).

b. Cross-examination. Some question exists with respect to whether specific instances of conduct may be inquired into on direct as well as cross-examination. Recognizing that the text of Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) would seem to restrict the use of evidence of specific acts for cross-examination, the drafters of the Mil.R.Evid. have suggested that the better approach is to permit similar inquiry on direct-examination as well. Mil.R.Evid. 608 drafters' analysis. "It is the intent of the Committee to allow use of this form of evidence on direct-examination to the same extent, if any, it is so permitted in the Article III courts." Id. There currently is no clear authority on this issue.

c. Good faith inquiry. Although a good faith belief in the accuracy of the specific instances of conduct inquired about is not explicitly required by Mil.R.Evid. 608(b), the drafters' analysis recognizes that, as a matter of ethics, counsel should not attempt to elicit evidence of such conduct unless there is a reasonable basis for the question. Mil.R.Evid. 608 drafters' analysis.

3. Waiver of self-incrimination. The last sentence of Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) provides that testimony relating only to credibility does not waive the privilege against self-incrimination. See Mil.R.Evid. 301(f) (claiming the privilege). See also Mil.R.Evid. 301. This provision applies to all witnesses, including the accused, and recognizes that Fifth Amendment interests may predominate over impeachment needs. It should be noted that this provision does not prohibit questions on specific acts relating to issues other than credibility. See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 609 (prior convictions); Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) (other crimes, wrongs or acts). Chapter XII, infra, discusses the effects of claiming the privilege against self-incrimination in response to such questions.

4. Although witnesses may be asked about specific acts they committed that reflect upon their lack of truthfulness, it is "clearly improper for the trial counsel to attempt to impeach . . . by asking about [a] prior nonjudicial punishment." United States v. Bowling, 16 M.J. 848, 850 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983).

5. Limited use. Inquiry into specific instances of conduct under Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) is for the limited purpose of impeaching or rehabilitating a witness' credibility. Remember this important distinction between 608(b) (specific instances of conduct which may be used only for their impact on credibility) and 404(b) (crimes, wrongs, or acts which technically are not used to establish character at all but rather motive, plan, intent, etc.) which may be considered on the issue of the accused's guilt or innocence).

F. Evidence of bias. Mil.R.Evid. 608(c). This method of impeachment has no direct corollary in the Fed.R.Evid. Evidence of bias is a generally accepted form of impeachment in the Article III courts and is explicitly codified in Mil.R.Evid. 608(c).

This rule does not change prior military law as to the admissibility of extrinsic evidence to prove bias. A witness may be impeached by a showing of "bias, prejudice, or any other motive to misrepresent," because these qualities have a bearing on the credibility of the witness' testimony. Mil.R.Evid. 608(c). The three factors under Mil.R.Evid. 608(c) are only a representative, and not exhaustive, list of specific factors that might be considered as evidence of bias or motive to misrepresent. The bias may be either in favor of or against one of the parties to the trial or it may be an interest in the outcome of the case. In a prosecution for drug distribution where the accused presented an entrapment defense, for example, it was reversible error for the military judge to preclude cross-examination and extrinsic evidence of the informant's sexual relationship with her controlling agent and other evidence that the informant was "manipulative" and "would do whatever is necessary for personal gain." United States v. Tippy, 25 M.J. 121 (C.M.A. 1987). See also United States v. Bins, 43 M.J. 79 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (where evidence that civilian victim received substantial support from U.S. Government in per diem, housing, and mental health counseling was relevant to show bias or motive to mispresent); United States v. Welker, 44 M.J. 85 (C.A.A.F. 96) (TC's impeachment of complaining witness' direct testimony that she wanted her father to stay with her family rather than go to jail, by cross examining her to show that she had been threatened by her mother about testifying and to establish that the nature of the offenses made it unrealistic for accused to return home, was appropriate under Mil.R.Evid. 608(c))

G. Prior inconsistent statements of witnesses. Mil.R.Evid. 613. (Key Number 1149). Mil.R.Evid. 613 is the primary Military Rule of Evidence dealing with impeachment by prior inconsistent statements. See Mil.R.Evid. 613 drafters' analysis.

1. General rule. Since Mil.R.Evid. 613 addresses only the procedural aspects of prior inconsistent statements, the common law and pre-Mil.R.Evid. case law rule on impeachment by prior inconsistent statement is applicable to present military practice. See Mil.R.Evid. 101(b). Accordingly, a witness may be impeached by a showing with any competent evidence that the witness made a previous statement, oral or written, or engaged in other conduct, inconsistent with the witness' in-court testimony. This competent evidence may be in the form of either intrinsic or extrinsic evidence. Intrinsic evidence involves the witness who made the prior statement being interrogated as to the existence and content of the statement. This form of impeachment by prior inconsistent statement is controlled by Mil.R.Evid. 613(a). Extrinsic evidence entails either calling a third party to testify to the existence and content of the prior inconsistent statement or presenting some documentary form of the statement. Mil.R.Evid. 613(b) provides the requirements for extrinsic proof of a prior inconsistent statement.

Although Mil.R.Evid. 613 speaks of "statements," prior inconsistent conduct (acts) is generally recognized as being admissible for impeachment purposes to the same extent as statements. For example, if, in an embezzlement prosecution, the government offers testimony that the accused is an untrustworthy person, the defense could elicit testimony that the witness made an unsecured signature loan to the accused. A person who truly believed the accused to be untrustworthy would probably not make such a loan.

2. Foundation requirement abolished

a. Under former MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 153b(2)(c), certain foundational requirements had to be met before any evidence of a prior inconsistent statement could be considered for the purpose of impeachment, either intrinsically or extrinsically. These requirements were called the rule of the Queen's Case, 2 Br & B. 284, 129 Eng. Rep. 976 (1820). Their primary purpose was to acquaint the witness with the prior statement and to give the witness an opportunity to either change his or her testimony or reaffirm it.

b. Mil.R.Evid. 613(a) abandons these foundational requirements for the use of prior inconsistent statements and imposes only a limited procedural requirement in their stead. It provides that, when counsel is examining a witness based on an inconsistent oral or written pretrial statement, that statement need not be shown to the witness, nor must its contents be disclosed to the witness during cross-examination. It is only necessary to ask the witness whether the witness made a certain statement.

(1) The only procedural requirement that counsel must meet before examining a witness about a prior inconsistent statement is to show or disclose the statement to opposing counsel (not the witness) when specifically requested.

(2) Counsel should be alert to make such a specific request. But the language of the rule indicates that, even upon request, the statement need not be disclosed to opposing counsel until the witness is actually examined concerning the statement. Granting continuances and the judicious use of Mil.R.Evid. 611(a) should control any injustice in this regard. Counsel should also be aware of the use of discovery devices as discussed in chapter II of this study guide.

(3) The fact that the prior inconsistent statement need not be offered or mentioned during examination of the witness, but may be withheld until other witnesses are called, is particularly useful when there is possible collusion among witnesses. While the requirements of Mil.R.Evid. 613(b) must be met before the statement is admitted extrinsically, they need not be accomplished until witnesses have been examined and impeached.

c. Proper foundation. Although Mil.R.Evid. 613(a) abolishes the old requirement for laying a proper foundation, the drafters' analysis to the rule states that "such a procedure may be appropriate as a matter of trial tactics" MCM, 1984. For example, laying a foundation in a trial with members may emphasize the inconsistent statement and thus act as a "highlighting" tactic. For counsel who choose to lay such a foundation, the following traditional steps are offered.

(1) Direct the attention of the witness to the time and place when the prior inconsistent statement was made, naming the person to whom the statement was made.

(2) Ask the witness if the witness made the statement. Counsel can read or repeat the statement to the witness at this point. The writing need not be shown to the witness.

(3) If the witness denies making the inconsistent statement, or states she does not remember whether she made it, or refuses to testify as to whether she made it, competent evidence of the text or substance of the statement may be introduced.

3. Extrinsic evidence of prior inconsistent statement
(Key Number 1150)

a. Requirement. Although the general foundational requirements of the common law and past military practice have been removed for the extrinsic use of prior inconsistent statements, Mil.R.Evid. 613(b) imposes its own procedural requirements. If extrinsic evidence of the prior statement is to be admissible, the witness who made the prior statement must be given the opportunity to explain or deny it. The rule sets forth no particular timing for this explanation, so it would be possible initially to use the witness' own responses under Mil.R.Evid. 613(a) for intrinsic impeachment and later have the witness recalled to explain or deny extrinsic evidence of the same prior inconsistent statement. In addition to this opportunity for the witness to explain or deny, the opposing counsel has the opportunity to examine the witness concerning the extrinsic evidence of the statement. Thus, counsel may be able to help the witness explain the inconsistencies by showing misunderstandings, misstatements, or evidence taken out of context. In order to allow for such eventualities as the witness becoming unavailable by the time the prior statement is discovered, a measure of discretion is conferred upon the military judge to allow extrinsic evidence without an opportunity to explain or deny or for counsel to examine when "the interests of justice otherwise require." Mil.R.Evid. 613(b).

b. Methods. Provided that the requirements of Mil.R.Evid. 613(b) are met, counsel still need to follow some basic steps of authentication before the extrinsic evidence is admitted.

(1) Written statement

(a) Counsel shows the writing to the witness, asking her to identify her signature or the authorship of the written statement.

(b) If the witness admits that the signature is hers, or that she was the author of the statement, the writing becomes admissible in evidence.

(c) If there is no such admission, but either of these facts (authorship or signature) is otherwise proved, the writing becomes admissible in evidence.

(2) Oral statements

(a) Counsel calls another witness, who heard the person testifying make the prior statement.

(b) This method may also be used where the written statement is not accounted for. But note the peculiar problems implicit where the statement was an unwitnessed oral statement to counsel. Short of taking the stand, counsel has no method of proving the contents of the contested statement; this, in turn, raises several ethical considerations. See United States v. Maxwell, 2 M.J. 1155 (N.C.M.R. 1975). The suggested procedure is, therefore, to obtain such statements in writing or in the presence of witnesses.

(c) A question had existed as to whether extrinsic evidence may be admitted under the rule after a witness has admitted the prior inconsistent statement. In United States v. Button, 34 M.J. 139 (C.M.A. 1992), the court adopted the federal position "that extrinsic evidence of a prior inconsistent statement should not be admitted for impeachment when (1) the declarant is available and testifies; (2) the declarant admits making the prior statement; and (3) the declarant acknowledges the specific inconsistencies between the prior statement and his or her in-court testimony."

4. Uses of prior inconsistent statements. The general rule is that a prior inconsistent statement is admissible only for the purposes of impeachment and not for the truth of the matters asserted in the statement.

a. When the statement is offered for impeachment, upon request, the military judge should instruct the members, at the time the inconsistent statement is introduced, that the evidence is to be considered only for the purpose of credibility and not for the purpose of establishing the truth of its contents. Mil.R.Evid. 105. Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam 27-9, Inst. 7-11 (1982).

b. Exception to the general rule. The statement is admissible for its truth:

(1) When the statement may properly be received as evidence of a voluntary confession or admission of the witness when the witness is the accused. Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(2).

(2) When the statement of the witness is otherwise admissible as not hearsay. Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(A).

(3) When the witness testifies that her inconsistent statement is true, not merely that she made it, and thus adopts the statement as part of her testimony.

Mil.R.Evid. 613(b) is not applicable in the two situations under Mil.R.Evid. 801 noted above. Counsel must know the purpose for which evidence is to be offered. See United States v. Jackson, 12 M.J. 163 (C.M.A. 1981), on the need to use prior inconsistent statements only for proper purposes. See also United States v. Mendoza, 18 M.J. 576 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984) (error to consider prior inconsistent statement on merits rather than simply for impeachment purposes).

5. Prior inconsistent statements of a hearsay declarant. Although not the subject of this chapter, impeachment of a hearsay declarant may involve the use of prior inconsistent statements also. See Mil.R.Evid. 806 and the discussions in chapter VIII of this text. The basic impeachment methods and procedures just discussed are also applicable in attacking the credibility of a hearsay declarant with the explicit exclusion of the "explain or deny" provision of Mil.R.Evid. 613(b).

H. Impeachment by contradiction (Key Number 1143). The drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 608(c) recognizes that the rules do not codify every permissible technique of impeachment. One of the noncodified techniques specifically mentioned by the Mil.R.Evid. drafters is impeachment by contradiction. This technique is essentially the converse of the corroboration technique of bolstering that was previously discussed. With corroboration, the evidence presented is consistent with previous testimony, thus increasing the credibility of the witness who gave the testimony. With contradiction, the evidence presented is inconsistent or conflicting with previous testimony, thus diminishing the credibility of the witness who gave the initial testimony. The most common situation is where the accused takes the stand and testifies to the effect that he has never, or has not within a certain period of time, committed an offense of any kind or of a certain kind. Trial counsel may now introduce, through cross-examination of the accused or by extrinsic sources, evidence which contradicts the accused's testimony. This evidence may be used for the purpose of impeaching the accused's credibility and for the purpose of rebuttal. See, e.g., United States v. Rodgers, 18 M.J. 565 (A.C.M.R. 1984) (accused's pretrial admission of prior drug sales, which rebutted his in-court assertion that the charged offense was his only drug sale and which contradicted his in-court assertion that he had not regularly used drugs in the past, was relevant rebuttal evidence).

Impeachment by contradiction is mentioned explicitly in Mil.R.Evid. 304(b) and 311(b). Under Mil.R.Evid. 304(b), a statement of the accused that is involuntary only in terms of noncompliance with counsel rights under Mil.R.Evid. 305, and thus inadmissible on the merits of the case, could be used to impeach the accused should the accused testify in court and deny having made the statement or deny the contents of the statement. This is in accord with Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1981). Likewise, Mil.R.Evid. 311(b) allows the result of an illegal search or seizure to be used to impeach the accused should the accused testify in court and deny the existence of the search or seizure result or otherwise contradict a known fact. This is in accord with United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980). In both of these situations, it must be remembered that the otherwise inadmissible evidence is being offered only for the limited purpose of impeachment. A limiting instruction may again be appropriate. See Mil.R.Evid. 105.

In United States v. Banker, 15 M.J. 207 (C.M.A. 1983), the court cited

Mil.R.Evid. 607 as the authority for impeachment. Banker defined impeachment by contradiction as a "line of attack showing the tribunal the contrary of a witness' asserted fact, so as to raise an inference of a general defective trustworthiness." Id. at 210. One noteworthy issue addressed in Banker is whether a party can impeach a witness by contradiction on a collateral matter. Banker held that extrinsic evidence could be used to impeach a witness by contradiction on a collateral matter if the matter was raised on direct examination. The court opined, however, that it is not permissible for a party to raise collateral matters on cross-examination and then use extrinsic evidence to impeach the witness by contradicting the witness on the collateral matter. In United States v. Trimper, 28 M.J. 460 (C.M.A. 1989), the court followed Banker, indicating that, if a witness makes a broad collateral assertion on direct examination that he has never engaged in a certain type of misconduct, he may be impeached by extrinsic evidence of the misconduct. However, Trimper went further than Banker and held that, if a witness volunteers broad information in responding to appropriately narrow cross-examination, the prosecution is entitled to offer extrinsic evidence to show that the witness' testimony is false.

0714 REHABILITATION OF THE WITNESS. The third stage in the analysis of credibility is rehabilitation. After the witness' testimony has been attacked, it is possible for counsel to present evidence to support or enhance the witness' credibility. This is known as "rehabilitating the witness." Except for the methods allowed under bolstering, such support for a witness' credibility requires some form of attack. See Mil.R.Evid. 608(a). The mere fact that a witness, even the accused, is contradicted by other witnesses does not necessarily constitute an attack on credibility. Kauz v. United States, 188 F.2d 9 (5th Cir. 1951). See United States v. Kauth, 11 C.M.A. 261, 29 C.M.R. 77 (1960); United States v. Halsing, 11 M.J. 920 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981). But see United States v. Varela, 25 M.J. 29 (C.M.A. 1987); United States v. Everage, 19 M.J. 189 (C.M.A. 1985).

A. Methods. The Military Rules of Evidence do not go into detail about methods for rehabilitation. For the most part, the common law principle that rehabilitation must respond in kind to impeachment is followed. See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 608.

1. On redirect examination, the witnesses may be allowed to explain apparent inconsistencies or otherwise clarify their testimony.
2. The testimony of the impeached witness may be corroborated in the same manner as it could if it were to be initially bolstered.
3. The impeaching evidence may be discredited itself.
  - a. Opinion or reputation evidence of the impeaching witness' character for untruthfulness may be shown. Mil.R.Evid. 608(a).

b. Bias or other motive to misrepresent on the part of the impeaching witness may be shown. Mil.R.Evid. 608(c).

c. Proof that the impeaching witness has been convicted of a crime can be used. Mil.R.Evid. 609.

Note, however, there may be balancing difficulties with the remoteness and probative value of a collateral issue. See Mil.R.Evid. 401, 403.

4. If the impeachment is by a showing of bias or prejudice, there may be evidence to contradict the assertion or prior consistent statements under Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(B) predating the event and confirming the testimony of the witness in court. Prior consistent statements are discussed, infra.

5. If the witness' character for truthfulness has been attacked, there may be a showing of good opinion or reputation in rebuttal or an inquiry into specific good acts. Mil.R.Evid. 608(a) and (b).

6. Prior statements consistent with in-court testimony may be introduced in accordance with Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(B) to rebut impeachment by prior inconsistent statements.

1. The general rule is that counsel may not bolster the credibility of counsel's own witness by showing that the witness has made prior consistent statements.

2. Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(B), however, allows the use of such statements if they are offered to rebut an express or implied charge against the declarant of the statement of: (1) recent fabrication; (2) improper influence; or (3) bad motive. There is no requirement that the prior consistent statement have been given under oath or at any type of proceedings as is required of a prior inconsistent statement under Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(A). However, the statement must have been made before the alleged motive to fabricate arose. Tome v. United States, 115 S.Ct. 696 (1995).

0715 FINAL COMMENTS. With the policy of the Mil.R.Evid. encouraging the admission of relevant testimony, it is counsel's responsibility to ensure that the triers of fact give the testimony its proper weight. Thus, credibility will be an area of frequent litigation at trial. Counsel should remember that the methods of bolstering, impeaching, and rehabilitating witnesses discussed in this chapter are not exhaustive. As has been noted, the drafters contemplated that the Military Rules of Evidence would allow any form of attack on or support of credibility accepted by Article III courts. Thus, counsel should follow developments in both Federal and military courts and should remember the common law. See Mil.R.Evid. 101. In addition to knowing the methods of attacking or supporting credibility, counsel must be able to use these methods. In impeaching a witness, as in any other area of trial work, there is no substitute for preparation.

PART THREE: OPINIONS AND EXPERT TESTIMONY (Key Number 1120)

0716 INTRODUCTION. Section VII of the Military Rules of Evidence deals with the manner in which witnesses may testify. Mil.R.Evid. 701-705 are essentially identical with the corresponding Federal rules, the only changes being deletions of references to the masculine gender. Mil.R.Evid. 701 governs the testimony of ordinary or "lay" witnesses while the testimony of "experts" is governed by Mil.R.Evid. 702, 703, and 705. Mil.R.Evid. 704 deals with testimony by any witness on an "ultimate issue." All of these rules should be read in conjunction with each other, as they reflect a total and coherent philosophy involving both relevancy and competency. The final rule in this section, Mil.R.Evid. 706, applies special military considerations to the subject of court-appointed experts.

0717 OPINION TESTIMONY BY LAY WITNESSES. Mil.R.Evid. 701.

Rule 701. Opinion Testimony by Lay Witnesses

If the witness is not testifying as an expert, the testimony of the witness in the form of opinions or inferences is limited to those opinions or inferences which are (a) rationally based on the perception of the witness and (b) helpful to a clear understanding of the testimony of the witness or the determination of a fact in issue.

A. Requirements for application of the rule. In order for a lay witness' testimony in the form of opinions or inferences to be admissible, the opinion or inference: (1) must be rationally based on the witness' own perception; and (2) must be helpful to the trier of fact.

1. This first requirement implicitly incorporates the specific competency requirement of Mil.R.Evid. 602. The perception, whether it be something seen, heard, felt, or otherwise perceived, must be the witness' own. Additionally, these perceptions must be rationally based. This means only that the opinion or inference is one which a normal person would form on the basis of the observed facts. For example, it is doubtful that a person claiming to possess extrasensory perception would be able to meet the rational perception test (from either the perception or rationality aspects).

2. The second, and more important, requirement is that the opinion or inference be helpful to the determination of a fact in issue or to a clear understanding of the testimony of the witness. It is not clear what the distinction is between understanding the testimony of the witness and determining a fact in issue, since it appears that any improvement in understanding testimony would also improve the determination of a fact in issue. This is not significant, however, as long as the opinion is an aid to the fact-finder.

a. The opinion may be helpful when the exclusion of an opinion would not allow the witness to be able adequately or accurately to describe the event perceived. E.g., United States v. Arrasmith, 557 F.2d 1093, 1094 (5th Cir. 1977) (border patrol agent allowed to testify as to the smell of marijuana since "describing odors is a task that can severely test the abilities of even the most accomplished wordsmith."); New York Life Insurance Co. v. Harrington, 299 F.2d 803, 807 (5th Cir. 1962) (witness who claimed deceased shot himself accidentally was permitted to testify that the deceased looked surprised when the gun fired: "a witness is allowed some latitude in giving a shorthand description of events involving manifestations of familiar but complex emotions").

b. Helpful opinions also include situations where the witness is able to avoid artificial circumlocutions that might cause the factfinder to miss the point or at least be unnecessarily distracted. E.g., Bohannon v. Pegelow, 652 F.2d 729 (7th Cir. 1981) (witness permitted to testify that arrest was racially motivated); United States v. Lawson, 653 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1981) (lay testimony that accused was sane at time of offenses was permitted). On the other hand, it was not "helpful to the trier of fact" for a CID agent to express the opinion in a rape prosecution that the victim displayed symptoms similar to those of typical rape victims when he interviewed her. United States v. Carter, 26 M.J. 428 (C.M.A. 1988).

c. Any time a lay witness states an opinion, it is appropriate that the witness be required to state the basis for the opinion. This should normally be done by the counsel requesting the opinion of the witness, but may also be done by the military judge pursuant to Mil.R.Evid. 611(a) and 104(a) in determining the admissibility of an opinion.

B. Discretion of the military judge. Mil.R.Evid. 701 is a rule of discretion to be applied by the military judge. The emphasis should be on what the witness knows and not on the manner in which this knowledge is expressed. The fact-finders are normally astute enough to pick up signals as to when a witness is testifying about what the witness perceived and when it is merely what the witness thinks.

Mil.R.Evid. 701 must be read in conjunction with Mil.R.Evid. 704. Although Mil.R.Evid. 704 allows opinions on an ultimate issue in a case, opinions that simply serve to tell the fact-finder how to decide a case are not helpful to the trier of fact. For example, no witness should offer an opinion that the accused is guilty; nor should an investigator be permitted to testify that, in the investigator's opinion, an accused lied when making an exculpatory pretrial statement. See United States v. Clark, 12 M.J. 978 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 13 M.J. 480 (C.M.A. 1983); United States v. Cameron, 21 M.J. 59 (C.M.A. 1985). Of course, this axe cuts both ways. It is equally improper for a defense witness to express the opinion that the accused was being truthful when making an exculpatory pretrial statement. Thus, for example, in a prosecution for use of cocaine, it was not an abuse of the military judge's discretion to exclude testimony from a drug counselor called by the defense that the accused was telling the truth when he told her in the course of a pretrial drug counseling session that he had not used cocaine. United States v. Farrar, 25 M.J. 856 (A.F.C.M.R. 1988).

C. Commonly used opinions

1. Observable physical phenomena:

- a. Speed of an automobile;
- b. whether a voice heard was that of a man, woman, or child;
- c. matters of color, weight, size; and
- d. matters involving sight, sound, taste, smell, touch (the senses).

2. Physical, emotional, or mental condition of a person (includes drunkenness, illness)

3. Proof of character. When proof of the character of a person is admissible, the opinion of a witness as to that person's character may be received in evidence if it is known that the witness has such an acquaintance or relationship with the person as to qualify the witness to form a reliable opinion in this respect. Mil.R.Evid. 405(a).

4. General mental condition. A lay witness, who is acquainted with the accused and who has observed the accused's behavior, may also testify as to observations and give such an opinion as to the general mental condition of the accused as may be within the bounds of common experience and means of observation of a lay person. See United States v. Carey, 11 C.M.A. 443, 29 C.M.R. 259 (1960). See also United States v. Lawson, 653 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1981); United States v. Pickett, 470 F.2d 1255 (D.C. Cir. 1972).

5. Habit or usage. Mil.R.Evid. 406.

6. Handwriting. Mil.R.Evid. 901(b)(2).

7. Drugs. A witness who is familiar with the drug in issue and its physical or chemical properties is permitted to give an opinion of the identity of the drug, whether the familiarity arises from formal or informal training and experience. United States v. Tyler, 17 M.J. 381 (C.M.A. 1984) (identification of cocaine); United States v. Day, 20 M.J. 213 (C.M.A. 1985) (identification of heroin and hashish).

For other examples of the use of lay witness opinion, see Annot. Lay Witnesses: construction and application of Rule 701 of Federal Rules of Evidence, providing for opinion testimony by lay witnesses under certain conditions, 44 A.L.R. Fed. 919 (1979).

0718 TESTIMONY BY EXPERTS. Mil.R.Evid. 702.

Rule 702. Testimony by Experts

If scientific, technical, or other specialized knowledge will assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or to determine a fact in issue, a witness qualified as an expert by knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education, may testify thereto in the form of an opinion or otherwise.

A. General. This rule sets forth the generally permissive standard for the use of expert witnesses. Like Mil.R.Evid. 701 dealing with lay witnesses, the key question here is whether the testimony will "assist the trier of fact." See, e.g., United States v. Kyles, 20 M.J. 571 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985).

1. There is no requirement under this rule that an expert be necessary (See United States v. Meeks, 35 M.J. 64, 68 (C.A.A.F. 1992) or that the subject matter of the expert's testimony be beyond the ken of the fact-finder. These were common requirements under traditional rules on expert testimony.

2. The rule is intentionally broadly phrased. Contrary to a commonly accepted belief, appropriate areas of expertise under this rule are not limited to scientific or technical fields of knowledge, but include all "specialized" knowledge. Similarly, the expert is not viewed in the strictly professional sense, but includes any person qualified by "knowledge, skill, experience, training, or education." But see United States v. Ruth, 42 M.J. 730 (A.F.C.C.A. 1995) (where the court distinguished the test for admissibility of technical or specialized knowledge testimony from the test to admit scientific testimony). See also United States v. Hill, 41 M.J. 596 (A.C.C.A. 1994), pet. denied, 43 M.J. 154 (1995).

3. The witness need not be an outstanding practitioner, but merely someone who can assist the trier of fact because of the witness' specialized knowledge. United States v. Mustafa, 22 M.J. 165 (C.M.A. 1986) (CID agent, who took five-day course on blood spatter, could testify). See also United States v. Peel, 29 M.J. 235 (C.M.A. 1989).

4. Although much of the expert testimony in court will be opinions, the drafters allowed for other types of testimony ("opinion or otherwise"). This could include a situation where an expert might "give a dissertation or exposition of scientific or other principles relevant to the case, leaving the trier of fact to apply them to the facts."

Fed.R.Evid. 702 Advisory Committee note.

5. The impact of the permissiveness of Mil.R.Evid. 702 cannot be fully appreciated without consideration of related rules considered later in this part of the chapter (Mil.R.Evid. 703 with its expansion of the data on which the expert may rely, Mil.R.Evid. 704 with its abolition of the ultimate issue rule, and Mil.R.Evid. 705 with the loosening of foundational requirements).

B. Assistance to the trier of fact. The standard referred to in Mil.R.Evid. 702 is simply whether the evidence that the expert will provide is going to assist the trier of fact in any manner. The extent to which a particular type of expert testimony is generally accepted in the scientific community is merely one factor to consider in determining whether it is sufficiently probative to be admissible in a military proceeding. Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, 113 S. Ct. 2786 (1993); United States v. Nimmer, 43 M.J. 252 (C.A.A.F. 1995); United States v. Gipson, 24 M.J. 246 (C.M.A. 1987).

1. Polygraphs. Mil.R.Evid 707 establishes a bright-line rule that polygraph evidence is not admissible by any party to a court-martial, even if stipulated to by the parties. Previously there had been disagreement among the Service Courts of Criminal Appeals with regard to the admissibility, indeed the constitutionality of Mil.R.Evid 707, specifically with regard to the defense proffered exculpatory polygraph examinations.

In United States v. Schaeffer, ____ U.S. ____ (1998), 118 S.Ct. 1261 (1998), the accused passed a government administered polygraph, and wanted the administrator of the exam to testify on his behalf. The military judge denied the request, and he was convicted of all the charges. The Air force court affirmed. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces reversed, holding that a per se exclusion of polygraph evidence offered by an accused to support his credibility violates his Sixth Amendment right to present a defense. The Supreme Court reversed, holding that Mil.R.Evid 707 does not unconstitutionally abridge the right of accused members of the military to present a defense. Justice Thomas, delivering the opinion, stated that an unconstitutional exclusion of evidence (in this case the accused claimed it was the exclusion of expert testimony of the polygraph examiner) will be found only where it has infringed upon a weighty interest of the accused. The Supreme Court held that Rule 707 does not implicate a sufficiently weighty interest of the accused to raise a constitutional concern. Therefore, because polygraph evidence in criminal trials is unreliable, and by its very nature may diminish the jury's role in making credibility determinations, it was properly excluded.

2. Child sexual abuse. Any number of cases have addressed the use of expert testimony in child sexual abuse cases. One of the leading cases in this area is United States v. Snipes, 18 M.J. 172 (C.M.A. 1984), holding that the military judge did not err in permitting the trial counsel to call a social worker, a state counselor, and a clinical and forensic psychologist, all of whom expressed the opinion that the child's mental and emotional state during their pretrial interviews with her was consistent with that of a child who had been sexually abused. It has been held proper for a government expert in clinical psychology to express opinions as to why a child might not quickly report an incident of sexual abuse; whether a child might be prompted to fabricate an allegation of sexual abuse after viewing a pornographic videocassette; and what effect, if any, an adult's sexual orientation might have on the probability of his committing sexual offenses against a child. United States v. Nelson, 25 M.J. 110 (C.M.A. 1987). In another child molestation case, it was held proper for a government expert to express an opinion as to various patterns of consistency in the stories of child sexual abuse victims and compare those patterns with patterns in the immediate victim's story. United States v. Harrison, 31 M.J. 330 (C.M.A. 1990). See also United States v. Rhea, 33 M.J. 413 (C.M.A. 1991). But see United States v. Cacy, 43 M.J. 214 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (Court held improper the expert's testimony that she explained to the six year old victim of alleged sexual abuse the importance of being truthful, and based on the victim's responses, the expert recommended further treatment. Court viewed this as an affirmation by expert that she believed victim). United States v. Knox, 46 M. J. 688 (Navy-Marine Corps Ct. Crim. App. 1997) (30 year sentence overturned because social worker testified, "I consider [the drawings] an expression of what the child is telling me, I believe the child.")

3. Drug cases. In a urinalysis prosecution for use of marijuana, it was held proper for a military judge to exclude defense proffered expert testimony regarding the possibility of "melanin interference" (the theory that melanin pigmentation in black skin can cause a false positive for THC in a gas chromatography and mass spectrometry test) where the defense expert had received no education or training in the area of forensic chemistry; he had never personally tested whether melanin interferes with the reliability of the gas chromatography and mass spectrometry procedure; and he was unaware of any scientist besides himself who subscribed to the melanin interference theory. United States v. Mance, 26 M.J. 244 (C.M.A. 1988). But see United States v. Nimmer, 43 M.J. 252 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (where remand was necessary to re-litigate the admissibility of expert testimony on analysis of hair for cocaine metabolites to allow MJ to consider reliability of the proffered evidence by looking at the validity of the scientific methodology that led to the evidence).

4. Truthfulness of another witness. Trial advocates should be alert to the serious potential for abuse of expert testimony when it begins to approach a commentary by the expert witness on the truthfulness of another witness' testimony. For example, while it is perfectly proper for experts to express opinions on matters such as whether a child would be likely to fabricate an allegation of sexual abuse or whether during a pretrial interview the child was demonstrating symptoms commonly seen in sexually abused children, it would be highly improper for the expert to go just one step further and begin to express opinions regarding the truthfulness of the victim's allegation against the accused. Thus, for example, in United States v. Rhea, 33 M.J. 413 (C.M.A. 1991), the court noted that it would have been improper to ask the government expert if the victim was fabricating her allegation or telling the truth. Similarly, in another child molestation case, it was held to be error (though harmless, in light of the overpowering evidence against the accused) for a government psychiatrist on the basis of his pretrial interviews with the victim to express his opinion that she had actually had a sexual encounter with the accused. United States v. Arruza, 26 M.J. 234 (C.M.A. 1988). And, in United States v. Cameron, 21 M.J. 59 (C.M.A. 1985), it was held to be reversible error for a social worker to express the opinion that the twelve-year-old victim was being truthful when she reported the sexual abuse to her. See also United States v. Cacy, 43 M.J. 214 (C.A.A.F. 1995). On the other hand, it was held to be error, though harmless under the circumstances, in a prosecution for making a false official statement for the military judge to prevent a defense psychiatrist from expressing the opinion that the accused was engaging in a "coping mechanism" and actually believed she was still married at the time she made the false representation (the accused allegedly lied in claiming she was still married at the time she applied for married BAQ when in fact she had recently been divorced). United States v. Hill-Dunning, 26 M.J. 260 (C.M.A. 1988); United States v. Peterson, 24 M.J. 283 (C.M.A. 1987); United States v. Toledo, 25 M.J. 270 (C.M.A. 1987); United States v. Marrie, 43 M.J. 35 (C.A.A.F. 1995).

5. Novel Scientific Evidence. C.A.A.F., in United States v. Nimmer, 43 M.J. 252 (1995), essentially set out the new standard for the appropriate inquiry by a military court into any new or novel scientific evidence. The accused in this case had tested positive for cocaine after being subject to a routine urinalysis examination. At trial, the accused proffered the testimony of an expert in hair analysis who had received and analyzed a few strands of the accused's hair and had concluded that the accused had not used cocaine, at least not in sufficient quantity to suggest knowing ingestion. The MJ, attempting to apply the general guidance provided by C.A.A.F. in United States v. Gipson, 24 M.J. 246 (C.M.A. 1987) regarding the test for admissibility of scientific evidence, rejected the proffered expert opinion. Noting that the MJ did not have the benefit of the Supreme Courts guidance provided in Daubert v Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., supra, CAAF remanded the case to re-litigate the admissibility of the proffered testimony in light of that holding. Under the new standard, the appropriate inquiry into the reliability of the proffered evidence will involve looking at the validity of the scientific methodology that led to the evidence, including variances among studies of testing technique, level of peer review, any known error rate for the technique, uniformity in applications of the technique, and acceptance of the technique in the scientific community. See also United States v. Bush, 44 M.J. 646 (A.F.C.C.A. 1996). A case involving novel scientific (DNA) evidence, indeed a case of first impression for C.A.A.F., was decided by the court in United States v. Youngberg, 43 M.J. 379 (C.A.A.F. 1995), where the court found that the MJ had properly determined the reliability and relevance of the subject scientific methodology. The court here further refined and explained the Daubert and Nimmer factors which may be considered in determining whether expert testimony should be considered scientifically valid for the purposes of Mil.R.Evid. 702. This case, like Daubert and Nimmer, is essential reading for counsel dealing with scientific evidence, especially novel scientific areas.

0719 BASES OF OPINION TESTIMONY BY EXPERTS. Mil.R.Evid. 703.

Rule 703. Bases of Opinion Testimony by Experts

The facts or data in the particular case upon which an expert bases an opinion or inference may be those perceived by or made known to the expert, at or before the hearing. If of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject, the facts or data need not be admissible in evidence.

A. General. While Mil.R.Evid. 702 establishes the general requirement that the testimony of a qualified expert witness assist the trier of fact to understand an issue, Mil.R.Evid. 703 prescribes the permissible factual bases for the expert's opinion. It begins with the implicit assumption that an expert's opinion has a factual basis. This assumption is made explicit by Mil.R.Evid. 705, discussed in subsection 0720 infra. Mil.R.Evid. 703 then sets forth three possible sources of facts or data upon which the expert could rely in forming an opinion. This is an expansion on the single basis allowable for a lay witness' opinion (i.e., "the perception of the witness"). See Mil.R.Evid. 701(a).

B. Three bases

1. Personal perception. The first and most obvious way for an expert to learn the pertinent facts needed for forming an opinion is for the expert to personally perceive them. A doctor who has treated a patient is a common example. This basis is identical to that allowed for lay witnesses under Mil.R.Evid. 701.

2. Facts made known at the hearing. The second method of informing an expert of facts on which to base an opinion is to acquaint the expert with the facts at trial. This method may be done by either of two techniques. The first technique would be to present the pertinent facts in the form of the traditional hypothetical question which solicits the expert's opinion on the basis of the facts set forth in the question. Under the Mil.R.Evid., hypothetical questions need not assume facts in evidence or facts to be proven later, but the underlying assumptions must be within the range of issues and cannot assume facts utterly extrinsic to the evidence. See United States v. Breuer, 14 M.J. 723 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982). The second technique is to have the expert attend the trial, hear the evidence, and then offer an opinion based on the evidence heard in court. See, e.g., Sears, Roebuck Co. v. Penn Central Co., 420 F.2d 560 (1st Cir. 1970). This provision may be particularly useful with psychiatrists. See, e.g., United States v. Hammond, 17 M.J. 218 (C.M.A. 1984) (expert's discussion of victim's impairment due to rape trauma syndrome based on in-court observation of victim's testimony). See also United States v. Eastman, 20 M.J. 948 (A.F.C.M.R. 1985). If this latter method is used, counsel should remember the sequestration of witness provisions of Mil.R.Evid. 615 (discussed in part four infra). Mil.R.Evid. 705, discussed infra, may also be useful in determining which of the facts heard in court by the expert were actually used in forming an opinion.

3. Facts made known outside of court. The third permissible method of making facts known to an expert is to supply the expert data outside of the trial, even if the expert has no personal knowledge. Even if this information might itself be inadmissible as evidence, it may still form the basis for an expert's opinion provided it is "of a type reasonably relied upon by experts in the particular field in forming opinions or inferences upon the subject." Mil.R.Evid. 703. As the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee noted in its analysis to Fed.R.Evid. 703, medical diagnoses frequently are based on "statements by the patient and his relatives, reports and opinions from nurses, technicians and other doctors, hospital records, and x-rays." It is in a context such as this that the rule permits the use of "facts and data" (commonly hearsay) which would not be admissible themselves. The use of data from outside court raises several problems.

a. How does the military judge determine whether the facts used by the expert at trial are what experts in a particular field rely upon? The military judge can inquire of the expert witness, or call other expert witnesses and ask what they and their colleagues rely on, or the military judge could consult appropriate literature of the particular field. Mil.R.Evid. 703 contains no guidelines on this question, but C.M.A. has held that the appropriate standard for the military judge to employ is that found in Mil.R. Evid. 403; namely, whether the danger of unfair prejudice substantially outweighs the probative value. United States v. Neeley, 25 M.J. 105 (C.M.A. 1987). In that case, the accused was being prosecuted for premeditated murder and he presented an insanity defense. In rebuttal, the government called a clinical psychologist who testified that, in her opinion, the accused had deliberately inflated the results of his Minnesota Multiphasic Personality Inventory (a psychiatric test which she had administered to the accused prior to trial). She further testified that she had shown the results to three other psychologists and they had agreed with her assessment. C.M.A. held that Mil.R.Evid. 703 permits an expert to rely on the opinions of others and that the military judge did not abuse his discretion in admitting this testimony since it related primarily to her own opinion.

b. Another problem with the use of inadmissible facts is this: How does the expert testify as to an opinion without reporting some of the underlying facts? If the expert is required to state only the opinion without any of the facts upon which it is based, the trier of fact may not be able to properly evaluate the weight to be given the opinion. However, if the expert is given a free hand to state any facts upon which the opinion is based, Mil.R.Evid. 703 could become a tool to bypass many of the other rules and get inadmissible evidence before the members improperly. See United States v. Calogero, 44 M.J. 697 (C.G.C.C.A. 1996) (where double hearsay statement was not admissible for the truth of the matter asserted, but was admissible to show the underlying basis for the psychologist's expert opinion. The drafters' analysis refers to the possible need for a limiting instruction under Mil.R.Evid. 105 in this situation. Mil.R.Evid. 403 considerations are also applicable. The party opposing the expert witness may find it appropriate to make a motion in limine.

C. Confrontation. A constitutional challenge to Mil.R.Evid. 703 has been raised by some who argue that an accused's Sixth Amendment rights are violated when an expert gives opinion testimony based on data obtained from others who are not themselves presented as witnesses, since the accused is denied the opportunity to confront them. See United States v. Lawsen, 653 F.2d 299 (7th Cir. 1981), which stated in dictum that an expert's testimony based entirely on hearsay would violate the Confrontation Clause. Decisions supporting the Mil.R.Evid. 703 approach are based on the theory that the only evidence that the expert is presenting is the expert's own opinion and not the factual basis for the opinion. Since the expert is subject under this rule to cross-examination about the basis for the opinion, the trier of fact can adjust the weight to be given to the witness' opinion where the facts upon which it is based emanate from an unknown or unreliable source. See United States v. Williams, 447 F.2d 1285 (5th Cir. 1971) (en banc), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 954 (1972). This theory, and its acceptance, is dependent upon proper limitation of the expert's testimony as to inadmissible facts or data upon which the opinion is based. Although such Confrontation Clause problems were not discussed by C.M.A. in its decision in Neeley, 25 M.J. 105, it seems fairly unlikely that the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces would be very moved by a Confrontation Clause challenge to Mil.R.Evid. 703 on its face.

Mil.R.Evid. 705

Rule 705. Disclosure of Facts or Data Underlying Expert Opinion

The expert may testify in terms of opinion or inference and give the expert's reasons therefor without prior disclosure of the underlying facts or data, unless the military judge requires otherwise. The expert may in any event be required to disclose the underlying facts or data on cross-examination.

A. General. Mil.R.Evid. 705 authorizes the admission of the opinion testimony of an expert without prior disclosure of the facts or data which underlie the expert's opinion, unless the military judge requires otherwise. In that event, the rule leaves to cross-examination an inquiry into the factual basis for the witness' opinion. This rule is taken verbatim from the Federal rule. A basic thrust of the rule is that it allows the military judge to control whether the opinion may precede any statement of a basis for the opinion. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

B. Interplay with Mil.R.Evid. 703. Mil.R.Evid. 703 and 705 are closely related, since they both deal with the facts upon which an expert may base an opinion. As discussed in the last section of this part of the chapter, Mil.R.Evid. 703 sets forth the means by which an expert can obtain the factual basis for an opinion. Mil.R.Evid. 705 only obviates the need either for the expert to explain this factual basis or to have the facts repeated to the expert in a hypothetical question prior to having the expert state the opinion. The rules are most related when dealing with hypothetical questions and with testimony based on out-of-court facts or data.

1. Hypothetical questions. The traditional hypothetical question asks the expert to assume as true certain enumerated facts which are in evidence and could be found true by the trier of fact. The basic concept is that the expert is to give an opinion based on the facts set forth in the question, and that the trier may then accept the opinion if the trier finds as true the facts which formed the basis of the expert's opinion. As the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee points out in its note to Fed.R.Evid. 705:

The hypothetical question has been the target of a great deal of criticism as encouraging partisan bias, affording an opportunity for summing up in the middle of the case, and as complex and time consuming. Ladd, "Expert Testimony", 5 Vand. L. Rev. 414, 426-427 (1952). While the rule allows counsel to make disclosure of the underlying facts or data as a preliminary to the giving of an expert opinion, if he chooses, the instances in which he is required to do so are reduced. This is true whether the expert bases his opinion on data furnished him at secondhand or observed by him at firsthand.

In the article cited by the Committee, Dean Ladd stated:

A hypothetical question will always be difficult for the attorneys to frame, for the court to rule on, and for the jury to understand. Perhaps the one who suffers the most is the witness who is required to answer. Hypothetical questions have been the subject of justified criticism and even their abolishment has been urged. Partisan bias, length of questions, awkwardness and complexity of expression have placed a stigma upon them as an obstruction to the administration of justice.

Id. at 425, 427 (footnotes omitted). Mil.R.Evid. 705 offers a means to avoid these problems. There is nothing in the rule which forbids their use, however. It leaves the choice to counsel.

2. Inadmissible facts considered. In our prior discussion of Mil.R.Evid. 703, the problem of the use of inadmissible facts being revealed to members was addressed. During cross-examination under Mil.R.Evid. 705 into the factual basis for an opinion, the standards of Mil.R.Evid. 105 and 403 still apply. It may be possible for the inadmissible factual basis to be so prejudicial that counsel could argue that effective cross-examination would not be reasonably possible and ask the military judge to go so far as to preclude the admission of the expert's opinion on a Mil.R.Evid. 403 theory. More likely, the court would fashion an appropriate limiting instruction.

C. Responsibilities of counsel

1. Discovery. Mil.R.Evid. 705 relies upon effective cross-examination to reveal the factual basis for an expert's opinion which can then permit the trier of fact to determine the weight to give the testimony. The effectiveness of the cross-examination will depend, in part, upon whether counsel have effectively used the discovery devices discussed in chapter II of this study guide.

2. Trial tactics. As the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee notes: "[i]f the objection is made that leaving it to the cross-examiner to bring out the supporting data is essentially unfair, the answer is that he is under no compulsion to bring out any facts or data except those unfavorable to the opinion." Fed.R.Evid. 705 Advisory Committee note. Counsel should remember that it usually is to the advantage of the direct examiner to bring out the facts or data upon which an opinion is based, since an opinion will be worth only as much as the factual basis upon which it is founded. It is dangerous for a direct examiner to refrain from asking questions about the facts or data because the cross-examiner also may choose not to ask them and the answers may never find their way into evidence.

0721 OPINION ON ULTIMATE ISSUE. Mil.R.Evid. 704

Rule 704. Opinion on Ultimate Issue

Testimony in the form of an opinion or inference otherwise admissible is not objectionable because it embraces an ultimate issue to be decided by the trier of fact.

A. General. Opinion testimony is not objectionable on the grounds that it relates to an "ultimate issue" to be decided by the trier of fact. At common law, this was a proper objection. The rationale for explicitly abolishing the common law approach is in keeping with the basic approach of section VII of the rules (i.e., opinions that are helpful to the trier of fact should be admitted). See Fed.R.Evid. 704 Advisory Committee note.

Mil.R.Evid. 704 applies to both lay and expert witnesses. Any opinion that is "otherwise admissible" can be admitted despite the fact that it relates to an ultimate issue.

As the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee states in its note to Fed.R.Evid. 704, "the abolition of the ultimate issue rule does not lower the bars so as to admit all opinions." Litigation must now focus on whether an opinion is "otherwise admissible," not on whether an opinion goes to an ultimate issue. Thus, any debate on what constitutes an "ultimate issue" is moot. See, e.g., United States v. Snipes, 18 M.J. 172 (C.M.A. 1984) (experts testifying about the typical behavior of sexually abused children permitted to answer questions relating to the "believability" of the victim, and, by implication, the guilt of the accused). On the other hand, military case law makes clear that Mil.R.Evid. 704 does not permit one witness to comment or express an opinion on the truthfulness of another witness' testimony. Such issues have arisen most often in child molestation cases. For example, in one such case, it was held to be error (though harmless in light of the overpowering evidence against the accused) for a government psychiatrist, on the basis of his pretrial interviews with the victim, to express his opinion that the victim had actually had a sexual encounter with the accused. United States v. Arruza, 26 M.J. 234 (C.M.A. 1988) cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1011 (1989). And, in United States v. Cameron, 21 M.J. 59 (C.M.A. 1985), it was held to be reversible error for a social worker to express the opinion that the twelve year-old-victim was being truthful when she reported the sexual abuse to her.

B. Otherwise admissible. Mil.R.Evid. 701 and 705 require that the opinion have a factual basis. Mil.R.Evid. 701 and 702 require that the opinions of lay and expert witnesses assist the trier of fact. Mil.R.Evid. 403 provides for the exclusion of evidence that wastes time. Thus, if a witness' opinion will do little more than tell the court members what result to reach, it will be inadmissible. For example, a witness cannot testify that "the accused is guilty." This adds nothing to assist the trier of fact. The drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 704 plainly states that "the rule does not permit the witness to testify as to his or her opinion as to the guilt or innocence of the accused or to state legal opinions. Rather it simply allows testimony involving an issue which must be decided by the trier of fact. Although the two may be closely related, they are distinct as a matter of law."

The military judge is the "sole source of the law" and witnesses should not be allowed to testify on the status of the law, just as counsel are forbidden to argue law to the members. Hearing statements of "the law" from several sources would not be helpful to the members. See Mil.R.Evid. 403, 701, and 702. The limited Federal litigation of Fed.R.Evid. 704 in criminal cases has focused primarily on whether the witness' opinion involved "inadequately explored legal criteria." For example, in United States v. Baskes, 649 F.2d 471, 478 (7th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 450 U.S. 1000 (1981), the defendant wished to cross-examine a co-conspirator as to whether the witness did "unlawfully, knowingly, and willfully conspire to defraud the United States" along with the defendant. The Court of Appeals found that such an opinion of the scope of criminal law would not be helpful under Rule 701 and thus was not "otherwise admissible." See also United States v. Ness, 665 F.2d 248 (8th Cir. 1981). But see United States v. Kelly, 679 F.2d 135 (8th Cir. 1982). A similar problem arises when a psychiatrist is asked whether an accused is "legally insane." Asking if the accused is "insane" is permissible, provided, of course, that the witness is properly qualified to render that opinion. To avoid problems in this area, counsel should assure themselves that a question posed to the witness does not assume that the witness understands legal terms or definitions and does not ask the witness to answer in legal terms unless the witness is qualified as an expert in legal matters. Permission of the military judge for any questioning on legalities should be sought as a preliminary matter. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

0722 COURT APPOINTED EXPERTS. Mil.R.Evid. 706.

Rule 706. Court Appointed Experts

- (a) Appointment and compensation. The trial counsel, the defense counsel, and the court-martial have equal opportunity to obtain expert witnesses under Article 46. The employment and compensation of expert witnesses is governed by R.C.M. 703.
- (b) Disclosure of employment. In the exercise of discretion, the military judge may authorize disclosure to the members of the fact that the military judge called an expert witness.
- (c) Accused's experts of own selection. Nothing in this rule limits the accused in calling expert witnesses of the accused's own selection and at the accused's own expense.

Mil.R.Evid. 706 represents a substantial redraft of Fed.R.Evid. 706 in order to conform it to the needs of the military.

A. Appointment and compensation. Mil.R.Evid. 706(a) simply restates the law that all parties to the trial, including the military judge and members, have a right to obtain expert witnesses. See Article 46, UCMJ and Mil.R.Evid. 614. The procedural means by which an expert witness may be obtained at government expense differ from those procedures used to obtain lay witnesses. R.C.M. 703(d). See United States v. Worstell 44 M.J. 799 (A.F.C.C.A. 1996) for discussion on the "necessity" requirement of R.C.M. 703(d).

Mil.R.Evid. 706(c) is similar to Fed.R.Evid. 706(d) in making it clear that the defense may call its own expert witnesses if the defense pays their expenses. See United States v. Dubose, 44 M.J. 782 (N.M.C.C.A. 1996). The calling of the accused's own witnesses would be subject to the relevancy provision of Mil.R.Evid. 402 and 403.

B. Experts called by the military judge. Mil.R.Evid. 614 provides that the military judge may call witnesses, and this may include calling expert witnesses. Mil.R.Evid. 706(b), taken from Fed.R.Evid. 706(c), authorizes the military judge to inform the members that the judge has called an expert witness. This presents the problem that the court members will associate the witness with the military judge and accord the testimony greater weight. If the military judge does decide to use subsection (b), care must be taken to give a fair instruction that the witness' testimony is not to be accorded any extra weight.

0723 FINAL COMMENTS. The rules on opinion testimony and the use of expert witnesses are simple and fairly straightforward. Their philosophy of encouraging assistance to the trier of fact is clear. In most cases, there will be no serious question that an expert can testify provided that counsel properly qualify the witness as an expert. The real questions in this area are those of trial tactics and strategy. These are beyond the scope of the text and the reader is referred to the many trial advocacy materials available to the practitioner. See, e.g., Michael E. Tigar, Handling the Expert Like an Expert: Back to Basics, 14 The Advocate 13 (1982).

PART FOUR: TRIAL PRACTICE RULES OF EVIDENCE

0724 INTRODUCTION. Some of the rules of Section VI of the Mil.R.Evid. may be thought of as "trial practice rules of evidence." These are often distinguished from the "substantive rules of evidence" found in Sections III-V, VII-X, and the first part of Section VI. The trial practice rules should not be thought of as lesser cousins, however. Unlike many of the more substantive rules that are rarely used, counsel will deal with the trial practice rules in every court-martial and, without them, a trial would have no order.

Foremost in the trial practice group is Mil.R.Evid. 611 since it deals with the military judge's control over the mode and order of interrogation and presentation of testimony, the scope of cross-examination, and the use of leading questions. Closely related in subject matter, but not in importance or frequency of use, is Mil.R.Evid. 614 which provides for the calling and interrogation of witnesses by the military judge and members. Mil.R.Evid. 615 on the exclusion, or sequestration, of witnesses has become virtually automatic. The specific testimonial situation of "refreshing memory" is examined by Mil.R.Evid. 612. Although based on a common law rule, the codification in Mil.R.Evid. 612 has been judicially expanded to become a discovery tool. There are other trial practice or procedural rules in the Mil.R.Evid. (such as Mil.R.Evid. 608 and 613), but they are examined elsewhere in this study guide.

This part of the chapter will look briefly at each of the rules mentioned in the previous paragraph and then analyze the use of various testimonial evidence. This discussion will reveal the interrelationship of the rules and the procedural provisions of the Manual for Courts-Martial. Although these latter sections will make some mention of strategies in the use of testimonial evidence and give several examples, it is not the intent of this section to be a discussion of trial advocacy. The reader is referred to appropriate NJS trial advocacy materials for such discussions. See, e.g., NJS, Aids to Practice; NJS, Evidentiary Foundations; and NJS, Trial Advocacy Practical Exercises.

0725           MODE AND ORDER OF INTERROGATION AND PRESENTATION.
Mil.R.Evid. 611. (Key Number 220)

Rule 611. Mode and Order of Interrogation and Presentation

(a)    Control by the military judge. The military judge shall exercise reasonable control over the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence so as to (1) make the interrogation and presentation effective for the ascertainment of the truth, (2) avoid needless consumption of time, and (3) protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment.

(b)    Scope of cross-examination. Cross-examination should be limited to the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the credibility of the witness. The military judge may, in the exercise of discretion, permit inquiry into additional matters as if on direct examination.

(c)    Leading questions. Leading questions should not be used on the direct examination of a witness except as may be necessary to develop the testimony of the witness. Ordinarily leading questions should be permitted on cross-examination. When a party calls a hostile witness or a witness identified with an adverse party, interrogation may be by leading questions.

A.    Control by the military judge. Mil.R.Evid. 611(a) is a basic source of the military judge's power to control proceedings at court-martial. Although taken without change from Fed.R.Evid. 611(a), it is a reflection of the military judge's traditional powers and broad discretion. According to the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee, in its note to Fed.R.Evid. 611(a): "Spelling out detailed rules to govern the mode and order of interrogating witnesses and presenting evidence is neither desirable nor feasible. The ultimate responsibility for the effective working of the adversary system rests with the judge. The rule sets forth the objectives which he should seek to attain." The three objectives the military judge should try to attain will now be discussed.

1. The first objective is to ensure that the evidence is presented in an efficient manner so as to maximize the ascertainment of truth. This is a broad restatement of the power and obligation of the judge as developed under common law. See Mil.R.Evid. 102 and Fed.R.Evid. 611 Advisory Committee note. Mil.R.Evid. 611(a) allows the military judge to control the use of real or demonstrative evidence, to determine whether counsel may ask narrative questions or must ask questions requiring specific answers, and to control the order in which witnesses may testify and the internal ordering of a particular witness' testimony. It also covers "the many other questions arising during the course of a trial which can be solved only by the judge's common sense and fairness in view of the particular circumstances." Fed.R.Evid. 611(a) Advisory Committee note. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has recognized for some time the obligation of the military judge to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial. See, e.g., United States v. Graves, 1 M.J. 50 (C.M.A. 1975). This obligation on the part of the judge is demonstrated in the rules' use of "shall exercise reasonable control," (Mil.R.Evid. 611(a), emphasis added), rather than the discretionary "may" of the 1971 draft of the Fed.R.Evid.

2. The military judge's second objective is to avoid needless consumption of time, a matter of daily concern in the disposition of cases. See generally United States v. Wright, 13 M.J. 824, 827 (A.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 13 M.J. 480 (C.M.A. 1983). See also United States v. Ryster, 42 M.J. 488 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (it was within MJ's discretion following two month hiatus in trial during government's case, to refresh memories of members by giving each member a redacted record of trial to review despite accused's contention that allowing members to read the evidence/record unduly emphasized government's case). The same objective underlies the discretion vested in the judge to exclude evidence as a waste of time in Mil.R.Evid. 403(b). Cumulative or redundant evidence can be controlled under this provision.

3. The third objective calls for the judge to protect witnesses from harassment or undue embarrassment. The Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee notes that this objective calls for a judgment under the particular circumstances whether interrogation tactics entail harassment or undue embarrassment. Pertinent circumstances include the importance of the testimony, the nature of the inquiry, its relevance to credibility, waste of time, and confusion. In Alford v. United States, 282 U.S. 687, 694, 51 S.Ct. 218, 75 L.Ed. 624 (1931), the Court pointed out that, while the trial judge should protect the witness from questions which "go beyond the bounds of proper cross-examination merely to harass, annoy or humiliate," this protection by no means forecloses efforts to discredit the witness.

Fed.R.Evid. 611(a) Advisory Committee note (internal citation omitted).

Not all embarrassing questions are prohibited under the rule. Only unduly embarrassing questions are prohibited. Questions asked merely to belittle the witness or subject the witness to public ridicule are unduly embarrassing. It should be emphasized, however, that "undue embarrassment" is not to be confused with the normal degree of embarrassment which is nearly always attendant upon an impeachment of the witness' credibility, especially when such impeachment results from some showing of bias or a motive to fabricate. Thus, for example, in a prosecution for larceny, where it was alleged that the accused had conspired to commit the larceny with another servicemember and one of the key witnesses against the accused was the wife of the co-conspirator, it did not constitute "undue embarrassment" of the witness to cross-examine her about whether she had committed adultery with the accused, especially in view of the defense offer to prove that the co-conspirator had found out about her adultery and had beaten his wife as a result. Such evidence constituted a motive on the part of the witness to fabricate testimony against the accused and the military judge therefore erred in precluding cross-examination of the witness on this point. United States v. Hayes, 15 M.J. 650 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983).

4. Although the military judge has the discretion to alter the sequence of proof to the extent that the burden of proof is not affected, the usual sequence for examination of witnesses is: prosecution witnesses, defense witnesses, prosecution rebuttal witnesses, defense rebuttal witnesses, and witnesses for the court. The usual order of examination of a witness is: direct examination, cross-examination, redirect examination, recross-examination, and examination by the court. R.C.M. 913(c) (discussion). This order will be outlined specifically in subsection 0729, infra.

B. Scope of cross-examination. A party's cross-examination is limited to the subject matter of direct testimony plus examination into the witness' credibility. As a result, if a party intends to exceed the bounds of direct examination, that inquiry usually should occur during the party's own case and not as part of the opponent's. But the discretion afforded the military judge permits more liberal cross-examination when it will assist in understanding evidence or is necessary to avoid burdening witnesses with several court appearances. If the cross-examiner exceeds the scope of direct examination, the new material must be elicited as if on direct examination. This means no leading questions under subdivision (c) of the rule, unless special circumstances permit leading questions had the witness actually been called to testify by the cross-examiner.

Mil.R.Evid. 611(b) does not address specifically when and to what extent an accused may be cross-examined. The drafters of the Mil.R.Evid. have attempted to address this problem with Mil.R.Evid. 301(e), which states that an accused who voluntarily testifies waives the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination only with respect to those matters contained in his direct examination. The scope of the waiver is controlled by the accused's answers, not defense counsel's questions. Chapter VII, infra, has a complete discussion of this area.

C. Leading questions. The drafters' analysis to Fed.R.Evid. 611 defines a leading question as "one which suggests the answer it is desired that the witness give." Generally, a question that is susceptible to being answered by "yes" or "no" is a leading question. The "forms of questions" section of this part of the chapter will give examples of how to ask nonleading questions.

The rule continues the traditional view that the suggestive powers of the leading question are as a general proposition undesirable. Within this tradition, however, numerous exceptions have achieved recognition: The witness who is hostile, unwilling, or biased; the child witness or the adult with communication problems; the witness whose recollection is exhausted; and undisputed preliminary matters. 3 Wigmore 774-778. An almost total unwillingness to reverse for infractions has been manifested by appellate courts. See cases cited in 3 Wigmore 770. The matter clearly falls within the area of control by the judge over the mode and order of interrogation and presentation and accordingly is phrased in words of suggestion rather than command.

Fed.R.Evid. 611(c) Advisory Committee note.

The specific uses of leading questions normally allowable under the exceptions to the general rule will be examined in the section on forms of questions, infra.

Mil.R.Evid. 611(c) makes the use of leading questions on cross-examination a matter of right (i.e., "Ordinarily leading questions should be permitted . . ."). The purpose of the qualification "ordinarily" is to furnish a basis for denying the use of leading questions when the cross-examination is cross-examination in form only, and not in fact; as, for example, the "cross-examination" by a party of a witness who is friendly to it and considered adverse to the direct examination (such as a chief-master-at-arms called by defense counsel might be).

The third sentence of 611(c) allows leading questions to be asked on direct examination when a party calls a hostile witness or a witness identified with an adverse party. The drafters leave the term "hostile witness" undefined. Under previous military practice, counsel had to demonstrate a witness' hostility before asking leading questions. This meant something more than showing the witness was unfavorable. Counsel had to establish that the witness would not adequately respond to questions and had been unwilling to cooperate during pretrial discussions. This situation is particularly likely to occur in the military where defense counsel will often have to call witnesses aligned with the command in order to establish a defense. Such witnesses may be unwilling to assist defense counsel. As a result, normal direct examination will prove troublesome and may, in fact, produce harmful testimony due to counsel's inability to limit effectively the witness' responses. Even if a witness cannot be shown to be "actually" hostile, it may be that most officers and senior enlisted personnel will be "identified with" the government. The "identified with" language of the rule should make it less necessary in many cases to make a finding about actual hostility. Stephen A. Saltzburg, et. al, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 689 (3rd ed. 1991).

0726            CALLING AND INTERROGATION OF WITNESSES BY THE COURT-MARTIAL. Mil.R.Evid. 614

Rule 614. Calling and Interrogation of Witnesses by the Court-Martial

(a)    Calling by the court-martial. The military judge may, sua sponte or at the request of the members or the suggestion of a party, call witnesses, and all parties are entitled to cross-examine witnesses thus called. When the members wish to call or recall a witness, the military judge shall determine whether it is appropriate to do so under these rules or this Manual.

(b)    Interrogation by the court-martial. The military judge or members may interrogate witnesses, whether called by the military judge, the members, or a party. Members shall submit their questions to the military judge in writing so that a ruling may be made on the propriety of the questions or the course of questioning and so that questions may be asked on behalf of the court by the military judge in a form acceptable to the military judge. When a witness who has not testified previously is called by the military judge or the members, the military judge may conduct the direct examination or may assign the responsibility to counsel for any party.

(c) Objections. Objections to the calling of witnesses by the military judge or the members or to the interrogation by the military judge or the members may be made at the time or at the next available opportunity when the members are not present.

Mil.R.Evid. 614 is taken from Fed.R.Evid. 614, but has been modified to recognize the power of the court members and military judge to call and examine witnesses.

A. Calling of witnesses. Subsection (a) recognizes that, even though the adversary nature of the judicial process requires that the trial of a court-martial normally be left to the trial and defense counsel, the military judge or court members may desire to call witnesses in the search for justice. For example, this might be necessary to avoid collusion of counsel in carefully scripting a case. This rule is another example of judicial discretion. In determining whether a witness should be called, the military judge should balance the need to clarify or supplement the evidence presented by the parties against the possibility of interfering with the parties' control of their case. The judge will normally exercise this discretion with restraint, however, and, in close cases, tip the scale in favor of calling all the witnesses in the case. As noted in the case of United States v. Liddy, 509 F.2d 428 (D.C. Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 420 U.S. 911, 95 S.Ct. 4 (1975):

The precepts of fair trial and judicial objectivity do not require a judge to be inert. The trial judge is properly governed by the interest of justice and truth, and is not compelled to act as if he were merely presiding at a sporting match. . . . A federal trial judge has inherent authority not only to comment on the evidence adduced by counsel, but also—in appropriate instances—to call or recall and question witnesses. He may do this when he believes the additional testimony will be helpful to the jurors in ascertaining the truth and discharging their fact-finding function. What is required, however, are reins of restraint, that he not comport himself in such a way as to "tilt" or over steer the jury or control their deliberations.

Any witness called by the military judge or court members may be examined by both sides as if on cross-examination; thus, leading questions can be used. This is one reason for counsel to note the provision of the rule that provides that the judge may call a witness at "the suggestion of a party." Mil.R.Evid. 614(a).

The case law suggests that the military judge has broad discretion in determining the nature and number of questions to ask. Additionally, the degree of flexibility which the military judge possesses in this area depends to some extent on the forum election made by the accused. Clearly, if the military judge is the trier of fact, then concerns about influencing the members do not come into play. On the other hand, where the trial is by members, the military judge must be much more careful about maintaining a scrupulously impartial demeanor when questioning witnesses.

Thus, for example, in United States v. Bouie, 18 M.J. 529 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984), a special court-martial by military judge alone involving complicated evidence relating to allegations of false claims allegedly made by the accused, the military judge did not abandon his impartial role, despite asking some 370 questions of the accused during his testimony in the trial on the merits. On the other hand, in United States v. Thomas, 18 M.J. 545 (A.C.M.R. 1984), a special court-martial by members, it was held that the military judge abandoned his impartial role by repeatedly berating the defense counsel in front of the members; by restricting the defense's voir dire, cross-examination, and closing argument; by suggesting to the trial counsel ways of getting evidence admitted; and by posing some 375 questions of various witnesses during trial on the merits (some 35 to the accused), questions which were evidently intended to elicit evidence favorable to the prosecution.

The rule makes it clear that the calling of a witness by the judge is contingent upon compliance with the Mil.R.Evid. and Rules for Courts-Martial. The testimony must be relevant and not prohibited by any provision of the Mil.R.Evid. or Manual for Courts-Martial. This may require the judge to instruct the members that a requested witness cannot be called.

B. Interrogation by the court-martial. Mil.R.Evid. 614(b) allows the military judge or court members to interrogate any witness, whether called by the parties or the court.

1. Procedure. The rule requires that the members' questions be in writing and submitted to the military judge for approval. The military judge will then ask the question if approved. Although the rule does not specify how the written questions by members should be handled procedurally, it is recommended that the member asking the question sign the paper on which the question is written and that all such papers be attached to the record of trial as an appellate exhibit.

2. Form of question. The rule allows the military judge to rephrase a member's question in a "form acceptable to the military judge." Mil.R.Evid. 614(b). The drafters' analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 614(b) notes, however, that "[i]t is the Committee's intent that the military judge alter the questions only to the extent necessary to ensure compliance with these Rules and Manual." MCM, 1984, app. 22-44.

3. Witnesses not having testified previously. The rule provides that when a witness who has not testified previously is called by the military judge, either sua sponte or at the members' request, the judge may conduct the direct examination or may assign the responsibility to any counsel. In order to retain the appearance of propriety, it would normally be preferable for the military judge not to conduct the initial questioning. If the military judge designates a party to conduct the evidence examination, past practice indicates that this usually will be the party standing to benefit the most from such evidence. In any event, both parties may proceed as if on cross-examination and may use leading questions. Therefore, the term "direct examination," used in Mil.R.Evid. 614(b) to define the scope of cross-examination, probably means an initial questioning rather than the restrictive direct examination imposed when a party calls a witness as its own. This seems to be a fair reading of the subsection in light of Mil.R.Evid. 614(a).

4. Impartiality. In questioning witnesses, including the accused who has become a witness, the military judge and the court members must be careful not to depart from an impartial role. United States v. Ramios, 42 M.J. 392 (C.A.A.F. 1995); United States v. Loving, 41 M.J. 213 (C.A.A.F. 1994). Court members should generally limit their questions to those that clarify the witness' testimony. When questioning the accused, the court members must confine themselves to questions which would be permissible on cross-examination of the accused by trial counsel. United States v. Sellars, 17 C.M.A. 116, 37 C.M.R. 380 (1967). Neither the military judge nor members may question an accused concerning information presented in an unsworn statement. United States v. Whitt, 9 M.J. 953 (N.M.C.M.R. 1980); United States v. Evans, 35 M.J. 754 (N.M.C.M.R. 1992).

United States v. Brandt, 196 F.2d 653 (2d Cir. 1952), gives an example of a judge exceeding the bounds of propriety. In Brandt, the trial judge asked more than 800 questions, cross-examined witnesses at length, underlined inconsistencies in the defense, and elicited admissions bearing upon the credibility of defense witnesses. Reversing, the appellate court outlined the judge's duty:

[H]e enjoys the prerogative, rising often to the standard of a duty, of eliciting those facts he deems necessary to the clear presentation of the issues. . . . To this end he may call witnesses on his own motion, adduce evidence, and himself examine those who testify. . . . But he nonetheless must remain the judge, impartial, judicious and, above all, responsible for a courtroom atmosphere in which guilt or innocence may be soberly and fairly tested.

One way to limit any appearance of impropriety would be for the military judge to suggest to counsel that inquiry into an area might be appropriate rather than having the judge question the witness.

C. Objections. Mil.R.Evid. 614(c) provides that if counsel has an objection to any examination conducted by the court members or the military judge, or the military judge's decision to call or recall a witness, the objection need not be made in the members' presence, but may be raised "at the next available opportunity when the members are not present." While this appears to be in conflict with Mil.R.Evid. 103's requirement for timely objections, the drafters recognized that a timely objection here may either alienate the court members or demonstrate a conflict with the military judge. Counsel's appropriate response, if they desire to object to a question or the calling of a witness in a members case, is to request an article 39(a) session. Naval military judges will not generally allow side-bar conferences.

As a practical matter, most military judges use the simple expedient of requiring the bailiff to pass the member's written question to each counsel so that each counsel may indicate in writing on the face of the question whether counsel objects to the question. In order to ensure that a counsel may lodge an objection without alerting the members to which party is objecting, the military judge will normally require that the members' questions be written on preprinted questionnaires which are drafted in such a manner that, even if one counsel has no objection, the counsel is still required to so indicate on the face of the questionnaire.

0727            EXCLUSION OF WITNESSES. Mil.R.Evid. 615.

Rule 615. Exclusion of Witnesses

At the request of the prosecution or defense the military judge shall order witnesses excluded so that they cannot hear the testimony of other witnesses, and the military judge may make the order sua sponte. This rule does not authorize exclusion of (1) the accused, or (2) a member of an armed service or an employee of the United States designated as representative of the United States by the trial counsel, or (3) a person whose presence is shown by a party to be essential to the presentation of the party's case.

A.     General. Mil.R.Evid. 615 requires the military judge to exclude witnesses at the request of a party or upon the military judge's own motion. The rule is justified on the theory that, by preventing a witness from hearing the testimony of another witness, the risk of fabrication, collusion, and inaccuracy is minimized.

This rule is one of the few that deprives the military judge generally of discretion. It is the duty of the military judge to exclude witnesses upon request, except when they fall within one of the three exceptions to the rule. When they do fall within an exception, the rule does not authorize exclusion—meaning exclusion is not to be permitted.

The rule provides no explicit provision should a witness fail to comply with the exclusion rule. Some courts have gone so far as to exclude or strike the witness' testimony, but this is rather harsh and rarely used. See, e.g., United States v. Tolbert, 496 F.2d 154 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 857 (1974). A more likely remedy would be for the judge to permit counsel to comment on the violation as a matter relating to witness credibility. The military judge might also give an appropriate instruction concerning the matter.

In order for sequestration to be effective, the military judge should instruct the witnesses not to discuss their testimony with anyone other than counsel for either side or the accused.

B. Exceptions

1. Accused. The first exception is merely a recognition of the accused's rights to confrontation and due process under the Sixth Amendment. See Geders v. United States, 425 U.S. 80 (1976). As the drafters' analysis to 615 notes: "Rule 615 does not prohibit exclusion of either accused or counsel due to misbehavior when such exclusion is not prohibited by the Constitution of the United States, the Uniform Code of Military Justice, this Manual or these Rules." Mil.R.Evid. 615 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-45.

2. Designated representatives of the United States. The second exception allows the trial counsel to designate a member of the military, or an employee of the United States (e.g., a Navy officer psychiatrist or agent of the Naval Criminal Investigative Service), as a representative of the government. That individual, even though called to testify, need not be sequestered. Congress specifically intended that investigative agents be included in the potential designees.

The practice is permitted as an exception to the rule of exclusion and compares with the situation defense counsel finds himself in—he always has the client with him to consult during the trial.

The investigative agent's presence may be extremely important to government counsel, especially when the case is complex or involves some specialized subject matter. The agent, too, having lived with the case for a long time, may be able to assist in meeting trial surprises where the best-prepared counsel would otherwise have difficulty.

S. Rep. No. 1277, 93d Cong., 2d Sess. 26, reprinted in 20 Sup. Ct. Dig. at 216.

See United States v. Alvarado, 647 F.2d 537 (5th Cir. 1981), where it was held to be within the judge's discretion to allow more than one government witness to remain in the courtroom, even though one was to testify late in the government's case.

3. Person whose presence shown to be essential to a party's case. The third exception places discretion in the military judge by requiring a determination as to whether a party has shown that the presence of a witness is essential to its case. The normal situation for invoking the subsection would be where "an expert [is] needed to advise counsel." Fed.R.Evid. 615 Advisory Committee note. In the military context this will most likely be a psychiatrist, although other experts might be used in appropriate cases. See Mil.R.Evid. 703; United States v. Banks, 36 M.J. 150 (C.M.A. 1992) (proper for defense expert to sit at counsel table during government expert's testimony). See also Government of the Virgin Islands v. Edinborough, 625 F.2d 472 (3d Cir. 1980) (presence of the mother of a 13-year-old rape victim was considered essential during her daughter's testimony).

4. Mil.R.Evid. 412 contains another exception to the general rule of excluding witnesses. Mil. R. Evid. 412 now affords any alleged victim a reasonable opportunity to attend and be heard at a closed article 39(a) session (which was substituted for the previous in camera hearing required by the Federal Rule).

0728            WRITING USED TO REFRESH MEMORY. Mil.R.Evid. 612.
(Key Number 1147)

Rule 612. Writing Used to Refresh Memory

If a witness uses a writing to refresh his or her memory for the purpose of testifying, either

(1) while testifying, or

(2) before testifying, if the military judge determines it is necessary in the interests of justice, an adverse party is entitled to have the writing produced at the hearing, to inspect it, to cross-examine the witness thereon, and to introduce in evidence those portions which relate to the testimony of the witness. If it is claimed that the writing contains privileged information or matters not related to the subject matter of the testimony, the military judge shall examine the writing in camera, excise any privileged information or any portions not so related, and order delivery of the remainder to the party entitled thereto. Any portion withheld over objections shall be attached to the record of trial as an appellate exhibit. If a writing is not produced or delivered pursuant to order under this rule, the military judge shall make any order justice requires, except that when the prosecution elects not to comply, the order shall be one striking the testimony, or, if in discretion of the military judge it is determined that the interests of justice so require, declaring a mistrial. This rule does not preclude disclosure of information required to be disclosed under other provisions of these rules or this Manual.

A. General

1. Comparison to Fed.R.Evid. 612. Mil.R.Evid. 612 codifies the doctrine of "present recollection refreshed or reviewed" or "refreshed memory," and is taken generally from the Federal rule; but discards the language of Fed.R.Evid. 612 that expressly subjected it to the disclosure shield provisions of the Jencks Act, 18 U.S.C. § 3500 (1982). The drafters of the Mil.R.Evid. deleted the Jencks Act reference since "such shielding was considered to be inappropriate in view of the general military practice and policy which utilizes and encourages broad discovery on behalf of the defense." Mil.R.Evid. 612 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-44.

2. Under Mil.R.Evid. 612, the right to examine writings includes those used before testifying if the interests of justice will thereby be served. This inspection again involves judicial discretion. As can be seen, the Fed.R.Evid. Advisory Committee and Congress anticipated that the discretionary nature of the provision would guard against fishing expeditions directed at attorney work-product or other privileged information:

a. "The purpose of the phrase 'for the purpose of testifying' is to safeguard against using the rule as a pretext for wholesale exploration of an opposing party's files and to insure that access is limited only to those writings which may fairly be said in fact to have an impact upon the testimony of the witness." Fed.R.Evid. 612 Advisory Committee note.

b. "The Committee considered that permitting an adverse party to require the production of writings used before testifying could result in fishing expeditions among a multitude of papers which a witness may have used in preparing for trial." H.R. Rep. No. 650, 93d Cong., 1st Sess. 13, reprinted in 20 Sup. Ct. Dig. at 171.

3. Mil.R.Evid. 612 does not affect in any way information required to be disclosed under any other rule or portion of the Manual for Courts-Martial. See, e.g., Mil.R.Evid. 304(c)(1).

B. Expansion of meanings — Writings. Mil.R.Evid. 612 does not state what qualifies as a "writing" to refresh memory. Additionally, there is no requirement that the writing be prepared by the witness. Mil.R.Evid. 1001 contains a liberal definition of writings in the context of section X: "'Writings' and 'recordings' consist of letters, words, or numbers, or their equivalent, set down by handwriting, typewriting, printing, photostating, photographing, magnetic impulse, mechanical or electronic recording, or other form of data compilation." But Federal practice has given it an even broader meaning. To quote Judge Learned Hand: "Anything may in fact revive a memory: a song, a scent, a photograph, an allusion, even a past statement known to be false." United States v. Razpy, 157 F.2d 964, 967 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 329 U.S. 806 (1947). It is anticipated that the military courts will follow this liberal Federal practice.

C. Traditional approach: refreshing memory while testifying. Mil.R.Evid. 612 does not state the method by which counsel are to use writings to refresh the witness' memory. It is recommended that the traditional approach to refreshing recollection continue to be used.

1. Requirements

a. A proper foundation, showing both that the memory of the witness has failed and that there is some means whereby the witness' memory can be refreshed, must first be laid.

b. Where an object, such as a previously signed statement, is used to refresh recollection, it need not meet the requirements of admissibility since it is not an exhibit for the proponent.

c. Opposing counsel has the right to inspect the object used to refresh recollection, use it in cross-examination of the witness, and to introduce those portions that relate to the testimony of the witness.

d. Where a writing or memorandum is used to refresh recollection, the witness may not read to the court matter contained therein. Witnesses must read it to themselves, and testify from their own independent recollection; they may not merely recite what they just read.

e. The source of the evidence is the witness' refreshed memory and not the document used to do the refreshing.

2. Laying the foundation

– Two requirements:

(1) Examining counsel must show that the memory of the witness has failed; and

(2) examining counsel must show there is some means in existence by which the witness can refresh his or her recollection.

3. It is recommended that the item used to refresh recollection be offered as an appellate exhibit and appended to the record of trial. Of course, under Mil.R.Evid. 612, the opponent may offer the document, or relevant parts of it, into evidence as his or her exhibit.

D. *Privileged information or matters

1. Discussion. Under either the so-called "absolute" right of disclosure of items used while testifying or the discretionary provision for items used before testifying, items may be protected if they contain privileged information or matters not related to the content of the witness' testimony. See Section V, Mil.R.Evid. If a party makes such claims, the military judge shall order the document produced and shall examine it in camera. If the military judge determines the document does not fall within the exception, the objection will be overruled; if the military judge determines that only a portion of the document's contents falls within the exception, the military judge will excise the protected matter and order the remainder of the item, if any, turned over to opposing counsel.

2. Attachment to record. The rule provides that, if any material is withheld, it must be appended to the record of trial. Yet the rule and the drafters' analysis to the rule are silent as to how this should be done. In order to protect the privileged or otherwise protected matter, some form of sealing would seem appropriate. Compare Mil.R.Evid. 612 with Mil.R.Evid. 505 and Mil.R.Evid. 506 as to protective measures.

3. Corrective action. If the military judge's order is rejected, the judge may order corrective action. Any order that justice requires may be entered against the accused but, if the government withholds evidence, either the striking of the direct testimony or a mistrial will result.

E. *Items used before trial. Mil.R.Evid. 612 expands the scope of potential discovery to include items examined before trial. Yet it fails to suggest any time restraints as to the length of time before trial that a writing used by the witness can be said to be "refreshing" memory. No definitive answer is possible, but counsel's attention is invited to the language "for the purpose of testifying" in the rule. Mil.R.Evid. 612.

In any event, one standard question to a witness on cross-examination, especially a law enforcement agent, is "Did you at any time prior to trial consult any document, file, or other writing in preparation for today?" If the witness responds in the affirmative, counsel should ask for the document before conducting any further cross-examination, inspect it, and, if necessary, move for its admission to establish any inconsistencies or inaccuracies.

F. Distinguished from past recollection recorded

1. Refreshing memory should not be confused with the past recollection recorded exception to the hearsay rule.

The primary difference between the two classifications is the ability of the witness to testify from present knowledge: where the witness' memory is revived, and he presently recollects the facts and swears to them, he is obviously in a different position from the witness who cannot directly state the facts from present memory and who must ask the court to accept a writing for the truth of its contents because he is willing to swear, for one reason or another, that its contents are true.

United States v. Riccardi, 174 F.2d 883, 886 (3d Cir.), cert. denied, 337 U.S. 941 (1949).

2. This distinction is significant in that, when a writing is used to refresh a witness' memory, the writing itself is not the primary evidence. Rather, the oral testimony of the witness whose memory has been refreshed constitutes the evidence. Witnesses may be cross-examined as to their capacity for memory and perception, their determination to tell the truth, and so on. Mil.R.Evid. 612 governs the use of writings so offered to refresh present recollection. On the other hand, past recollection recorded is not open to the same scrutiny by opposing counsel because the writing, and not the witness' oral testimony, is offered as evidence. See Mil.R.Evid. 803(5) and chapter VIII of this study guide.

0729 STAGES IN THE PRESENTATION OF EVIDENCE ON THE MERITS. R.C.M. 903.

A. Presenting the case to the court:

1. Witnesses for the government

– The government introduces all admissible evidence to establish the elements of the offense such as:

- (1) All evidence on the corpus delicti; and
- (2) all evidence on the identity of accused and the pleading, as well as matters in aggravation.

2. Witnesses for the defense. The defense introduces all admissible evidence to establish either:

- a. Any general or affirmative defense;
  - b. the denial or explanation of facts adduced by the government;
- or
- c. the impeachment of government witnesses by means other than cross-examination.

3. Witnesses for the government in rebuttal

- a. The government introduces evidence to deny, explain, or discredit facts and witnesses adduced by the defense during its case-in-chief.
- b. Testimony is usually limited to issues raised by the defense case-in-chief, but the court in its discretion may allow new material. Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

4. Witnesses for the defense in rebuttal. The accused introduces evidence to deny, explain, or discredit facts and witnesses adduced by the government during its case-in-rebuttal.

5. Witnesses for the court. Mil.R.Evid. 614. If the court desires to have a witness called that neither side has called, or a witness recalled for further questioning, this is the stage in the trial in which it is done. Where the witness is requested by the court members, the grant or denial of the request is in the sound discretion of the military judge.

B. The order of examining each witness

1. General

- a. Witnesses other than the accused may generally be excluded from the courtroom except when testifying. Mil.R.Evid. 615.
- b. Oath or affirmation. R.C.M. 807(b)(1)(B); Mil.R.Evid. 603.
  - (1) The trial counsel administers the oath, whether the witness is called by the trial counsel, defense counsel, or the court.
  - (2) Trial counsel usually asks the witness: "State your name, grade, armed force, and present duty station." (If a civilian, "State your name, address, and occupation.")

(3) Witnesses who are recalled to the witness stand do not need to be resworn. They should, however, be reminded that they are still under oath. A failure to remind the witness, however, does not affect the validity of the trial and will not be a ground for rejecting the witness' testimony.

2. Order of examining. Mil.R.Evid. 614.

- a. Direct examination—is conducted by the side calling the witness.
- b. Cross-examination—is conducted by opposing counsel.
- c. Redirect examination—is conducted by the side initially calling the witness.
- d. Recross-examination—is conducted by opposing counsel at the discretion of the military judge.
- e. Examination by the court.

C. Discretion of the military judge to vary order of introducing evidence. Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

- 1. The order of presentation of evidence is not inflexible.
- 2. At his discretion, the military judge may:
  - a. Permit the recall of witnesses at any stage of the proceedings;
  - b. permit testimony to be introduced by either party out of its regular order; and
  - c. permit a case once closed by either or both sides to be reopened for the introduction of evidence at any time before findings are announced.

0730 DIRECT EXAMINATION*A. Introduction

– Direct examination through the testimony of witnesses is the usual manner of presenting evidence to a court.

a. Even where exhibits are used, counsel will use witnesses to authenticate and demonstrate relevance and competency.

b. Often counsel will encounter more difficulty in conducting direct examination than cross-examination since, on direct examination, counsel is restrained by the rule limiting leading questions. See Mil.R.Evid.d 611(c). Leading questions are generally poor trial practice for two reasons.

(1) They are properly objectionable by the opposing counsel whose objections, when sustained by the military judge, will break up the flow of the questioning being conducted by the examining counsel. This, in turn, will make it harder for the trier of fact to follow the evidence being elicited by the examining counsel and may also cause counsel to lose sight of the goals in questioning the witness.

(2) Additionally, the testimony being offered by the witness is much less effective if it appears to be not really the witness' own testimony, but rather the lawyer's testimony to which the witness is meekly and passively agreeing.

c. Success in proving a case often depends upon the skill counsel displays in presenting the witness' knowledge to the court.

B. General principles of direct examination

1. Counsel should attempt to put the witness at ease with a few uncontroverted preliminary questions. It gives the witness a chance to become accustomed to the surroundings. It also gives the trier of fact time to focus on the ultimate issues of the case. Leading questions may be allowed at this stage. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(c).

Examples: "What division are you in, Seaman O'Toole"; "How long have you been aboard the ALEGASH?"

2. Counsel should next direct the witness' attention to the time and place where the events occurred.

Example: "Directing your attention to the evening of 21 June 19__, at about 2400, where were you?"

3. A foundation showing the witness' specific competency should then be laid. See Mil.R.Evid. 602.

Illustrations: "Who else was present?"; "Did you have an occasion to see the accused?"; "Where were you in relation to the accused?"; "Will you please describe for the court what occurred at that time?"

4. Counsel should develop the witness' story in chronological order, if practicable.

5. Connectives should be used, such as:

- a. "What happened next?"
- b. "Then what happened?"
- c. "What did you do then?"

6. As a general rule, counsel should begin questions with who, what, when, where, how, describe, explain, etc. This will help avoid leading questions in direct examination. For example:

- a. "Who was present?"
- b. "What happened then?"
- c. "Where was the accused?"

7. Counsel should remember that the scope of direct examination (testimony) generally controls the scope of cross-examination of the witness. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(b). Counsel may limit or expand the subject matter into which opposing counsel may inquire on cross-examination, but it is the scope of the testimony, not the scope of the questions, that controls.

8. Counsel should know what the witness' answer will be to each question asked on direct. Counsel will usually not be embarrassed by answers elicited during questioning if a careful pretrial interview of the witness was conducted.

9. Counsel should phrase questions in simple, direct form.

- a. Plain language should be used so the witness will understand the question and the court will understand the answer.

- b. Legal terms should be avoided.
- c. Ambiguous questions should not be asked. The witness and the court may misinterpret them.
- d. Only one question at a time should be asked; avoid double questions.

10. Allow witnesses to tell their story in their own words.

a. With an intelligent witness who has been carefully interviewed, narrative testimony may be feasible. Permission to elicit narrative testimony should be obtained from the military judge, however, under Mil.R.Evid.d 611(a).

b. Advantages:

- (1) The witness' testimony has more continuity and more spontaneity; and
- (2) the witness' credibility will probably be enhanced.

c. Disadvantages:

- (1) Counsel is unable to direct testimony to matters that counsel wants to bring out, with the result that much irrelevant and inadmissible matter may be thrust into the record, while more critical matters are omitted or deemphasized;
- (2) there is a possibility of numerous objections and ensuing arguments which will interrupt the chain of testimony; and
- (3) this technique sometimes results in prejudicial matters getting into the record, which may require a reversal. See United States v. Ledlow, 11 C.M.A. 659, 29 C.M.R. 475 (1960) (reversing conviction where a witness through narrative testimony brought out matters relating to a lie detector test given to the accused).

0731 CROSS-EXAMINATION. Mil.R.Evid. 611(b).

A. Introduction

- 1. The right to cross-examine is absolute. Where a key witness refuses to answer proper questions on cross-examination, the witness' entire testimony can be stricken. See Mil.R.Evid. 301(f)(2) (unless the matters to which the witness refuses to testify are purely collateral). Defense counsel's failure to move to strike may constitute ineffective assistance of counsel. See United States v. Rivas, 3 M.J. 282 (C.M.A. 1977).

2. The basis of the right to cross-examine is the Sixth Amendment, which gives an accused the right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him."

B. Two purposes of cross-examination

1. First purpose. To develop the truth regarding the issues that the witness testified about on direct examination.

a. Although the witness may have told the truth on direct, the witness may not have told the whole truth.

b. The cross-examiner may wish to bring out facts known by the witness that are helpful to the cross-examiner's side of the case, but that were not brought out on direct.

c. The cross-examiner may wish to underscore the weakness of the opponent's case.

2. Second purpose. To test the credibility of the witness.

C. General principles of cross-examination

1. If cross-examiners do not think that they can accomplish one or both of the above goals, they should consider asking no questions at all.

2. Do not cross-examine unless the testimony of the witness has actually been harmful or the witness has helpful information not mentioned on direct. Just because the right exists does not mean that it must be exercised. Often, if testimony of a witness has not been harmful, cross-examination may strengthen the direct testimony.

3. As far as possible, never cross-examine without knowing what the answer will be. Interviewing opposing witnesses prior to trial is essential.

4. Avoid over cross-examination. Too much persistence in emphasizing a point may result in the witness explaining away inconsistencies.

5. The witness should not be allowed to explain away inconsistencies.

a. This is an opponent's responsibility on redirect.

b. A witness should be required to limit answers to the question asked. The witness cannot, however, be required to answer categorically by a simple "yes" or "no" unless it is clear that such an answer will be a complete response to the question. Witnesses may always be permitted to explain any of their testimony at some time before completing their testimony. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(a) drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-43.

6. Avoid asking the witness "why?" (Allowing the witness to respond to such a broad question may bring out unfavorable testimony.)

7. Do not try to get the witness to draw the inference desired from the circumstances. Instead, establish the basic facts on cross-examination and argue the inference later to the court.

8. Stop on the high point. There is a tendency, once a point has been made with the witness, to drive it home to the court. This often results in an anti-climax.

D. The scope of cross-examination of witnesses other than the accused

1. Cross-examination of a witness other than the accused is generally limited to the issues testified to on direct examination and to the issue of the witness' credibility. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(b). Accord United States v. Welker, 44 M.J. 85 (C.A.A.F. 1996) (TC's cross examination of complaining witness/victim to establish that the accused should not immediately return home was within scope of direct during which the victim had expressed desire that her father return to family).

2. The scope of cross-examination is a matter resting in the sound discretion of the military judge. Mil.R.Evid. 611.

3. Cross-examiners who want to pursue an issue not covered on direct examination, or which does not go to the credibility of the witness, may call the witness as their own during their case or request that the military judge allow examination as if on direct. Mil.R.Evid. 611(b).

4. What is meant by the "issues" to which the witness testified on direct examination? It does not mean the precise facts developed on direct. It does mean the subject matter opened up. It may be the period of time. It may be the relationship between two parties. It may be an element of the offense (e.g., knowledge in an Article 92(2), UCMJ offense, or intent in an Article 85, UCMJ offense). It is always permissible to inquire into the details of the events testified to on direct.

E. Scope of cross-examination of the accused

1. Accused who voluntarily testifies as a witness becomes subject to proper cross-examination upon the issues about which they testified and upon the question of their credibility. Mil.R.Evid. 301(e). With respect to the issues about which they testified on direct examination, they have waived their privilege against self-incrimination.

2. As is true with any other witness, the credibility of the accused is in issue when the accused takes the stand. Accused can be cross-examined on matters relating to their credibility.

F. Limitations on the scope of cross-examination of the accused

1. Preliminary issues

– When the accused takes the stand during a motion and testifies only about preliminary matters not bearing on guilt or innocence, the accused may not be cross-examined on the issue of guilt or innocence at all. See Mil.R.Evid. 104(d). See also Mil.R.Evid. 304(f), 311(f), which establish that the accused can testify to the involuntary nature of a confession or admission or to the illegality of a search without being subjected to cross-examination upon other issues in the case. Under all three rules (104, 304, and 311), counsel should alert the military judge to the intended limitation of the accused's testimony by citing the specific rule applicable.

2. Trial on the merits

– When an accused purports to limit the scope of the testimony to a collateral issue, it is the content of the accused's testimony on direct examination and not the announcement of the defense's intention to limit the scope that controls. If the accused touches on the general issue of guilt or innocence, the door is open to cross-examination on all matters testified to on direct. United States v. Vandermark, 14 M.J. 690 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982) (military judge's granting of motion to strike was appropriate where accused testified that indebtedness prompted his unauthorized absence, but declined to reveal on cross the reasons for his indebtedness). See also United States v. Stadler, 44 M.J. 566 (A.F.C.C.A. 1996) (where TC's rhetorical question to accused on cross examination as to why accused had not produced a certain witness who purportedly could offer exculpatory testimony was held to be proper cross examination in view of the nature and context of defense assertions during their case-in-chief).

3. Accused limiting testimony to certain of the offenses charged

a. Accused have the right to limit their testimony on direct examination to one or some of the offenses charged. Mil.R.Evid. 301(e).

b. Accused do not waive their privilege against self-incrimination as to the offense or offenses to which they did not testify. Hence, trial counsel may not cross-examine them on these offenses. Where the cross-examiner goes beyond the legitimate scope, reversible error is likely to occur.

c. Defense counsel may face a particularly difficult problem where the offenses charged have closely related elements even though they are not identical (i.e., larceny and burglary). See United States v. Castillo, 29 M.J. 145 (C.M.A. 1989).

4. Acts of uncharged misconduct. Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) discusses the limitations on the cross-examination of the accused concerning acts of uncharged misconduct. See chapter VII, part two for a discussion of this limitation.

0732 FORMS OF QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

A. Introduction

1. Scope. This section is concerned with the form of the questions to be asked on direct and cross-examination as distinguished from their subject matter or content.

2. Limitations. Although the examining counsel will ordinarily be allowed to ask a witness questions in the form that seems best to the counsel, certain limitations have traditionally been imposed by the courts. See Mil.R.Evid. 611 drafters' analysis.

3. Discretion. Rulings as to form of questions are largely within the sound discretion of the military judge. Mil.R.Evid. 611.

B. Leading questions. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(c).

1. Definition of leading question:

a. A question that suggests the desired answer; or

b. a question that embodies a material fact not yet testified to by the witness and is susceptible of being answered by a simple yes or no.

2. Recognition

a. It is not necessarily the wording of the question that makes it leading, but its probable result.

b. If it appears that the examiner is attempting to put words into the witness' mouth (i.e., suggest the answer desired), it is probably a leading question.

c. If it sounds as though counsel is testifying instead of the witness, it is probably a leading question.

3. Tests

a. Can the question be answered by YES or NO? (note that this fact alone is not determinative).

b. Is the question in the form of an assertion?

c. Does the question assume facts not yet testified to?

d. Who appears to be doing the testifying, the witness or counsel?

e. Illustrations:

"You saw Tanglefoot loading the gun then, didn't you?"

(Assertion)

"Isn't it true that you saw Tanglefoot shooting craps with the duty officer?" (Previously untestified fact)

"Tell the court what Tanglefoot said . . . about going over the hill and never coming back." (Counsel testifying)

4. Direct examination

a. General rule—leading questions are generally prohibited on direct examination. Mil.R.Evid. 611(c).

b. Exceptions

(1) Preliminary matters

– Preliminary questions, as long as they deal with uncontroverted facts.

(2) Slip of the tongue. When it appears that the witness has inadvertently made an erroneous statement due to a slip of the tongue, or because the witness misunderstood the question or was inattentive, the examiner may use a leading question to direct attention to the error and afford the witness an opportunity for correction.

(3) Witness of low intelligence. When a witness (because of age, low I.Q., or mental infirmity) is laboring under obvious difficulties in addressing the subject matter, or when the exact meaning of words used by the witness is obscured by language difficulties, the court may in its discretion allow counsel to lead the witness.

(4) Hostile witness. When a witness appears hostile, is manifestly evasive, or is reluctant to give evidence, the court may permit counsel calling the witness to use leading questions.

(5) Adverse witness. When a witness is identified with the other party, the party calling the witness may be allowed to use leading questions. Mil.R.Evid.d 611(c).

(6) Refreshing recollection. Leading questions may be used in directing the witness' attention to the memorandum or other item used in refreshing the witness' recollection, but the expected answer may not be suggested by a leading question.

(7) Laying the foundation for the introduction of a confession. The witness who took the accused's confession may be asked leading questions by the trial counsel in order to establish that it was voluntarily given, since the government bears the burden of proving a negative proposition (i.e., that certain things did not happen). See Mil.R.Evid. 304(e).

Example: "Were any threats of bodily harm used in obtaining this statement from the accused?"

5. Cross-examination. Leading questions are generally permissible on cross-examination, but the military judge has the discretion to disallow them. Mil.R.Evid. 611(c).

C. Ambiguous questions and misleading questions. Ambiguous or misleading questions are improper on direct and cross-examination. 3 Wigmore Evidence 780 (Chadbourn rev. 1970).

– Reason. They are unfair to the witness, since they may cause the witness to unintentionally mislead the finder of fact.

D. Double questions are improper on both direct and cross-examination – Reason. They are unfair to the witness, since the court might apply the answer given to the wrong question.

E. Misstating the evidence is improper on both direct and cross-examination. See 3 Wigmore Evidence 780 (Chadbourn rev. 1970).

F. Incorporation of evidence. It is permissible for counsel to incorporate the facts that the witness has already testified to in subsequent questions, as long as counsel does not misstate the evidence.

G. Assuming a fact not in evidence. It is improper on direct or cross-examination to put a fact into the mouth of a witness without first giving the witness an opportunity to deny it. 3 Wigmore Evidence 771 (Chadbourn rev. 1970).

H. Harassing or improper insinuating questions. See Art. 31(c), UCMJ; Mil.R.Evid. 303; 3 Wigmore Evidence 781 (Chadbourn rev. 1970). See also Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

1. Questions asked only for the purpose of harassing the witness or causing the witness to become emotionally upset are improper on both direct and cross-examination.

2. The use of certain insinuating questions under the guise of impeachment is improper.

I. Questions constituting argument. Arguing with the witness is improper on both direct and cross-examination. See Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

J. Questions already asked and answered. See 3 Wigmore Evidence, 782 (Chadbourn rev. 1970).

1. Rule on direct examination. Repeating a question that has already been asked and answered is improper on direct examination.

2. Rule on cross-examination

a. Questions may be repeated on cross-examination.

b. Counsel may go over the same ground several times, as this is a proper technique on cross-examination.

(1) The cross-examiner has the right to test the witness' memory and ascertain whether the witness' testimony is consistent.

(2) Going over the same matter might bring out that the story has been memorized.

(3) A tactical disadvantage may develop if counsel fails to show either inconsistency or memorization; such cross-examination will then serve only to highlight the witness' testimony.

c. If the repetition becomes intimidating, harassing, or a waste of the court's time, the court should limit the questioning even on cross-examination. Mil.R.Evid. 611(a).

K. Hypothetical questions. 2 Wigmore Evidence 672f (1940).

1. Defined. Hypothetical questions are based upon assumed facts not within the personal knowledge of the witness.

2. General rule. Improper.

– Reason. A witness is ordinarily limited in testimony to facts within his or her personal knowledge.

3. Two exceptions

a. An expert witness may be asked a hypothetical question. Mil.R.Evid. 703.

b. An impeaching witness may give his or her opinion of another witness' character for truth and veracity [Mil.R.Evid. 608(b)] by using the following hypothetical question: "Would you believe him if you were to hear him testify under oath?"

L. Nonresponsive answers. See also 3 Wigmore Evidence 785 (Chadbourn rev. 1970).

1. Defined. An answer is nonresponsive if the witness volunteers matter not asked about in the question.

2. Which counsel can object to an answer as nonresponsive? One federal district court judge has argued that only the accused who asked a question should be allowed to object to an answer as nonresponsive. Judge Keeton explains:

The objection of interrogating counsel to an answer that is nonresponsive will usually be sustained. Objections by other counsel solely on the ground that an answer is nonresponsive will usually be overruled. Sustaining such an objection is likely to lead to a new question that elicits exactly the same information as was stated in the struck answer, and time is wasted. Of course, if some other valid ground of objection is added, a statement that the answer was nonresponsive may be needed and appropriate to explain why no objection was made to the question.

Robert E. Keeton, Times Are Changing for Trials in Court, 21 Fla. St. U.L. Rev. 1, 17-18 (1993); see also Charlton Memorial Hosp. v. Sullivan, 816 F. Supp. 50, 59 (D. Mass. 1993).

However, Mil.R.Evid. 611(a) gives the military judge broad discretion over the "mode" of interrogation. Thus, a military judge could follow Judge Keeton's advice or could choose to grant a nonresponsiveness objection from the noninterrogating counsel.

M. Comments on answers. Counsel should not repeat the witness' answers, or make comments upon them, during examination of the witness.

CHAPTER VIII

HEARSAY

0801 INTRODUCTION. This chapter examines the hearsay rule as defined by the Military Rules of Evidence and analyzes the evidentiary rules that set forth the permissible and impermissible uses of hearsay evidence at courts-martial.

The distinction between out-of-court statements which are hearsay and those out-of-court statements that are not considered hearsay under the Military Rules of Evidence is discussed at the onset. Following this discussion, exceptions to the hearsay rule are addressed. Although the Military Rules of Evidence list twenty-nine exceptions to the hearsay rule, only the more common exceptions are discussed in this chapter.

0802 GENERAL PRINCIPLE. Hearsay is a statement, oral or written, other than one made by the declarant while testifying at trial or hearing, offered in evidence to prove the truth of the matter asserted. Mil.R.Evid. 801(c). "Hearsay is not admissible except as provided by the [Military Rules of Evidence] or by any act of Congress applicable in trials by court-martial." Mil.R.Evid. 802.

– Basis of the rule. Hearsay is generally considered to be incompetent evidence in that it lacks trustworthiness because:

1. The statement is normally that of a third person (although it could be an out-of-court statement of the witness on the stand);
2. the party against whom it is offered is deprived of the opportunity to cross-examine the declarant; and
3. the court is deprived of an opportunity to observe the demeanor of the declarant.

See Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973) (hearsay rule is grounded in the notion that untrustworthy evidence should not be presented to the triers of fact; however, hearsay rules cannot be mechanically applied to exclude probative evidence tending to show an accused's innocence).

0803 NONHEARSAY STATEMENTS AND EXEMPTIONS FROM THE HEARSAY RULE (Key Numbers 1086, 1087)

A. Not to prove truth of statement. In determining whether an out-of-court statement is hearsay, counsel should ask themselves for what purpose the out-of-court statement is being introduced.

1. Except for the exemptions set forth in Mil.R.Evid. 801(d), if the out-of-court statement is introduced for the truth of the contents of the statement, the statement is hearsay.

Example: Special Agent Marx testifies that the owner of the pawnshop told him the accused purchased the pistol used to commit the murder from him. The out-of-court statement of the pawnshop owner is hearsay if it is introduced for the purpose of proving that the accused was the owner of the murder weapon.

2. If the out-of-court statement is introduced for some purpose other than to prove the truth of the matter asserted, the statement is not hearsay.

Example: Special Agent Marx testifies that the owner of the pawnshop told him the accused purchased the pistol used to commit the murder from him. The out-of-court statement of the pawnshop owner is not hearsay if it is offered for a purpose other than proving ownership, such as laying the foundation for Marx's subsequent act of asking the accused for consent to search his wall locker for the pistol.

B. Exemptions from hearsay. Mil.R.Evid. 801(d), which was adopted verbatim from Federal Rule of Evidence 801(d) [hereinafter Fed.R.Evid.], removes certain categories of evidence from the definition of hearsay, even though in each instance the category of evidence fits within the language of the hearsay definition found in Mil.R.Evid. 801(c). The legislative history of Fed.R.Evid. 801(d) reveals that Congress believed that traditional hearsay limitations inhibited the trier of fact from discerning the truth. It was determined that the inherent trustworthiness of these categories of evidence permitted their exemption from the hearsay rule. These evidentiary categories are now classified as "statements which are not hearsay" in both the Federal Rule and Mil.R.Evid. 801(d).

a. Prior inconsistent statements. If a declarant who has made a prior statement testifies and is subject to cross-examination at a trial or hearing; and the prior statement is inconsistent with the in-court testimony; and the prior inconsistent statement was made while under oath and subject to the penalties of perjury at a trial, hearing or deposition, the prior inconsistent statement is not hearsay. See United States v. Luke, 13 M.J.

958 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 14 M.J. 297 (C.M.A. 1982) (statements given by victim to security policeman did not qualify under this exemption); United States v. Powell, 17 M.J. 975 (A.C.M.R. 1984), aff'd on other grounds, 22 M.J. 141 (C.M.A. 1986) (Mil.R. Evid. 801(d)(1)(A) does not extend to a statement made in policeman's office even though given under oath); United States v. Taylor, 41 M.J. 701 (A.F.C.C.A. 1995) (prior inconsistent statements made during police interrogation vice at formal proceeding held inadmissible); United States v. Ureta, 44M.J. 290 (CAAF 1996) (Testimony of alleged sexual abuse victim's mother given during Article 32 was admissible as substantive evidence). The statement is admissible as substantive evidence for consideration of the trier of fact on the merits. The statement should be read to the members; it should not be given to the members in writing. United States v. Austin, 35 M.J. 27 (C.M.A. 1992). Note that a prior inconsistent statement that does not meet Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)'s requirements may still be used to impeach the witness as permitted by Mil.R.Evid. 613, although these statements are admissible only for purpose of impeachment.

b. Prior consistent statements. If a declarant who has made a prior statement testifies at a trial or hearing (e.g., article 32 investigation) and is subject to cross-examination, and the prior statement is consistent with the declarant's in-court testimony and is offered to rebut an expressed or implied charge against the declarant of recent fabrication, improper influence, or improper motive, the prior consistent statement is not hearsay and may be considered substantively as evidence of the truth of the matter(s) asserted. United States v. Taylor, 41 M.J. 701 (A.F.C.C.A. 1995). Unlike the prior inconsistent statements previously discussed, there is no requirement for prior consistent statements to have been made under oath. See, e.g., United States v. Allen, 13 M.J. 597 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 14 M.J. 174 (C.M.A. 1982) (complaints by two young girls to their mothers concerning the charged offenses of indecent liberties were admissible as prior consistent statements to refute defense charges that the children's in-court testimony had been recently fabricated). If admitted, these statements may be used as substantive evidence. There must be at least an implied charge of recent fabrication or improper influence or motive. United States v. Browder, 19 M.J. 988 (A.F.C.M.R. 1985), set aside findings where the drug informant's prior consistent statement was admitted simply because the accused's testimony was contrary to that of the informant. In United States v. Jones, 26 M.J. 197 (C.M.A. 1988), however, the court concluded that the defense counsel's intense cross-examination of the victim amounted to a charge of recent fabrication and, thus, made a prior consistent statement admissible. The Supreme Court has held that to be admissible under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d)(1), a prior consistent statement must have been made before the alleged fabrication, influence, or motive arose. Tome v. United States, 115 S. Ct. 696 (1995). Cf. United States v. McCaskey, 30 M.J. 188 (C.M.A. 1990) (pre-Tome case holding that prior consistent statements usually must be made before the motive to fabricate arose); See also United States v. Toro, 37 M.J. 313 (C.M.A. 1993). See generally Major Patrick D. O'Hare, From Toro to Tome: Developments in the Timing Requirement for Substantive Use of Prior Consistent Statements, Army Law., May 1995, at 21.

c. The Military Rules of Evidence also provide that if a witness has made a statement previously identifying a person after having the opportunity to perceive that person, then the original statement of identification is admissible as substantive evidence of guilt. Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(C), See generally United States v. Thomas, 41 M.J. 732 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. 1994). This rule does no more than recognize reality. An individual's identification is more likely to be accurate if made shortly after the incident in question than if made weeks or months later in court. For a detailed discussion, see part IV of chapter 14.

2. Admission by party-opponent. Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(2). A statement offered against a party is also exempted from the hearsay rule under the following circumstances.

a. A party's own statement may be used against the party. Even though such confessions or admissions are not hearsay, the statements must not be obtained in violation of Fifth Amendment rights. See Mil.R.Evid. 304. See also United States v. Irwin, 42 M.J. 479 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (accused's statements made during providence inquiry were made in open court, not under interrogation, thus qualifying as judicial admissions in sentencing case). Remember that all statements of the accused in the possession of the government must be provided to the defense prior to arraignment. See Mil R.Evid. 304(d)(1).

b. A statement of which the party has manifested the party's adoption or belief in its truth is admissible against the party. See, e.g., United States v. Potter, 14 M.J. 978 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982) (accused adopted unsworn statement of co-conspirator by introducing it at his own magistrate's hearing); United States v. Garrett, 16 M.J. 941 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983) (accused's words and actions did not demonstrate adoption of statement by co-accused while in pretrial confinement); United States v. Stanley, 21 M.J. 249 (C.M.A. 1986) (one of several persons apprehended in connection with a drug sale stated, "We have to get our stories straight;" the accused's silence was not an adoption).

c. A statement by a person authorized by the party to make a statement on the subject is admissible against the party.

d. A statement by a party's agent or servant concerning a matter within the scope of the duties of the agent or servant is admissible against the party. Defense counsel is such an agent, but plea negotiations are protected by Mil.R.Evid. 410.

e. A statement made by a co-conspirator of a party during the course of and in furtherance of the conspiracy is admissible against the party.

(1) Requirements:

(a) A conspiracy must be in existence at the time of the statement;

(b) the declarant must be part of the conspiracy at the time the statement is made;

(c) the accused must be part of the conspiracy either at the time the statement is made or thereafter, although the accused need not be charged with conspiracy; and

(d) the statement must be made in furtherance of that conspiracy. If, for example, a co-conspirator gives a confession to law enforcement officials after surrendering or being apprehended, the statement given would not be for the purpose of furthering the conspiracy. Therefore, the confession would be hearsay if the government sought to introduce it against other co-conspirators under Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(2). The confession, however, would not be hearsay if introduced against the co-conspirator who gave the confession. See generally United States v. Evans, 31 M.J. 927 (A.C.M.R. 1990).

(2) Laying a foundation

(a) Evidence of acts or declarations of co-conspirators are admissible as exemptions to the hearsay rule only after a proper foundation has been laid. The foundation consists of:

-1- Proof of a conspiracy in existence; and

-2- proof that the act or declaration was made in furtherance of the conspiracy.

(b) A co-conspirator's statement may be admitted under this rule only if a preponderance of the evidence establishes that a conspiracy existed and that the declarant and the accused were participants in the conspiracy. Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987). See also United States v. Ratliff, 42 M.J. 797 (N.M.C.C.A. 1995) (conspiracy ends when its central criminal purposes have been attained).

(c) The military judge may have discretion under the Military Rules of Evidence to admit evidence of such acts or declarations without the foundation, upon the condition that the statement must ultimately be excluded and disregarded if the foundation is not subsequently shown. Mil.R.Evid. 104(b). Most civilian courts, however, take the view that the trial judge, under Fed.R.Evid. 104(a), must make a preliminary finding that a conspiracy exists before admitting a co-conspirator's statement. See Stephen A. Saltzburg, Lee D. Schinasi, and David A. Schlueter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual 767 (3d ed. 1991) [hereinafter Military Rules of Evidence Manual].

(d) A proper foundation may be laid by direct or circumstantial evidence. In Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987), the Supreme Court held that a judge may consider any evidence, including the proffered hearsay statements themselves, in determining the existence of a conspiracy and the defendant's participation in it. Before Bourjaily, the Court of Military Appeals had consistently held that independent proof of the conspiracy is a prerequisite for the admissibility of such statements.

See, e.g., United States v. Ward, 16 M.J. 341 (C.M.A. 1983). It is unclear if the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces will change its position in light of Bourjaily; however, in United States v. Scott, 24 M.J. 578 (N.M.C.M.R. 1987), the Navy-Marine Corps Court stated its preference for using proffered statements viewed in conjunction with independent evidence for proving the underlying conspiracy. But see United States v. Evans, 31 M.J. 927 (A.C.M.R. 1990).

(e) The conspiracy agreement may have been formal or informal, express or tacit.

(3) Termination of the joint enterprise

(a) Time of termination: Upon completion of the enterprise or upon effective withdrawal of the co-conspirator against whom the statement is offered.

(b) Effect of termination: Once the enterprise or combination has ended, subsequent acts and declarations are admissible only against the actor or declarant. See, e.g., Lutwak v. United States, 344 U.S. 604 (1953); United States v. Garrett, 16 M.J. 941 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983) (statement by co-conspirator during pretrial confinement not admissible against accused where the conspiracy terminated upon apprehension of the co-actors); United States v. Stroup, 29 M.J. 224 (C.M.A. 1989) (statement made by conspirator more than a year after discovery of conspiracy to acquire blank government checks was not admissible as hearsay exception for statements of co-conspirators made during course of, and in furtherance of, conspiracy).

0804 EXCEPTIONS TO THE HEARSAY RULE. Some evidence that is hearsay in nature has nonetheless been recognized as exceptions (as distinguished from exemptions under Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)) to the hearsay rule. Under the Federal Rules of Evidence and the Military Rules of Evidence, these exceptions are found in rules 803 and 804. Mil.R.Evid. 803 lists items which are exceptions even if the declarant is available to testify and Mil.R.Evid. 804 lists the exceptions applicable only if the declarant is unavailable.

A. Exceptions applicable even if declarant is available. Mil.R.Evid. 803. (Key Numbers 1088-1095.) Mil.R.Evid. 803 contains 24 exceptions to the hearsay rule that apply whether the declarant is available or not. Many are consistent with the Federal Rules of Evidence and traditional jurisprudence. Some are not, particularly those that are unique to the military's interpretation of the rules. A description of the most important of these exceptions follows.

1. Present sense impression. Mil.R.Evid. 803(1).

a. Mil.R.Evid. 803(1) was adopted from Fed.R.Evid. 803(1) without change. Under this rule, a statement describing or explaining an event made while the declarant was perceiving the event or condition or immediately thereafter may be admitted as an exception to the hearsay rule.

b. This rule, unlike Mil.R.Evid. 803(2), does not require that the event or condition perceived be a startling event or condition.

c. The rule, however, applies only to statements made at the time the condition or event is "perceived" or "immediately thereafter." What lapse of time may be considered as "immediately thereafter"? The Advisory Committee notes state that Fed.R.Evid 803(1) "recognizes that in many, if not most instances, precise contemporaneity is impossible, and hence a slight lapse is allowable." 56 F.R.D. 187, 304 (1973). A lapse of between fifteen and forty-five minutes in one case was not considered to be a slight lapse and, therefore, the statement was not "immediately thereafter" the event. Hilyer v. Howat Concrete Co., Inc., 578 F.2d 422 (D.C. Cir. 1978). But see United States v. Blakey, 607 F.2d 779 (7th Cir. 1979), where a lapse of time of about twenty-three minutes from the time of the event (an act of extortion) until the time of the statement was considered by the court to have been made "immediately thereafter" under Fed.R.Evid. 803(1). For a further discussion of this issue, see United States v. Cain, 587 F.2d 678 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 440 U.S. 975 (1979). Although there is no hard-and-fast rule to determine what lapse of time is acceptable, commentators have indicated that the purpose and intent of the rule are met if the statement is made as soon as the declarant has the opportunity to speak after the event or condition takes place. See Military Rules of Evidence Manual, at 793.

Example: The secretary for a grand jury proceeding made rough notes during the proceeding which indicated that the accused, now being tried for perjury for false testimony before the grand jury, was sworn at the grand jury proceedings. These notes were made immediately after the accused took the oath at the grand jury proceeding. Even if the official transcript failed to indicate that an oath was administered, the notes would be admissible under the present sense impression exception to the hearsay rule as proof of the oath having been administered to the accused. See United States v. Kehoe, 562 F.2d 65 (1st Cir. 1977).

a. This exception to the hearsay rule is identical to Fed.R.Evid. 803(2). Under the rule, a statement relating to a startling event or condition made while under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition may be admitted into evidence. This rule is premised on the presumption that statements made while a declarant is under the stress of excitement due to a startling event are inherently trustworthy. It is presumed that the excitement, coupled with the relative spontaneity of the statement, precludes the opportunity for reflection and thus limits the opportunity for fabrication and falsehood. See United States v. Grant, 42 M.J. 340 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (where child declarant's statement did not qualify under Mil.R.Evid. 803(2) as not made under stress or excitement of event, but instead was product of sad reflection). See also, United States v. Thomas, 41 M.J. 732 (N.M.C.C.A. 1994) (statement was not spontaneous, excited or impulsive, but was instead made in response to questioning and upon reflection). (Of course, it can be argued that the same excitement and stress that precludes reflection may also act to cause distortions or inaccuracies of perception.)

b. In breaking down this rule to its component parts, the military judge must determine:

- (1) Whether the event or condition occurred;
- (2) whether the event or condition was startling; and
- (3) whether the declarant was acting under the stress of excitement caused by the event or condition.

This rule does not appear to require independent evidence that the event occurred. In most instances, by the very nature of the case, evidence will be elicited to show, at least circumstantially, that the event occurred. In those cases where there is no other evidence to prove the event, however, the modern trend is to consider the declaration itself as proof that the event occurred. In deciding whether the event or condition is "startling," the judge must assess the shock effect that the event had upon the declarant. The presence of blood as a result of accident or assault is generally presumed to result in the event being deemed as startling. See Jack B. Weinstein and Margaret A. Berger, Weinstein's Evidence, § 803(2)01. Even if the event is not startling, the statement might otherwise be admissible under the present sense impression exception. Mil.R.Evid. 803(1).

Whether the declarant was acting under the stress of excitement will be determined in large measure by the time element involved and the relationship of the declarant to the startling event. The standard is the duration of the excitement. "How long can the excitement prevail? Obviously, there are no pat answers and the character of the transaction or event will largely determine the significance of the time factor." M.C. Slough, Spontaneous Statements and State of Mind, 46 Iowa L. Rev. 224, 243 (1961). Participation by the declarant in the startling event (e.g., as a victim of assault) is not required under the rule. A nonparticipant may describe the startling event. Id.

Example: A mother and her 4-year old daughter are standing at an intersection waiting to cross the street. The young child begins to run across the street. At the same time, the accused drives his car at a high rate of speed, "runs" the stop sign, and hits the child, killing her. The mother is severely upset. A policeman arrives at the scene and asks the mother what happened. The mother responds, "He went right through the stop sign and hit my daughter." At the accused's trial for negligent homicide, the policeman testifies and relates the statement the mother gave him concerning the accident. The mother's out-of-court statement as related in court by the policeman would, under the excited utterance exception, be admissible for the truth of the matter asserted (i.e. the accused failed to obey the stop sign and hit the child).

c. United States v. Reggio, 40 M.J. 694, 699 (N.M.C.M.R. 1994), provides a useful synthesis of the excited utterance case law:

(1) The basis for the excited utterance exception is a person is less likely to fabricate a statement when laboring under the stress and excitement of a recent startling event or condition;

(2) There is no bright-line rule on excited utterances, however, it is universally recognized that in order for there to be an excited utterance, the statement must be spontaneous, excited or impulsive, rather than the product of reflection and deliberation;

(3) While hysteria is not required, there must be indicia of stress or excitement linked to the startling event or condition;

(4) The statement need not be made contemporaneously with the startling event or condition to be admissible as an excited utterance, however, it must be contemporaneous with the excitement or stress caused by the event or condition;

(5) As time passes, a person is less likely to be laboring under the stress or excitement of the event or condition in question; however, the lapse of time between the event and the out-of-court statement is not dispositive, but is a factor to be weighed;

(6) As time between the startling event or condition and the statement increases, the more other factors bear on the issue of reliable spontaneity; e.g., the age of the declarant, the physical and mental condition of the declarant, the characteristics of the event, the subject matter of the statement, the demeanor of the declarant, and the opportunity to report;

(7) As the age of the declarant decreases, the more elastic the elapsed time factor becomes; and

(8) The simple question, "What happened?", does not destroy the requirement for spontaneity, however, it is a factor to be considered.

See also United States v. Pollard, 38 M.J. 41 (C.M.A. 1993) (holding that a statement can be an excited utterance even if it is made in response to a question). See generally United States v. Arnold, 25 M.J. 129 (C.M.A. 1987), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 1060 (1988).

3. Existing mental, emotional, or physical condition. Mil.R. Evid. 803(3).

This exception to the hearsay rule permits the introduction into evidence of statements of the declarant's then-existing state of mind, sensation, or physical condition. Included under the rule are statements of intent, plan, motive, design, mental feeling, pain, and bodily health. See, e.g., United States v. Elliott, 23 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1986) (accused's innocent state of mind); United States v. Dodson, 16 M.J. 921 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983) (statement of murder victim regarding intended confrontation admissible as evidence of victim's state of mind), rev'd in part on other grounds, 21 M.J. 237 (C.M.A. 1986). Except for situations involving a declarant's will or other testamentary documents, this rule does not include a statement of memory or belief to prove the fact remembered or believed.

Example: Assume the declarant made an out-of-court statement, as follows: "I'm scared. I think my wife has been poisoning me." Assuming the statements are otherwise relevant, the statement "I'm scared" would be admissible under the rule to prove the state of mind of the declarant. However, the statement, "I think my wife has been poisoning me," would not be admissible to prove the truth of that statement under the rule in that the statement is one of belief and may not be used to prove the fact believed. For an excellent treatment of the distinction between "state of mind" and "belief," see United States v. Cohen, 631 F.2d 1223 (5th Cir. 1980), reh'g and reh'g en banc denied, 636 F.2d 315 (5th Cir. 1981). See also United States v. Shepard, 38 M.J. 408 (C.M.A. 1993); United States v. Elmore, 33 M.J. 387 (C.M.A. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 1938 (1992).

4. Statements for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment.

Mil.R.Evid. 803(4).

a. This exception permits statements made for the purpose of medical diagnosis or treatment to be admitted into evidence. Such statements are admissible when they describe "medical history, or past or present symptoms, pains, or sensations, or the inception or general character of the cause or external source thereof insofar as they are reasonably pertinent to diagnosis or treatment." Mil.R.Evid. 803(4). This exception is related to, and is often considered simultaneously with, the excited utterance exception (Mil.R.Evid. 803(2)) and the mental, emotional, or physical condition exception (Mil.R.Evid. 803(3)).

b. Statements, to qualify under the rule, need not be made specifically to a physician. The statement may be directed to such personnel as nurses, technicians, or even family members as long as the purpose of the statement is for diagnosis or treatment. It is the motive to promote diagnosis and treatment, and not the fact as to whom the statements were made, that gives such statements their indicia of trustworthiness. The declarant must make the statement for purpose of the medical diagnosis or treatment and the declarant must make the statement with some expectation of receiving medical benefit. United States v. Cox, No. 95-0873 (C.A.A.F. 1996); United States v. Ureta, 44 M.J. 290 (CAAF 1996); United States v. Kelley, 42 M.J. 769 (NMCCA 1994); United States v. Edens, 31 M.J. 267 (C.M.A. 1990). Thus, for example, statements made by two young children to a child psychologist, who was treating them as a result of sexual abuse they had suffered at the hands of the accused, were admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 803(4), since the statements were clearly made by the children with a view toward obtaining treatment for lingering psychological trauma resulting from the offenses. United States v. White, 25 M.J. 50 (C.M.A. 1987). Such out-of-court statements will even be admissible where the psychologist to whom the statements were made is part of a "Child Protection Case Management Team," so long as the purpose of the child in making the statements was to obtain treatment. United States v. Welch, 25 M.J. 23 (C.M.A. 1987). But, in a similar type of case, where the four-year-old victim did not realize she was being treated by a psychologist and where the psychologist had introduced herself to the victim during the treatment sessions as "Kathy" and encouraged her to think of the psychologist as "just another Mommy," the statements made by the victim to the psychologist were not admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 803(4). United States v. Siroky, 44 M.J. 394 (C.A.A.F. 1996); United States v. Faciane, 27 M.J. 62 (C.M.A. 1988); United States v. Avila, 40 M.J. 399 (C.M.A. 1994). Persons other than medical personnel may fall within the scope of this exception. For example, statements made to a social worker by a four-year-old sex abuse victim for treatment of her nightmares were admissible under this exception. United States v. Cottriel, 21 M.J. 535 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985). The declarant need not be the patient. In United States v. Hill, 13 M.J. 882 (A.C.M.R. 1982), statements made by the victim's mother to the attending physician that the child's father had struck her son and dropped him were held not admissible under this exception because they were not made to promote treatment, but rather were encouraged by the physician to identify the assailant. While the patient's statements to the physician fall within the scope of this rule, the physician's statements to the patient do not qualify as being within the scope of the medical diagnosis exception. Thus, for example, where a military judge precluded a defense witness from testifying that she had type A blood (something which she plainly knew only because her physician had told her so), it was clear that the witness was trying to introduce the physician's statement and this statement was not admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 803(4). United States v. Williams, 26 M.J. 487 (C.M.A. 1988).

c. Even if a patient is seen by a physician solely for diagnostic rather than treatment purposes, this rule would be applicable and the statements of the declarant to the physician regarding his or her medical history or present or past symptoms would be admissible. The analysis of the Mil.R. Evid., however, indicates that the drafters of Mil.R.Evid. 803(4) felt that statements made to a physician merely to enable the physicians to testify do not appear to come within the rule. The language of the rule, however, sets forth no such limitation. It appears that the proper test to apply in determining whether the rule is applicable is two-pronged:

(1) Is the declarant's motive consistent with the purpose of the rule; and

(2) is the information in the statement such that it could reasonably be relied upon for either diagnosis or treatment?

d. The medical diagnosis exception is employed frequently in child abuse cases. For example, in United States v. Deland, 22 M.J. 70 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 856 (1986), the accused was charged with sexually molesting his seven-year-old daughter. The evidence showed that, after the child had first reported these incidents to her mother, the mother had arranged for the child to begin visiting a psychiatrist, who later testified at trial to many of the statements made to him by the child in the course of his treatment and diagnosis of her. These statements included statements identifying the accused as the person who had molested her. Deland held that the statements were admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 803(4). See also United States v. Lingle, 27 M.J. 704 (A.F.C.M.R. 1988) (treating physician could testify not only to statements child made that injury was intentionally inflicted, but to child's identification of assailant).

5. Recorded recollection. Mil.R.Evid. 803(5).

a. This rule is identical to the Federal rule. It provides for the admissibility of a memorandum or record concerning a matter about which a witness once had knowledge if:

(1) It is established that the witness' memory is impaired; and

(2) the memorandum or record was made or adopted by the witness when the matter was fresh in the witness' memory; and

(3) the memorandum or record accurately reflects the witness' knowledge.

b. The guarantee of trustworthiness lies in the reliability inherent in both the accuracy of a record made while the event perceived was still fresh in the declarant's mind and the opportunity of the opposing party to examine the declarant about the circumstances in which the statement was made. See Military Rules of Evidence Manual, at 796.

c. If the recorded recollection is admitted into evidence, the memorandum or record may be read into evidence but may not itself be received as an exhibit unless offered by an adverse party. This part of the rule attempts to preclude the members from giving the statement, as opposed to the testimony of other witnesses, undue weight in the deliberation room. The adverse party may offer the memorandum itself into evidence as an exhibit. An adverse party may decide to do so in order to establish inconsistencies or inaccuracies found in the memorandum.

6. Records of regularly conducted activity (business records).
Mil.R.Evid. 803(6).

a. A record of regularly conducted business activity may be defined as:

- (1) Any memorandum, report, or data compilation;
- (2) concerning acts, events, opinion, or diagnosis;
- (3) made at or near the time of the event;
- (4) from information transmitted by a person with knowledge of the information;
- (5) if the information was transmitted and recorded in the regular course of business; and
- (6) if it was the regular practice of that business activity to make such a record.

b. Under the rule, the proponent of a record must lay the foundation for its admissibility by establishing the above-cited criteria, through the custodian or other qualified witness who must also be able to withstand a cross-examination designed to display that the source of the information or the method of its preparation lacked trustworthiness. United States v. Brandell, 35 M.J. 369 (C.M.A. 1992). The witness need not necessarily be the custodian of the document. United States v. Garces, 32 M.J. 345 (C.M.A. 1991). The rule expressly provides for the exclusion of a record if "the source of the information or the method of preparation indicate a lack of trustworthiness." United States v. Casey, 45 M.J. 623 (N.M. Ct. Crim App. 1996). The court held a computer system does not have to be fool proof, or even the best available, to produce records of adequate reliability to comply with MRE 803 (6)). In United States v. McKinley, 15 M.J. 731 (N.M.C.M.R.), petition denied, 15 M.J. 405 (C.M.A. 1983), verification slips used in the course of business by a communication company to record results of inquiries made for long-distance telephone calls disputed by the subscriber were held admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 803(6). See also United States v. Williams, 12 M.J. 894 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (Army records that did not qualify as public records did meet criteria for "business" record hearsay exception); United States v. Benedict, 27 M.J. 253 (C.M.A. 1988) (report of sanity board is not a "regularly conducted business activity" for purposes of the hearsay exception). Note that in the case of a theft from an automatic teller machine where the documents at issue were computer generated and the key strokes themselves were the only issue, these documents fell outside of the hearsay rule. See United States v. Duncan, 30 M.J. 1284 (N.M.C.M.R. 1990).

c. The information found in the record must have been transmitted by a "person with knowledge." The rule does not require the one who makes a recording of the information to have had personal knowledge of the information so long as the content of the information is transmitted to the maker by someone with knowledge. Although not clear on the face of Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) or the present Fed.R.Evid. 803(6), the Federal courts generally require that all participants who are either transmitting or recording information, including the observer furnishing the information, must be acting in the regular course of business. The Federal cases indicate that, even if a record is kept by an activity in its regular course of business, if the information was transmitted by one who was not doing so in the regular course of business, then that information on the record is not admissible under the rule. See, e.g., United States v. Plum, 558 F.2d 568 (10th Cir. 1977); United States v. Smith, 521 F.2d 957 (D.C. Cir. 1975); United States v. Burruss, 418 F.2d 677 (4th Cir. 1969).

d. Police records. An exclusion exists in Mil.R.Evid. 803(8)(B) (public records exception) for "matters observed by police officers and other personnel acting in a law enforcement capacity." Such records are not admissible as public records under Mil.R.Evid. 803(8)(B). This exclusion would also appear to be applicable to Mil.R.Evid. 803(6), and would therefore appear to prevent such records from being admitted as a record of regularly conducted business activity. Almost all public records made at or near the event recorded also qualify as records of regularly conducted business activity under Mil.R.Evid. 803(6). If the exclusion in 803(8) were not equally applicable to 803(6), the exclusion would serve no useful purpose. It would always be circumvented by seeking admission of such a record under 803(6) rather than 803(8). See, e.g., United States v. Gudel, 17 M.J. 1075 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 19 M.J. 93 (C.M.A. 1984) (OSI report inadmissible at presentencing proceedings notwithstanding relaxation of the rules in accordance with Mil.R.Evid. 1101(c)).

e. Lab reports and chain of custody documents

(1) The most unusual aspect of Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) is that it contains an additional sentence not found within Fed.R.Evid. 803(6). This sentence specifically indicates that certain types of evidence are admissible that would probably not be admissible under the Fed.R.Evid. Among the types of evidence that Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) makes admissible are forensic laboratory reports and chain of custody documents. The inclusion of forensic laboratory reports and chain of custody documents in this Mil.R.Evid. is in conflict with the legislative history of the Fed.R.Evid. concerning records of regularly conducted business activities. The Federal courts generally agree that such documentary evidence is simply not admissible. See, e.g., United States v. Oates, 560 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1977).

(2) The second sentence in Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) is not intended to mandate admissibility for all such documents listed in that portion of the rule. In other words, the list of documents is intended merely to be illustrative of various types of documents that frequently qualify for admission under the rule. In the case of each individual forensic laboratory report, however, it will be necessary for the counsel offering the exhibit to establish the predicate elements of the business records foundation. Counsel may not simply rely on the second sentence of Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) as making all such lab reports admissible. Thus, for example, a military judge erred where he admitted over the defense counsel's objection a forensic laboratory report offered by the trial counsel where no evidence was adduced to establish the foundational elements of the business records exception. United States v. Wooten, 25 M.J. 917 (N.M.C.M.R. 1988).

(3) Military appellate courts have consistently held that forensic laboratory reports fall within the business record exception to the hearsay rule. See, e.g., United States v. Vietor, 10 M.J. 69 (C.M.A. 1980); United States v. Robinson, 14 M.J. 903 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982). A chain of custody document can also be admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 803(6).

f. Absence of specific entries on records of regularly conducted business activities. Mil.R.Evid. 803(7) provides that if a matter is not noted in a record that qualifies under the provisions of Mil.R.Evid. 803(6), and if that matter is of a kind that regularly would be so recorded, then that fact may be admitted into evidence to show that the matter is nonexistent or that the event concerned did not occur.

Example: SN Jones is charged with UA from his unit. Assume that a muster report qualifies as a record of regularly conducted business activity. Assume further that a notation will be made on the report if an individual is UA. If no such notation appears in the report with respect to SN Jones, an absence of such a notation would be admissible as evidence to prove that SN Jones was not UA.

7. Public records and reports. Mil.R.Evid. 803(8).

a. Under this exception to the hearsay rule, records, reports, statements, or data compilations in any form are admissible if:

- (1) They are of public offices or agencies; and
- (2) they set forth any of the following:
  - (a) The activities of the office or agency;
  - (b) matters observed pursuant to a duty imposed by law;

(c) factual findings resulting from an investigation made pursuant to authority granted by law (only if such findings are to be used against the government); and

(3) the source of information or other circumstances are indicative of trustworthiness.

Is a record inadmissible for lack of conformity with the regulation under which it was prepared? There is normally a presumption of regularity, and substantial compliance with the regulation is sufficient. However, irregularities or omissions that are material to the execution of the record (such as absence of a required signature) will preclude its admissibility under Mil.R.Evid. 803(8). See, e.g., United States v. Anderson, 12 M.J. 527 (N.M.C.M.R. 1981).

b. Public records commonly introduced at courts-martial include service record pages, military medical records, and military pay records.

c. This rule, as mentioned previously, excludes matters observed by police officers and other personnel acting in a law enforcement capacity. Factual findings of such reports, however, should be admissible by the defense under Mil.R.Evid. 803(8)(C). Although not apparent from the face of the language in the rule, the exclusion was intended only to exclude those law enforcement records which are essentially evaluative in nature. Thus, for example, some cases have held that a record of some very simple, objective fact that was created by a person who was acting in a law enforcement capacity but who was performing a purely ministerial act would not fall within the scope of this exclusion. In other words, it would still be admissible as a public record. United States v. Quezada, 754 F.2d 1190 (5th Cir. 1985); United States v. Hernandez-Rojas, 617 F.2d 533 (9th Cir. 1980), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 864 (1980); United States v. Union Nacional de Trabajadores, 576 F.2d 388 (1st Cir. 1978); and United States v. Grady, 544 F.2d 598 (2nd Cir. 1976). The only military case so far addressing this issue seems to be United States v. Yeoman, 22 M.J. 762 (N.M.C.M.R. 1986), aff'd on other grounds, 25 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1987), a larceny case where it was held that the military judge did not err in admitting a military police incident report to show that the victim's property had been stolen. The court noted that this incident report was ultimately based on information mechanically registered by the PMO desk sergeant as a result of a telephone complaint and was recorded in the routine process of starting an investigation.

d. Notwithstanding this exclusion, records such as forensic laboratory reports and chain of custody documents are specifically mentioned in the last sentence of the rule as being admissible. Under this rule, forensic laboratory reports and chain of custody documents are admissible as public records if the documents were made by a person within the scope of official duties, and those duties included a duty to know or ascertain through appropriate and trustworthy channels the truth of the fact, and to record the fact. Note, however, that areas of expertise that apply "subjective" interpretation of data (such as handwriting analysis) instead of "clinical" interpretation require the presence of a live witness to testify. See United States v. Broadnax, 23 M.J. 389 (C.M.A. 1987).

e. As is true for records of a regularly conducted business activity, the absence in a public record of an entry that regularly would be made and preserved may be considered as proof that the document does not exist or that the event not recorded did not occur. Proof of the absence may be made by evidence in the form of a certification in accordance with Mil.R.Evid. 902, or by testimony that diligent search failed to disclose the record, report, statement, or data compilation or entry. See Mil.R.Evid. 803(10).

8. Learned treatises. Mil.R.Evid. 803(18).

a. Under this rule, statements contained in published treatises, periodicals, or pamphlets on a subject of history, medicine, or other science or art may be admitted as substantive evidence of the facts contained therein to the extent the statements are called to the attention of an expert witness upon cross-examination or to the extent relied upon by the expert in direct examination. See United States v. Robinson, 43 M.J. 501 (A.F.C.C.A. 1995)

b. The treatise, periodical, or pamphlet must be established as a reliable authority either:

- (1) Through the testimony or admission of the witness; or
- (2) by other expert testimony; or
- (3) by judicial notice.

c. If the statements are admitted, they may be read into evidence but the treatise, periodical, or pamphlet may not be received as an exhibit.

d. See generally United States v. Coleman, 41 M.J. 46, 48-49 (C.M.A. 1994), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 907 (1995) (discussing foundational requirements of the learned treatise hearsay exception).

Example: Dr. Shrink, a forensic psychiatrist, testifies that the accused suffers from psychomotor epilepsy. Dr. Shrink, upon cross-examination, admits that the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual IV (DSM IV) published by the World Health Organization is recognized in the psychiatric community as a reliable, authoritative work. The definition of psychomotor epilepsy found in the DSM IV may be read into evidence and considered as evidence just as the live testimony of Dr. Shrink may be considered.

9. Mil.R.Evid. 803(21) allows admission of one's reputation in a relevant community.

10. Mil.R.Evid. 803(22) allows admission of evidence of most prior convictions. See generally United States v. May, 18 M.J. 838 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984).

11. "Other exceptions" — the "catchall" exception. Mil.R.Evid. 803(24).

a. This provision, known as the "catchall" in Federal practice, permits a trial court to admit hearsay evidence even if it does not fit within one of the other 23 exceptions or any other provision of the rules. Its legislative history indicates that the "catchall" was not designed to be a forum for creating new exceptions. Rather, the rule is to be used in an ad hoc fashion, based on the individual considerations of the case at bar and counsel's ability to demonstrate the evidence's "circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness."

b. Once counsel have addressed this requirement, they must establish:

(1) That the evidence is offered to prove a material fact in issue;

(2) that the evidence is more probative of the point than any other evidence reasonably available; and

(3) that the admission of the evidence generally fosters fairness in the administration of justice.

In using the rule, counsel must be sensitive to its procedural requirements. Opposing counsel must be provided with fair opportunity to prepare adequately in order to challenge the evidence. Notice must include, prior to trial, the intention to offer the statements and the particulars of the statements including the name and address of the declarant.

c. Some courts that have evaluated the "catchall" provisions have constructed a rule 403-type balance to determine how the trial judge should evaluate admissibility, while providing a structure for counsel's arguments on the issue. See United States v. Oates, 560 F.2d 45 (2d Cir. 1977). These decisions indicate that placed on one side of the balance should be the proponent's legitimate needs for the evidence and, on the other, any unfair prejudice to the opponent's case.

d. It should be apparent that the residual hearsay provisions of Mil.R.Evid. 803(24) constitute one area where the law of evidence relating to hearsay verges on the limitations imposed by the Sixth Amendment right to confront one's accuser. Any analysis of the admissibility of some proffered item of residual hearsay, therefore, will often necessarily embrace a review of the case law interpreting the Confrontation Clause.

(1) One of the critical Supreme Court cases in this area is California v. Green, 399 U.S. 149 (1970), holding that the Confrontation Clause is not violated where an out-of-court statement is introduced against the accused as long as the declarant is available in court to be cross-examined. In Green, the state's key witness against the accused testified at the trial in a manner that essentially recanted his earlier testimony against the accused that had been given at a preliminary hearing. The state thereupon offered as substantive evidence against the accused the witness' testimony from the preliminary hearing. The evidence was admitted and the accused was convicted. The U.S. Supreme Court noted that the accused's Sixth Amendment right to confront his accuser was not violated since his accuser was present in court and subject to cross-examination.

(2) Another critical Supreme Court case in this area is Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 56 (1980), which addressed more broadly the interrelationship of the hearsay rule and the accused's Sixth Amendment confrontation right. Roberts, like Green, dealt with the prosecution's use of a transcript of testimony given by a key state witness at a preliminary hearing. Unlike Green, however, the state's witness in Roberts was not present at the trial to be cross-examined by the accused. The Supreme Court found no violation of the accused's Sixth Amendment right to confront his accuser, since the witness could not be located despite a good faith effort by the state to produce her to testify at trial; she was therefore unavailable; and the statement was given under oath at a preliminary hearing at which the accused through his counsel had the opportunity to question the witness. More significant, perhaps, is the language in Roberts indicating that when the declarant does not testify at trial and the government seeks to use an out-of-court statement of the declarant, the government must show (1) that the government made a good faith effort to locate the declarant and (2) that the statement offered possesses sufficient indicia of reliability to be admissible under the Confrontation Clause. The Court further noted that any statement that fit one of the traditional hearsay exceptions is presumptively reliable enough to satisfy the Confrontation Clause.

(3) Where the hearsay declarant is not on the stand and subject to cross-examination, a substantial showing of unavailability is required before the declarant's statement will be admitted under the residual exception. At a minimum, the government must be able to show that it made an effort at personal service of a subpoena along with a tender of witness fees and mileage (as is required by article 46 in order for the subpoena to have any binding effect on the witness). United States v. Burns, 27 M.J. 92 (C.M.A. 1988). Furthermore, in the context of depositions, counsel should not be misled by certain language in article 49, which purports to make any deposition admissible if the deponent is located more than 100 miles away from the site of the trial. Military case law makes clear that, whatever article 49 may say, whether a witness is unavailable for Confrontation Clause purposes has nothing at all to do with the 100-mile limit. United States v. Vanderwier, 25 M.J. 263 (C.M.A. 1987).

e. The military cases that have ruled on the admissibility of certain extrajudicial statements as substantive evidence under Mil.R. Evid. 803(24) have been guided by whether such evidence has the equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness found in the other exceptions to the hearsay rule. See, e.g., United States v. Powell, 22 M.J. 141 (C.M.A. 1986); United States v. Morgan, 40 M.J. 405 (C.M.A. 1994), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 907 (1995) (holding that a sworn statement taken by law enforcement agents six hours after alleged rape bore sufficient indicia of reliability); United States v. Grant, 42 M.J. 340 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (holding 7yr old's statement to adult within two days of sexual conduct by stepfather admissible where child spontaneously initiated conversation, adult's questioning was not suggestive, and statement was corroborated by child's sister); United States v. Whalen, 15 M.J. 872 (A.C.M.R. 1983) (proper to admit self-incriminating statement that witness recanted at trial, where statement was written, sworn, made shortly after incident and after rights warning and waiver).

f. In Idaho v. Wright, 479 U.S. 805 (1990), the Supreme Court rejected the prior approach of permitting an out-of-court statement to be corroborated by extrinsic evidence of its reliability, to include other statements of the declarant, physical evidence, the statements of other witnesses, and the confession of the accused. The new approach is to determine the reliability of the statement based solely on the "totality of the circumstances" surrounding the making of the statement to determine whether there are the "particularized guarantees of trustworthiness" found in other firmly rooted hearsay exceptions. Factors the Court noted for consideration were (1) spontaneity and consistent repetition of the statement, (2) the mental state of the declarant, (3) use of terminology unexpected of a child of similar age, and (4) lack of motive to fabricate.

(1) Applying Wright, N.M.C.M.R. in the case of United States v. Harjack, 33 M.J. 577 (N.M.C.M.R. 1991), held the victim's statement taken by NIS to be inadmissible, and furthermore held that the inadmissible hearsay could not be used under Mil.R.Evid. 104(a) to corroborate the confession of the accused. The court held that corroboration of a confession was a dual issue of law for the military judge and fact for the trier of fact to determine. In United States v. Kelley, 42 M.J. 796 (N.M.C.C.A. 1994), the court held that the Military Judge has discretion to consider the totality of the circumstances in determining whether hearsay has sufficient equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness and that, in this case, the Military Judge did not abuse his discretion by limiting the scope of evidence considered to determine such circumstances.

(2) If the hearsay declarant is available for cross-examination, then the Idaho v. Wright rule does not apply. Thus, if the hearsay declarant is on the stand, the hearsay proponent can use external indicia of reliability, such as corroborating evidence, to support a finding of reliability for admission under Mil.R.Evid. 803(24). United States v. McGrath, 39 M.J. 158 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 420 (1994).

g. United States v. Guaglione, 27 M.J. 268 (C.M.A. 1988). Even when the declarant takes the stand to testify, any out-of-court statement offered by that witness must still meet the test for reliability under the residual hearsay exception and counsel should be prepared to specify those aspects of a particular statement that give it circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness such that it qualifies for admission under either Mil.R.Evid. 803(24) or Mil.R. Evid. 804(b)(5). However, military case law holds that "where the declarant is available to testify, the degree of reliability necessary to justify admission under the residual hearsay exception is reduced because of the opportunity for the declarant to explain why a particular statement is or is not accurate." United States v. Bygrave, 40 M.J. 839, 843 (N.M.C.M.R. 1994).

B. Exceptions to the hearsay rule requiring declarant unavailability.
Mil.R.Evid. 804. (Key Numbers 1096 et seq.)

1. Under this Mil.R.Evid., certain exceptions to the hearsay rule are predicated upon a showing that the out-of-court declarant "is unavailable as a witness." See, e.g., United States v. Bruce, 14 M.J. 254 (C.M.A. 1982) (Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(3) not applicable since government made no showing declarant was unavailable).

a. The same definition of "unavailability" is to be used for all hearsay exceptions.

b. Unavailability is satisfied by:

(1) Exercise of claim of privilege. See, e.g., United States v. Koistinen, 27 M.J. 279 (C.M.A. 1988) (civilian witness' assertion of his right against self-incrimination rendered him unavailable as a witness); but see United States v. Dill, 24 M.J. 386 (C.M.A. 1987) (prosecution witness asserting his privilege against self-incrimination is not "unavailable" if he can be made available with a grant of testimonial immunity);

(2) persistent refusal to testify despite judicial order. See United States v. Hogan, 16 M.J. 549 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983) (military judge must explain the impact of refusal and attempt to persuade reluctant witness), rev'd on other grounds, 20 M.J. 71 (C.M.A. 1985); United States v. Ferdinand, 29 M.J. 164 (C.M.A. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 1044 (1990) (where military judge does not exercise contempt powers, witness is not unavailable simply because mother threatens to disobey order to produce child to testify).

(3) testimony by declarant as to "lack of memory." See, e.g., United States v. Garrett, 17 M.J. 907 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984) (witness' testimony that he did not remember anything about the offenses and that he wished to blot them out of his mind);

(4) death "or then existing physical or mental illness or infirmity";

(5) inability of proponent to procure declarant's attendance

(or testimony) by process or other reasonable means. See United States v. Crockett, 21 M.J. 423 (C.M.A. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 835 (1986) (civilian witness in Florida who refused invitational travel orders to Germany was "unavailable" despite fact that trial could have been moved to Florida); United States v. Hubbard, 28 M.J. 27 (C.M.A. 1989), cert. denied, 493 U.S. 847 (1989) (witness was "unavailable" where witness had left his unit without authority, law enforcement agencies had searched diligently for him without success, and there was no indication when, if ever, he would return). Note, however, the government must exhaust all means available before a court will declare a witness unavailable. In United States v. Ferdinand, 29 M.J. 164 (C.M.A. 1989), the court held that issuing a subpoena that was not responded to, the refusal of the witness' mother to allow the victim to testify, the entering of a family court order prohibiting testimony, and the appearance of a state social worker to testify about the state action and potential trauma to the victim was not sufficient to satisfy this rule. See also United States v. Green, 43 M.J. 631 (C.G.C.C.A. 1996), where the court held that in addition to the requirement of absence from trial and the inability to obtain the witness' attendance, the "or testimony" language of Mil.R.Evid. 804(a)(5) requires a showing that a deposition or some other form of testimony cannot be obtained before a hearsay statement will be admissible.

(6) declarant's unavailability under UCMJ, Art. 49(d)(2) (i.e. military necessity).

Certain language in article 49 suggests that, where depositions are concerned, declarants are automatically unavailable if they are more than 100 miles from the site of the trial. Counsel should not be misled by this language. It is clear from the case law that whether a witness is unavailable for Confrontation Clause purposes has nothing to do with the 100-mile provision of article 49. United States v. Vanderwier, 25 M.J. 263 (C.M.A. 1987). See also United States v. Dieter, 42 M.J. 697 (A.C.C.A. 1995)

c. Unavailability of the declarant due to the "procurement or wrongdoing" of the proponent of the declarant's statement is not "unavailability" within the meaning of Mil.R.Evid. 804(a).

2. Five hearsay exceptions are discussed under Mil.R.Evid. 804, four of which are discussed below. The underlying assumption of the drafters of the Mil.R.Evid. 803 exceptions is that the hearsay statement should not be excluded even if the declarant is available because the statement possesses "circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness." Mil.R.Evid. 804 exceptions are admissible under a different theory. Here, the theory is that hearsay, which admittedly is not equal in quality to testimony of the declarant on the stand, may nevertheless be admitted if the declarant is unavailable and if the declarant's statement meets a specified standard.

a. Former testimony. Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(1).

(1) The military rule is taken from Fed.R.Evid. 804(b)(1), with the omission of the language relating to civil cases. Also, the military rule adds a section concerning the requirement of verbatim records of the former testimony.

(2) Former testimony is defined as testimony given at another hearing of the same or different proceeding, or in a deposition taken in compliance with the law in the course of the same or different proceeding.

(3) Former testimony qualifies for admission as evidence in the instant proceeding if:

(a) The party against whom the former testimony is now offered had an opportunity and similar motive to develop the testimony by direct, cross, or redirect examination; and

(b) the record of former testimony is verbatim.

(c) In addition to the above, if the former testimony is a deposition or a record of a court of inquiry, the limitations set forth in UCMJ, Arts. 49 and 50 apply; See United States v. Amerine, 17 M.J. 947 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984) (deposition given in U.S. admissible at court-martial in Japan).

(4) The application of this rule to transcripts from article 32 investigations raises interesting legal issues. The rule states that former testimony may be admitted if the party against whom the testimony is now offered had an opportunity and motive to develop the testimony. The question may therefore arise whether testimony from an article 32 investigation is admissible where the party cross-examined the witness at the investigation solely for purposes of discovery. Can the party against whom the testimony is offered prevent the admission of the transcript by claiming that his or her motive in cross-examining the witness at the article 32 investigation was solely to obtain discovery? Although earlier case law was ambiguous on this point, the answer now seems clearly to be that he or she may not. United States v. Arruza, 26 M.J. 234 (C.M.A. 1988), cert. denied, 489 U.S. 1011 (1989); United States v. Connor, 27 M.J. 378 (C.M.A. 1989) (it is enough that defense counsel had unrestricted opportunity to cross-examine witness).

b. Statement under belief of impending death.
Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(2).

(1) Under this rule, an out-of-court statement is admissible if:

(a) The case involves a prosecution for homicide or for any offense resulting in the death of an alleged victim (perhaps a drug distribution case where the transferee died from an overdose or perhaps when a lesser offense is charged, e.g., aggravated assault, but the victim dies as a result of the assault); and

(b) the declarant believed that his or her death was imminent at the time the statement was made; and

(c) the statement concerned the cause or circumstances of what the declarant believed to be the declarant's impending death.

(2) There is no requirement that the declarant actually die, though some victim must die (otherwise you would not have a homicide prosecution), and the declarant must be unavailable. The declarant need only believe that his or her death is imminent at the time the statement is made.

(3) The rationale for the rule is that an individual would not choose to lie immediately before dying.

Example: SN Jones and SN Smith are walking back to the barracks from the base theater. They are confronted by two knife-wielding sailors, whom Smith knows from the barracks, who demand money from them. They refuse. Both Jones and Smith are stabbed and robbed. Jones dies almost immediately. Smith is bleeding profusely and is losing consciousness. The police arrive at the scene. Smith feels his life "slipping away" and tells the police that "SN Hammer and SN Daggar robbed and stabbed Jones and me." Smith does not die, due to the excellent efforts of the police and medical personnel. Smith lapses into a coma, however, and is not available to testify at Hammer and Daggar's trial for murder, robbery, and aggravated assault. In this case, Smith's statement identifying Hammer and Daggar as the assailants qualifies as a dying declaration and is admissible notwithstanding the fact that Smith survived.

c. Statement against interest. Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(3).

(1) This rule was adopted from the Federal Rules of Evidence without change. Statements against interest are admissible if:

(a) At the time of its making, the statement was contrary to the pecuniary, proprietary, or penal interest of the declarant (see United States v. Dillon, 18 M.J. 340 (C.M.A. 1984) (statement as to source of cocaine possessed by declarant held inadmissible where declarant perceived the statement as entirely innocuous based upon the command intent to enroll him in a drug rehabilitation program) and C. J. Everett's opinion in United States v. Baran, 22 M.J. 265 (C.M.A. 1986) questioning whether declarant perceived statement to be against his penal interest); and

(b) under the circumstances, a reasonable person in the position of the declarant would not have made the statement unless he or she believed it to be true.

(2) Under this rule, however, a statement that tends to expose the declarant to criminal liability and at the same time is offered by the defense to exculpate the accused is not admissible unless corroborating circumstances clearly indicate the trustworthiness of the statement. The rationale for the requirement of corroboration is that someone who is already convicted or exposed as being involved in criminal activity may be likely to take the whole blame to protect accomplices out of a feeling of loyalty or in exchange for favors. See United States v. Perner, 14 M.J. 181 (C.M.A. 1982) (discussion of the trustworthiness requirement); United States v. Williams, 23 M.J. 724 (A.F.C.M.R. 1986) (exclusion of brother-in-law's out-of-court admission exculpating accused because of insufficient corroboration). This rule of corroboration has been imposed upon statements offered to inculpate the accused as well. Compare United States v. Robinson, 16 M.J. 766 (A.C.M.R. 1983) (declarant's out-of-court statement implicating the accused was inadmissible in absence of independent evidence showing the trustworthiness of the declarant's accusation that the accused was his accomplice) with United States v. Vasquez, 18 M.J. 668 (A.C.M.R. 1984) (unavailable declarant's statement against interest inculcating the accused was admissible where its reliability and trustworthiness was guaranteed by independent corroboration).

(3) The scope of this hearsay exception is broader than the common law exception, which extended only to statements against pecuniary (not penal) interest. The difference is more than academic.

Suppose, for example, that two individuals are suspected of a crime. One of them confesses, but the other does not. When the two of them are referred to trial, the accused who confessed does not testify invoking his right to remain silent. May the confession of the one be used as substantive evidence against the other? Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(3) would suggest that it may now qualify for admission as a statement against interest or as an exemption for the statement of a co-conspirator under Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(2). In United States v. Inadi, 475 U.S. 387 (1986), the Supreme Court held that the general requirement of unavailability did not apply to incriminating out-of-court statements made by a nontestifying co-conspirator. Additionally, in Bourjaily v. United States, 483 U.S. 171 (1987), the Court held that such statements also carried with them sufficient "indicia of reliability" because the hearsay exception for co-conspirator statements was a firmly rooted one.

(4) The hearsay exception for statements against interest applies only to individual statements that are against the declarant's interest. Where these statements are part of a larger narrative, the rule will not permit non-self-incriminatory portions of the narrative to be admitted. Williamson v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 2431 (1994). See United States v. Jacobs, 44 M.J. 30 (C.A.A.F. 1996)

d. "Catchall exception." Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(5).

(1) Just as Mil.R.Evid. 803(24) represents a "catchall"

exception to the hearsay rule for the admissibility of statements whether or not a declarant is available, Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(5) provides for a "catchall" exception in cases where the declarant is deemed to be unavailable. This exception is identical in its language to Mil.R.Evid. 803(24), and the reader should refer to the discussion of the legal issues found in section 0804 A.11.

(2) The most typical application of Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(5) has been in connection with prior statements of child abuse victims who refuse to testify or who recant their earlier statements. See United States v. Ureta, 44 M.J. 290 (C.A.A.F. 1996). In evaluating the reliability of the earlier statement, courts consider factors such as the child's age and maturity, the nature of the statements and the circumstances surrounding them, the presence of corroborative physical evidence, and the child's motives to distort the truth. Because Mil.R.Evid. 804(b)(5) applies only when the declarant is unavailable, Idaho v. Wright, 497 U.S. 805 (1990), will always apply when the government attempts to introduce these statements. Thus, extrinsic evidence of reliability such as corroborating evidence—cannot be used to demonstrate the statement's reliability.

0805 HEARSAY WITHIN HEARSAY. Mil.R.Evid. 805. This rule states that "[h]earsay included within hearsay is not excluded under the hearsay rule if each part of the combined statements conforms with an exception to the hearsay rule provided in these rules." Therefore, multiple hearsay may be admissible if each segment of the hearsay satisfies an exception under Mil.R.Evid. 803 or 804. On the other hand, inadmissible hearsay within a statement that falls into a hearsay exception remains inadmissible. See United States v. Morgan, 40 M.J. 405, 410-11 (C.M.A. 1994), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 907 (1995).

Example: A victim of rape is taken to an emergency room for diagnosis and treatment. She describes the manner of attack. The physician records the victim's description of the attack on a physical examination record required to be made and kept in accordance with applicable regulations. The physical examination record, including the victim's statement contained therein, is admissible under the medical diagnosis and treatment exception found in Mil.R.Evid. 803(4). Also, the record of the physical examination is hearsay but is admissible under the public records exception to the hearsay rule found in Mil.R.Evid. 803(8). Both the statement of the victim and the physical examination record are out-of-court statements that fall under exceptions to the hearsay rule and, as such, notwithstanding the double hearsay nature of the physical examination record, upon proper authentication and showing of relevance, the document including the statements of the victim contained therein is admissible in light of Mil.R.Evid. 805.

Mil.R.Evid. 806

A.     The purpose of Mil.R.Evid 806 is to allow both the opponent and the proponent of a hearsay declaration that has been admitted into evidence to impeach or support the out-of-court declarant in basically the same fashion as if the declarant had been a witness who had testified.

B.     It is unnecessary to afford the declarant of a hearsay statement that has been admitted into evidence any opportunity to "deny or explain" prior to use by the opponent of an inconsistent statement or conduct to impeach the declarant.

C.     If the opponent of a hearsay statement that has been admitted into evidence calls the declarant of the statement as a witness, then the opponent can cross-examine the declarant. The opponent is not limited by the rules that would otherwise apply on direct examination.

0807            FINAL NOTES. The mere fact that a statement qualifies as an exception to the hearsay rule does not automatically guarantee its admission into evidence. The Sixth Amendment confrontation requirements must be satisfied; the probative value of the evidence must not be substantially outweighed by confusion, undue delay, or unfair prejudice under Mil.R.Evid. 403; and, of course, authenticity, relevancy, and other competency requirements must be satisfied.

CHAPTER IX

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE

0901 INTRODUCTION (Key Number 1040). Documentary evidence, including private writings, records of regularly conducted business activity, and public records, is often the most frequently utilized form of evidence at courts-martial. In courts-martial for offenses such as unauthorized absence or forgery, documentary evidence normally constitutes most of the evidence submitted on the merits. Similarly, the primary evidence usually considered during the presentencing stage of a court-martial consists of documents such as service record entries and character letters.

This chapter will not address the hearsay issues attendant to the admissibility of documentary evidence. The student should refer to chapter VIII of this text for a discussion of such hearsay implications. This present chapter is intended to familiarize the student with the rules of evidence applicable to the issues of authenticity of documentary evidence and the "best evidence rule" as it applies to the military.

A. General. Authentication of a document is one of the conditions precedent to the admissibility of the document. A document is authenticated by evidence sufficient to support a finding that the document in question is what it purports to be. Military Rule of Evidence 901 [hereinafter Mil.R.Evid.]. Sufficient proof that a document is what it purports to be may be presented by a variety of methods which will be discussed in the succeeding paragraphs.

The student must not confuse the matter of the authenticity of a document with such matters as its relevancy or competency. For instance, any hearsay issues concerning a document are properly raised by the opponent as an objection under the hearsay rule. Such hearsay objections relate to the issue of the legal competency of the document and do not relate to the issue of the authenticity of the document. See generally chapter VIII, supra. Any objection based upon grounds questioning the authenticity of a document is proper only if opposing counsel is contesting the fact that the document is what it purports to be. For example, the fact that entries upon a service record page in the accused's service record book were not prepared in accordance with appropriate regulations does not, in itself, give rise to an objection challenging the authenticity of the service record page. Although failure to comply with appropriate regulations in preparing the document raises issues as to the legal competency of the document, based upon the hearsay rule, such a failure is not sufficient to establish that the service record page is other than what it purports to be. If, however, evidence exists that would tend to prove that the service record page in question is a forgery or otherwise did not come from the accused's service record book, opposing counsel would have a valid objection challenging its authenticity.

In determining admissibility, the military judge must view the credibility, authenticity, and identification of introduced evidence in the light most favorable to the proponent. The ultimate decision as to whether a person, document, or item of real or demonstrative evidence is as purported is for the trier of fact. United States v. Hudson, 20 M.J. 607 (A.F.C.M.R.) rev. denied, 21 M.J. 32 (C.M.A. 1985); United States v. Lewis, 19 M.J. 869 (A.F.C.M.R. 1985).

B. Methods of authentication. Documentary evidence may be authenticated by the proponent of the document in a variety of ways. The student should take note, however, that although the burden of establishing the authenticity of a document lies with the proponent of the document, neglecting to object to the proponent's failure to establish authenticity will, absent plain error, constitute a waiver on appeal of the issue of authenticity. Mil.R.Evid. 103. See United States v. Woodworth, 24 M.J. 544 (A.C.M.R. 1987) concerning sufficiency of objection necessary to preserve appeal of authenticity issues. In fact, this is normally the case, since authenticity is rarely a real issue and is usually not mentioned by either counsel.

The methods of authentication presented below are not exhaustive. They do, however, represent the more commonly used techniques for authenticating documents in court.

1. Stipulations. Written or oral stipulations may be used by the parties to establish the authenticity of a document. R.C.M. 811, MCM, 1984 [hereinafter R.C.M.] contains a general discussion of the use of stipulations at courts-martial.

2. Witness testimony. The testimony of a witness may be used, either directly or circumstantially, to establish the authenticity of a document. See generally United States v. Shears, 27 M.J. 509 (A.C.M.R. 1988). United States v. Tebsherany, 32 M.J. 351 (C.M.A. 1991) (proper authentication of computer generated hotel receipts, casino wages by supervisor of casino records and microfilm);

a. Direct evidence. If direct evidence is offered, it may consist of the document's author testifying that he or she wrote and / or signed the document in question. The proponent of the document may also call a witness, other than the author, who has sufficient personal knowledge of the document to testify as to the authenticity of the document. Mil.R.Evid. 901(b)(1).

Example: The trial counsel desires to submit a morning muster report into evidence at the accused's court-martial for UA. The trial counsel may, in order to authenticate the report, use the testimony of the mustering petty officer who recorded the accused's UA on the muster report. The trial counsel could, in lieu of the mustering petty officer's testimony, use as direct evidence the testimony of anyone sufficiently familiar with the muster report to authenticate the report.

b. Circumstantial evidence

(1) A lay witness, though unfamiliar with the nature or content of a document, may give testimony that serves to authenticate the document if the witness can, on the basis of sufficient familiarization with or sufficient observation of the signature or handwriting of the author of the document, testify that the signature on the document is the genuine signature of the author. Mil.R.Evid. 701 and 901(b)(2). See, e.g., United States v. Mauchlin, 670 F.2d 746 (7th Cir. 1982) (prison official who knew defendant for 16 months and had seen him write six times properly authenticated signature).

Example: An incriminating letter, purportedly written by the accused, is seized pursuant to a lawful search and seizure. The trial counsel can authenticate the letter by calling a friend of the accused who is sufficiently familiar with the accused's handwriting and / or signature to establish that the accused was the author of the letter and hence establish the letter's authenticity. A proper foundation must be laid to demonstrate that the friend had sufficient familiarization with the handwriting / signature of the accused prior to the admission into evidence of the friend's opinion.

(2) The proponent may use expert testimony to establish the authenticity of a document. The witness must first be qualified as an expert by stipulation or proper foundation. Next, the expert, in court, will be given previously authenticated documents containing the signature and / or handwriting of the author of the questioned document now in issue. The expert will then compare the previously authenticated documents with the document in issue. The expert opinion that the document in issue was authored by the person who authored the previously authenticated documents may be sufficient evidence to authenticate the document at issue at court. Mil.R.Evid. 702, 703, and 901(b)(3).

Example: A handwriting expert is qualified as such at court. He is shown a duly authenticated enlistment contract containing the accused's signature. The expert is then shown a letter that is incriminating and, purportedly signed by the accused. The expert may compare the signature on the enlistment contract and the signature on the letter and render an opinion based upon the comparison as to whether or not the accused was the author of the letter. The expert opinion that the accused authored the letter may be sufficient to authenticate the letter.

(3) In addition to the use of nonexpert and expert opinion as to the authorship of a document, the proponent of a document may submit the document at issue together with previously authenticated documents to the trier of fact for comparison. If the trier of fact is convinced that the signatures on the specimen were authored by the person who signed the document at issue, the document is considered to be authentic. Mil.R.Evid. 701 and 901(b)(3).

Example: The trial counsel can submit for comparison the previously authenticated enlistment contract of the accused which bears his signature together with an incriminating letter purportedly bearing the accused's signature. If the trier of fact is convinced as a result of the comparison that the signature on the letter is that of the accused, the letter is properly authenticated.

(4) "Reply letter" theory. Another technique for authenticating a document by circumstantial evidence is by using the "reply letter" theory. Here, counsel will establish that the correspondent mailed a letter that was properly addressed to the alleged author. Thereafter, in the due course of mail, the correspondent received a letter that is purportedly signed by the author and expressly refers or responds to the first letter. When using the "reply letter" theory to demonstrate authenticity, counsel should carefully check the following:

- (a) With respect to the first letter, that it was:
  - 1- Properly stamped;
  - 2- properly addressed; and
  - 3- properly mailed.
- (b) With respect to the reply letter, that it:
  - 1- Bears the purported author's signature;
  - 2- was received in the due course of mail;

and

- 3- either referred to the first letter, or was specifically responsive to its terms.

See United States v. Thomas, 33 M.J. 1067 (A.C.M.R. 1991) (records of 3 NJP's were authenticated under the reply letter doctrine by way of use of an attached electronic mail message).

3. Self-authentication. In light of the numerous documents relevant to the merits and presentencing stages of courts-martial, if witness testimony or other extrinsic evidence establishing the authenticity of a document were the only legally permissible method of authenticating the document, the court-martial process would be an unduly burdensome and tedious process. The burden of authenticating certain categories of documentary evidence by extrinsic evidence has been considerably lightened by Mil.R.Evid. 902. This rule recognizes certain types of documents as being self-authenticating if the criteria set forth in the rule are met. Mil.R.Evid. 902 takes the view that some evidence is so likely to be genuine that its proponent should not be compelled to lay a formal foundation by using extrinsic evidence. The underlying philosophy of the rule is that extrinsic evidence should only be required when reasonable people might question the genuineness of the document. See S. Saltzburg, L. Schinasi, and D. Schlueter, Military Rules of Evidence Manual (3d ed. 1991) [hereinafter Military Rules of Evidence Manual].

Mil.R.Evid. 902 sets forth ten situations whereby a record is considered to be self-authenticating. Several of the more common methods of self-authentication are discussed below.

a. Domestic public records. Such records may be self-authenticated in several manners. For the definition and discussion of public records, see chapter VIII, supra.

(1) Under seal. A document bearing the seal of the United States, its territories, possessions, a state or political subdivision, department, office or agency thereof, is self-authenticating if the document bears a signature purporting to be an attestation or execution. Mil.R.Evid. 902(1). A seal on a domestic public document is self-authenticating and, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, is presumed to be genuine. Judicial notice is not required. Mil.R.Evid. 902(1).

A certificate of the United States Postal Service, under seal, bearing a signature purporting to be an execution, constitutes a self-authenticated document needing no extrinsic evidence for its authentication. United States v. Moore, 555 F.2d 658 (8th Cir. 1977). It is important to note, however, especially for counsel trying cases overseas, that this method of authentication does not apply to documents under the seal of a foreign country or international organization. United States v. M'Biye, 655 F.2d 1240 (D.C. Cir. 1981). The self-authentication technique applicable to foreign documents can become somewhat involved and is beyond the scope of the intent of this study guide. The student interested in the self-authentication of foreign documents should read Military Rule of Evidence 902(3). Reference to the Military Rules of Evidence Manual, supra, at 893-902, would also be helpful.

(2) Not under seal. Domestic public documents not under seal are self-authenticating under Mil.R.Evid. 902(2) if the public document:

(a) Purports to bear the signature in the official capacity;

(b) of an officer or employee of an entity listed in Mil.R.Evid. 902(1) having no seal; provided that

(c) a public officer having a seal and having official duties in the district or political subdivision of such offices or employer;

(d) certified under seal that the document's signer has the official capacity and that the signature on the document is genuine.

The rule is silent regarding the location of the certification required. There appears, however, to be no prohibition to setting forth the requisite certification either on the document itself or on an attached sheet.

Example: The trial counsel desires to introduce into evidence a U.S. custom's receipt signed by J____ S____, Chief, ____ Division. No seal is affixed to the receipt. The receipt may be self-authenticated by a certification under seal by an officer of the division having a seal. The certification must state that the signature on the document belongs to J____ S____ and that J____ S____ has the official capacity to issue customs receipts.

(3) Certified copies. Under Mil.R.Evid. 902(4), a copy of a domestic public record, report, or entry therein, or a copy of a document authorized to be recorded or filed in a public office and actually so recorded or filed, including data compilations, can be self-authenticating. Such documents must be certified as correct by the custodian or other person authorized to make certifications with a certificate made in the manner set forth under Mil.R.Evid. 902(1) and 902(2) (public documents under seal and not under seal respectively). The certificate should contain the purported signature of the custodian or other authorized persons under a statement that the copy is correct. Any reasonable statement implying custody and correctness should suffice. One certificate may certify several documents, but it is best to list individual documents on the certificate. United States v. Pent-R-Books, Inc., 538 F.2d 519 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 430 U.S. 906 (1977).

Example: The trial counsel desires to introduce state criminal convictions against the accused on presentencing. If copies of the conviction summaries are certified correct by the clerk of court (the custodian), the summaries would be self-authenticating. Each summary could be individually certified, or one certificate made in the manner set forth under Mil.R.Evid. 902(1) or 902(2) could be used stating that it is certifying as correct a list of conviction summaries attached.

(4) Public records of the United States. Under Mil.R.Evid. 902(4a), documents or records kept in accordance with the applicable laws or regulations of the United States by any department, bureau, agency, office, or court thereof are self-authenticating if accompanied by an attesting certificate of the custodian without further authentication. There is a rebuttable presumption that the custodian's signature is genuine if legible. United States v. Lawson, 42 C.M.R. 847 (A.C.M.R. 1970). No seal is required upon the attesting certificate. According to the drafters' analysis of this rule, an attesting certificate is a certificate or statement signed by the custodian or the deputy or assistant of the custodian. See Woodworth, 24 M.J. at 546 concerning need to show duty position and relationship of signer to the document proffered. It may be in any form that indicates that the writing to which the certificate or statement refers is either a true copy of the record or an accurate translation of a machine, electronic, or coded record, and which further indicates that the signer of the certificate or statement is acting in an official capacity as the person having custody of the record or as the deputy or assistant thereof. The drafters' analysis differs from the plain language of the rule in that the analysis provides that the deputy or assistant custodian may, in lieu of the actual custodian, sign the attesting certificate, while the language of the rule provides for the execution of the attesting certificate by the "custodian." See Mil.R.Evid. 902 drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-54. No mention is made of the assistant or deputy custodian. However, the spirit and purpose of the rule would not appear to be abrogated if the assistant or deputy custodian signed the attesting certificate in lieu of the actual custodian. In United States v. Jaramillio, 13 M.J. 782 (A.C.M.R. 1982), a record was inadmissible because the attesting certificate was signed by an individual who was not the custodian and whose position and relationship to the document was not shown. Implied in the ruling is the idea that, had the individual been properly identified as an assistant or deputy, the document would have been admissible. Finally, in United States v. Thomas, 33 M.J. 1067 (A.C.M.R. 1991), the court upheld the use of blanket authenticity certificates. For an example of an attesting certificate, refer to the sample attesting certificate appended to the end of this chapter.

b. Official publications. Books, pamphlets, or other publications purporting to be newspapers or periodicals issued by public authority may be self-authenticating. Mil.R.Evid. 902(5). United States publications fall within the purview of the rule. General lawful regulations, and even local command regulations, would appear to be covered. See Military Rules of Evidence Manual, supra, at 898. No specific guidance is found within the rule, however, and case law interpretation is presently nonexistent. It should be noted that judicial notice of a particular regulation would probably obviate the need to introduce and hence authenticate the written regulation.

c. Newspapers and periodicals. Mil.R.Evid. 902(6) states that extrinsic evidence of authenticity as a condition precedent to admissibility is not required with respect to "printed materials purporting to be newspapers or periodicals." This brief rule could be subject to a variety of interpretations. A liberal interpretation would include all newspapers, periodicals, or any portions thereof which are identified on their face as being a newspaper, periodical, or clipping therefrom. One commentator, however, suggests that this rule does not apply to newspaper clippings or periodical excerpts which could be authenticated under the provisions of Mil.R.Evid. 901. See Military Rules of Evidence Manual, supra, at 719. There is a paucity of case law on this issue, and that case law which is presently relevant is not dispositive of the issue. See, e.g., in Oaks v. City of Fairhope, Alabama, 515 F. Supp. 1004 (S.D. Ala. 1981); Shell Oil Co. v. Kleppe, 426 F. Supp. 894 (D. Colo. 1977), aff'd, 591 F.2d 597 (10th Cir. 1979), aff'd sub nom. Andrus v. Shell Oil Co., 446 U.S. 657 (1980).

d. Acknowledged documents. Documents accompanied by a certificate of acknowledgment executed in the manner provided by law by a notary public or other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgments are self-authenticating. Mil.R.Evid. 902(8). See also, United States v. Woodard, 39 M.J. 1022 (A.C.M.R. 1994) (affidavit signed and sworn before state notary public self authenticating under Mil.R.Evid. 902(8)). A certificate of acknowledgment should state that the person executing or acknowledging the document has:

- (1) Come before a notary public or other officer authorized to take on acknowledgement;
- (2) that his / her identity was known to said person or notary public; and
- (3) that the person acknowledging the document swore under oath that he executed the document of his / her own free will.

This rule does not absolutely require that a notary public affix a seal to the document acknowledged before him / her. The rule merely requires that the document be executed in the manner prescribed by law.

The words "other officer authorized by law to take acknowledgements" found in Mil.R.Evid. 902(8) are pertinent to those military personnel, including judge advocates, upon which the authority to take acknowledgements has been conferred under Article 136, UCMJ, and applicable service regulations.

e. Commercial paper and related documents. Commercial paper, signatures thereon, and documents relating thereto to the extent provided by general commercial law are self authenticating. Mil.R.Evid. 902(9). This rule will often be used in conjunction with sections from the various commercial codes (UCC 3-307 and UCC 3-510). See United States v. Brandell, 35 M.J. 369 (C.M.A. 1992) (checks are self authenticating commercial paper but photocopies of checks are not and have additional foundational requirements); United States v. Dababneh, 28 M.J. 929 (N.M.C.M.R. 1989), rev. denied, 34 M.J. 19 (C.M.A. 1991) ("non-sufficient fund" stamp on check self authenticating under Mil.R. Evid. 902(9)).

0903 THE BEST EVIDENCE RULE (Key Number 1043)

A. Introduction. Section X of the Mil.R.Evid. contains the "best evidence rule" as it applies to courts-martial. The traditional best evidence rule required a party desiring to introduce the contents of a writing, recording, or photograph to produce the original or satisfactorily account for its absence, or otherwise establish the basis for an exception to the rule. See generally Military Rules of Evidence Manual, supra, at editorial comments, Section X. Section X of the Mil.R.Evid. adds greater flexibility to the traditional best evidence rule. The salient aspects of the Section X rules are set forth in the succeeding paragraphs.

B. "Writings". Mil.R.Evid. 1001(1) offers a very broad definition of a "writing." A writing may be virtually anything consisting of letters, words, numbers, or their equivalents. It does not matter whether the means of recordation is handwriting, typewriting, photostating, or any other form of recording; the rule still applies. The same can be said of photographs, including X-rays, films, and videotapes. Mil.R.Evid. 1001(2). See, e.g., United States v. Reichart, 31 M.J. 521 (A.C.M.R. 1990), rev. denied, 32 M.J. 309 (C.M.A. 1991) (videotapes are included within the definition of photograph and the same authentication rules are therefore applicable). United States v. Kelsey, 14 M.J. 545 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (a videotape is a photograph under Mil.R.Evid. 1001(2) and its qualities as real evidence require treatment as a marked exhibit). In United States v. Perez, 36 M.J. 583 (A.F.C.M.R. 1992), aff'd 40 M.J. 373 (C.M.A. 1994), the appellant, who was videotaped stealing store items, argued that the videotape was the "best evidence" and that it was improper for store detectives to testify as to their observations while monitoring closed circuit televisions. The court disagreed stating that use of an electrical or mechanical aid does not make one less of an eyewitness, and was analogous to watching an event through binoculars or x-ray machines at checkpoints. The court however placed great emphasis on the fact that the videotape was shown at the court-martial.

C. "Originals". Mil.R.Evid. 1001(3) discusses what constitutes an "original" document. It is, first of all, the logical meaning of the word. The document first touched by ink, pen, or photo equipment. But, an original now can also be any counterpart intended to have the same legal effect by the person executing or creating it. Therefore, an original includes, for instance, the data stored in a computer, or a similar device, when displayed in a printout. A print made from a negative is also considered an original photograph. In United States v. Maxwell, 42 M.J. 568 (A.F.C.C.A. 1995) the court held that hard-copy versions of sexually explicit images seized from the accused's computer were considered "originals" for BER purposes.

If the actual original is not available, then Mil.R.Evid. 1001(4) indicates what copies of the original may be admissible as the original. The rule permits the admission of a duplicate made from the same impression as the original, whether by photograph, mechanical, or electronic reproduction.

D. Admissibility of duplicates. Mil.R.Evid. 1003 addresses the greatest change to the traditional best evidence rule. Under this provision, duplicates will be admissible to the same extent as would the original document unless the following occurs:

1. A genuine question of authenticity is raised concerning the original; or
2. based on the individual circumstances at bar, it would be unfair to admit the duplicate. The pragmatic result of this provision places the burden upon the party attempting to exclude the duplicate instead of upon the proponent, where the burden had traditionally been placed.

In United States v. Woodard, 39 M.J. 1022 (A.C.M.R. 1994), rev. denied, 41 M.J. 360 (C.M.A. 1994), the court held that the fax copy of a sworn and notarized affidavit was a "duplicate" within the meaning of Mil.R.Evid. 1001(4) and was therefore admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 1003. United States v. Perez, 36 M.J. 583 (AFCMR 1992) allowed use of a "duplicate original" of a videotape.

E. Use of "secondary" evidence of contents of a document

1. Mil.R.Evid. 1004 addresses the alternatives available to counsel when the original or its duplicates are not available. The rule provides four situations where "secondary" evidence can then be admitted. There are no degrees of "secondary" evidence. The proponent may rely upon any form, including live testimony or duplicate copy, where:

- a. The original and all duplicates have been lost or destroyed (a showing of bad faith by the proponent will negate the exception). See, e.g., United States v.

Gill, 40 M.J. 835 (A.F.C.M.R. 1994) (officer who received and destroyed letter containing indecent language permitted to testify as to the contents of the letter). United States v. Gerhart, 538 F.2d 807 (8th Cir. 1976) (photocopy of photocopy of bank check admissible where defendant raised no genuine issue as to authenticity and no unfairness would result);

b. the original and all duplicates are beyond judicial process or procedures;

c. the original and all duplicates are in possession of the opponent and, after notice is served on the opponent, the originals are not produced; or

d. the original writing, recording, or photograph deals with a collateral matter.

2. Furthermore, the contents of an official record or document authorized to be recorded or filed (and actually recorded or filed) may be proven by "secondary" evidence, if, the original or a copy, certified as correct in accordance with Mil.R.Evid. 902, or authenticated under Mil.R.Evid. 901, cannot be obtained by reasonable diligence. Mil.R.Evid. 1005. The special treatment for public documents represents a judgment that it should never be necessary to disrupt public offices by requiring an original and that, if a properly authenticated copy cannot be obtained after exercising due diligence, other evidence of the contents of the document may be offered. Military Rules of Evidence Manual, supra, at 919.

3. Mil.R.Evid. 1008 addresses the respective functions of the military judge and members with respect to the admissibility of writings. Under this rule, the military judge determines whether the conditions precedent to the admissibility of secondary evidence to prove the contents are met. The military judge, therefore, determines the issues of the legal competency of the secondary evidence. The members, however, are tasked under this rule with making the following determinations:

a. Whether the original ever existed;

b. whether another writing produced is the original; or

c. whether the evidence presented correctly reflects the original's contents.

F. Summaries. Mil.R.Evid. 1006 recognizes that voluminous or bulky originals are inconvenient for counsel to use in court or for the trier of fact to peruse. This rule, therefore, permits admission of evidence in the form of charts, summaries, or calculations when the original cannot be conveniently examined in court. The originals or duplicates, however, are required to be made available for examination and / or copying by the opposing party at a convenient time. Also, the military judge may order that the originals or copies thereof be made available in court.

Before a chart, summary, or calculation is admissible, the underlying originals or copies thereof must be admissible. Failure of the proponent of such summaries to establish that the underlying original or copies are made were themselves admissible will render the summaries also inadmissible. See, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 594 F.2d 1253 (9th Cir. 1979), cert. denied sub nom; Richey v. United States, 444 U.S. 964 (1979) (trial court committed reversible error when it permitted prosecution to use summary of voluminous evidence without requiring it to first establish a foundation showing the reliability of the underlying documents). But be cognizant of the "Rule of Completeness" embodied in Mil.R.Evid. 106, particularly relating to introduction of documents for sentencing purposes. In United States v. Salgado-Agosto, 20 M.J. 238 (C.M.A. 1985), a service record was considered a "unitary document." The defense may be able to require the government to introduce both E & M as well as aggravating or bad military character evidence from the SRB.

0904 CONCLUDING REMARKS. Counsel should survey all the applicable rules for authenticating documents at the time he / she is preparing for a court-martial where documents will be introduced on the merits and / or presentencing stage. Counsel should choose the method of authentication that most efficiently and clearly establishes that the document is what it purports to be. Similarly, an effective trial advocate will employ the most advantageous aspects of the best evidence rule as it applies to the military.

Proper utilization of the rules mentioned in this chapter promotes judicial economy. Saving courtroom time and expense are indeed valid considerations for the trial attorney. Proper utilization of the authentication and best evidence rules through effective trial advocacy skills will promote these considerations.

CHAPTER X

PHYSICAL (Real & Demonstrative) EVIDENCE

1001 INTRODUCTION. "Seeing is believing" is a time-honored theorem of trial advocacy. The trier of fact expects that each party to the trial will explain the legal concepts and develop the evidence in concrete terms. Evidence which is physical in nature, therefore, may most readily transform esoteric theories and complicated testimony into concrete mental images. The mental pictures created by physical evidence greatly assist the trier of fact in understanding the case. Conversely, such evidence, because of its powerful impact, may in some instances be given too much weight by the trier of fact or be unduly prejudicial. Thus, competent trial advocates must understand the permissible uses of physical evidence available in a case in order to present his or her theory of the case more effectively and, at the same time, avoid committing prejudicial error.

1002 TYPES OF PHYSICAL EVIDENCE. There are two types of physical evidence: demonstrative evidence and real evidence. Demonstrative evidence is admitted solely for illustrative purposes, (e.g., a model of a pistol used in an assault). Real evidence has an historical connection with the incident in question (the actual pistol involved in an assault). It is often difficult to distinguish between those items which are real evidence and those merely offered as illustrative tools. For example, a drawing, while normally considered demonstrative evidence, may in some cases be real evidence (a map drawn in furtherance of a conspiracy to rob a bank). Demonstrative evidence is generally that which illustrates or clarifies the testimony of a witness, such as by the use of models or not-to-scale diagrams. Substantive or real evidence, however, is introduced to prove or disprove a fact in issue (a firearm, the photograph of a footprint, or a photograph of a latent fingerprint—vis-a-vis the accused's fingerprint). The decision to permit or deny the use of demonstrative evidence generally has been held to be within the discretion of the trial judge. United States v. Heatherly, 21 M.J. 113, 115 n.2 (C.M.A. 1985).

1003 DEMONSTRATIVE EVIDENCE

A. Tangible demonstrative evidence. Military courts will allow the use of tangible demonstrative evidence such as photos, mock-ups, or charts. There is a variety of methods of dealing with the actual evidentiary status of this item. The preferred practice is for counsel to have the item verified by a competent witness as a substantially correct representation and then to formally introduce the item as a part of the witness' testimony. It may then be incorporated by reference in the testimony.

Example: The accused is charged with arson of a barracks. The defense, in attempting to prove that the fire was caused by a faulty electrical connection vice the accused's actions, calls the NIS agent who investigated the fire. The NIS agent identifies photographs of the scene of the fire by testifying that he took the photos, developed them, and wrote his initials and date on the back. He states that the photos were taken at the scene of the fire immediately after the fire was extinguished. The photos reveal that a cone-shaped char mark extended upward from a point under the windowsill where an electrical connection had separated. The NIS agent may thus refer to the photos to illustrate his testimony.

Example: The accused is charged with hazarding a vessel by placing nuts and bolts into the reduction gear box of the ship. Damage occurred. The ship's engineering officer is called to testify as to the effects of the accused's acts. During his testimony, the ship's engineer would be permitted to explain the causation of the damage by referring to a model of the reduction gear assembly. The model is demonstrative evidence and serves to illustrate the testimony.

In the examples stated above, the photos and model act as visual aids which assist the trier of fact in understanding the testimony of the witnesses. The photo and model would be authenticated by the witness concerned as accurate representations of the events discussed. Any witness who is familiar with the object or area portrayed can authenticate demonstrative evidence by testifying that the exhibit is a true and accurate representation of the object or area.

Tangible items used as demonstrative evidence should be marked for identification before they are introduced into evidence and should accompany the record either as prosecution or defense exhibits admitted into evidence or as appellate exhibits, depending upon whether the military judge permits these exhibits to be taken into the deliberation room by the members. If this was not permitted, the exhibit will be marked as an appellate exhibit. In either case, if the tangible exhibit (photos, chart, model, etc.) is too cumbersome or impractical to attach to the record of trial, a photograph of the exhibit will be taken and attached to the record in lieu of the actual exhibit.

B. Nonverbal testimony of the witness. To clarify the verbal testimony of a witness, the witness may be requested to demonstrate with his body the manner in which a certain event occurred. For example, he may be asked to demonstrate with his arm the motion that the accused used in plunging a knife into the heart of the victim. The witness might also be requested to place marks on a map or chart to demonstrate the escape route that the accused took after stabbing the victim.

If such nonverbal testimony is given, a description of the actions of the witness must be reflected on the record. The party questioning the witness at the time should ensure that the record adequately reflects the witness' actions.

C. Courtroom demonstration. There is a growing trend in trial advocacy to show to the triers of fact evidence that is not historically connected to the crime or the accused, but is, instead, illustrative of a fact or concept. The trial counsel, for example, may desire to have a witness demonstrate a particular scientific test in court, or to have the witness use objects not in evidence to replicate in court the manner in which the accused handled similar objects at the time of the offense.

Example: An NIS agent who performed a test on suspected marijuana seized from the person of the accused might be asked to replicate in court the procedures he used in conducting the out-of-court test on the suspected marijuana.

If the items used in the demonstration are offered merely to illustrate testimony, their specific identity is generally of no significance. Military appellate courts, however, have shown great reluctance to accept such evidence at face value and have required a substantial demonstration of relevance and helpfulness to the fact-finder. If the probative value is outweighed by the prejudicial effect or is outweighed by a tendency to mislead the court, the evidence will not be admitted. M.R.E. 403 See, e.g., United States v. Pjecha, 7 M.J. 455 (C.M.A. 1979) (in-court demonstration of drug analysis using substance in no way connected with accused was inflammatory); United States v. Penn, 4 M.J. 879 (N.C.M.R. 1978) (judge's instruction purged error in allowing in-court demonstration of how accused was packaging marijuana). See also Mil.R.Evid. 403 (codifies authority of the trial judge to exclude relevant evidence where probative value is outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, etc.). See also United States v. Redmond, 21 M.J. 319 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 106 S.Ct. 1950 (1986) (judge did not abuse his discretion in admitting disembodied skull of the murder victim into evidence since the exhibit would be used to show the ferocious nature of attack and thereby, indirectly, to establish premeditation).

1004 REAL EVIDENCE (Key Number 1037)

A. Definition. Real evidence is physical evidence which is linked directly with the crime or the accused. It consists of items of substantive evidence and not items used to illustrate a point.

Examples:

1. A murder weapon
2. fruits of the crime (e.g., stolen merchandise);
3. instrumentalities of the crime (e.g., the burglar tools); and
4. seized contraband.

B. Marking exhibits. Real evidence is normally marked with a tag. The exhibit is labeled as either a prosecution or defense exhibit if the exhibit is introduced for consideration by the trier of fact on the merits or presentencing.

C. Record of trial. A photograph of the real evidence may be substituted in the record of trial in lieu of the exhibit itself.

1005 AUTHENTICITY OF REAL EVIDENCE (Key Number 1041). As noted previously, real evidence is physical evidence which is directly connected with the crime in question. The proponent of the evidence must not only show that such evidence would be relevant to an issue in the case, but it must also be demonstrated that the item is what it purports to be; that is, the item is authentic. The manner of establishing the authenticity of real evidence is referred to as "identification." There are several means of identifying real evidence:

Method 1: Proof that the item is readily identifiable;

Method 2: Proof of a chain of custody; or Method 3: A combination of methods 1 and 2.

A. Method no. 1: proof that the item is readily identifiable. If the item possesses unique, identifying physical characteristics, and the witness recognizes the characteristics, the item is sufficiently identified.

1. Analytic approaches. The courts are becoming increasingly realistic and sophisticated in their analysis of these problems.

a. At first, the courts simply accepted the witness' identification at face value. "[W]here a party positively identifies an article as the one involved in the case, such identification is prima facie sufficient. . . ." 32 C.J.S. Evidence 607(a) (1964).

b. Generally, courts today treat the problem as one of probability. Do the physical characteristics make the item unique? How unusual is the item? United States v. Reed, 392 F.2d 865 (7th Cir. 1968) (unusual looking hat identified by bank manager and wife). The proponent should elicit both the witness' identification of the item and the list of the physical characteristics the witness relies upon in making the identification. The incidence or frequency of occurrence of that combination of characteristics determines whether the item is unusual enough to qualify as a readily identifiable item.

(1) What kinds of articles qualify as readily identifiable articles?

(a) Articles with serial numbers.

(b) Articles with distinctive physical markings.

-1- United States v. Briddle, 443 F.2d 443 (8th Cir. 1971) (a split, leather, dark-brown button with the picture of a whale on the front and a sticky substance smeared on the back).

-2- Yellow carry-on bag with initials "B.P" held readily identifiable. United States v. Parker, 10 MJ 415, 417 (C.M.A. 1981).

-3- Even relatively common articles have been identified under this theory. See, e.g., Burris v. American Chicle Co., 120 F.2d 218 (2d Cir. 1941) (a piece of rope); United States v. Pagerie, 15 C.M.R. 864 (A.F.B.R. 1954) (a tire).

(c) Courts have permitted witnesses to identify articles on the basis of marks they scratched onto the articles when they seized the article. See, e.g., United States v. Madril, 445 F.2d 827 (9th Cir. 1971) (markings the officer places on a pistol grip); O'Quinn v. United States, 411 F.2d 78 (10th Cir. 1969) (markings on jars); United States v. Bourassa, 411 F.2d 69 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 396 U.S. 915 (1969); Rosemund v. United States, 386 F.2d 412 (10th Cir. 1967). Military courts have permitted witnesses to identify even highly fungible items, such as marijuana, if the container holding the substance can be identified by markings and there is no evidence of tampering or alteration of the substance. See, e.g., United States v. Madela, 12 M.J. 118 (C.M.A. 1981) (undercover agent allowed to identify a clear plastic bag of marijuana by noting that he had entered the time, date, and his initials on the bag after he had purchased it from the accused); United States v. Lewis, 11 M.J. 188 (C.M.A. 1981) ("readily identifiable" packet of heroin admissible despite gaps in the chain of custody); United States v. Courts, 9 M.J. 285 (C.M.A. 1980) (chemical analysis of cocaine admissible absent proof of tampering). United States v. Porter, 10 MJ 415, 416-418 (C.M.A. 1981) In United States v. Thomas, 38 M.J. 614 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993), rev. denied, 40 M.J. 56 (C.M.A. 1994), the court held that a brown bag containing 5 baggies with cocaine residue, and a used condom with wrapper was sufficiently unique in appearance and association of items so that it was readily identifiable.

B. Method no. 2: proof of a chain of custody (Key Number 1039)

1. When must the proponent show a chain of custody?

a. The item is not readily identifiable.

b. The item is readily identifiable, but the witness failed to note the item's unique physical characteristics. See, e.g., United States v. Hooks, 23 C.M.R. 750 (A.F.B.R. 1956) (proof of the chain of custody is a more than adequate substitute for the witness' positive identification of the item).

c. The item is readily identifiable, but its condition is a critical issue in the case and the condition is susceptible to change. Here, the judge should have the discretion to require the proponent to prove a chain of custody.

Example: A pistol is seized from the accused and sent to a crime lab for ballistic tests. Assume that a key issue in the case is the defense's contention that the pistol was incapable of firing due to a faulty firing pin. Assume further that the pistol was successfully fired at the lab. The judge may require proof of a chain of custody from the time of its seizure to the time of its testing at the lab. The prosecution, therefore, must then demonstrate that there was no tampering with the firing pin prior to the testing of the pistol at the lab.

2. What is the length of a proper chain of custody?

– If the article's relevance depends upon a witness' in-court identification, generally, the chain of custody must run from the time of seizure until the time the article is offered in evidence. If the government is simply relying upon the results of a test or chemical analysis of the substance, the chain need run only from the time of seizure to the time of the test analysis for the test to be admissible. United States v. Barr, 1 M.J. 1015 (N.C.M.R. 1976); See United States v. Morris, 30 M.J. 1221 (A.C.M.R. 1990) (HIV testing); United States v. Berry, 30 M.J. 134 (C.M.A. 1990) (chain of custody for urine specimen was not established where chemists who prepared report could not have known circumstances of collection and transmission of urine sample). This rule implies that the item itself (drugs) need not actually be presented at trial as long as a good chain of custody from the time of seizure to the time of chemical analysis is established. Barr, 1 M.J. at 1015. However, if the item itself is to be admitted into evidence, the chain of custody must run from time of seizure to time of trial.

3. Who are the links in the chain?

a. Persons who merely had access to the item NO.

- b. Persons who handled the item generally, YES.

Perhaps the proponent need not account for a person's handling of the item if the person had the item only momentarily and performed purely mechanical functions with the item. Commonwealth v. Thomas, 448 Pa. 352, 292 A.2d 352 (1972). Also, in United States v. Nault, 4 M.J. 318 (C.M.A. 1978), the chain of custody had a gap because the acting custodian who had possessed the LSD pill for four days was not called to testify. The court noted that the record was devoid of any indication of distinctive seals or unusual identifying marks associated with the item. The court further noted in a footnote that it would be willing to presume regularity of systematic handling on part of "neutral chemical analysis." It was, however, unwilling to apply that presumption to a prosecutorial custodian of real evidence in the absence of a proper demonstration. But see Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) and 803(8) (chain of custody document is now admissible as an official record or a business entry).

c. The accused. When evidence is seized from an accused, the chain of custody must normally start with the accused. However, the signature of an accused on the chain of custody form constitutes an admission and requires that the suspect be warned of his rights to refuse to sign the form. United States v. Dozier, No. 11179 (A.C.M.R. 11 Dec. 1975) (unreported). If the accused refuses to sign, the beginning of the chain of custody can be shown by the testimony of the individual seizing the evidence.

4. How does the proponent establish the chain of custody? Negatively, he must establish a reasonable probability that neither substitution nor tampering has occurred. Affirmatively, he must establish that the item offered is the same item in substantially the same condition. Three factors must be considered: the nature of the article, the circumstances surrounding its preservation and custody, and the likelihood of tampering. With respect to each link, the proponent should prove: (1) receipt of the item; (2) ultimate disposition of the item, i.e., destruction, transfer, or retention; and (3) safekeeping and handling of the item in the period between receipt and ultimate disposition. The most difficult problem of proof is element (3).

- a. The proponent may establish element (3) if he proves:

(1) That the article was placed in a marked, sealed container in the interim and that the next link received the article with the seal unbroken [United States v. Bass, 8 C.M.A. 299, 24 C.M.R. 109 (1957); United States v. Santiago, 534 F.2d 768 (7th Cir. 1976) (sealed bags)];

(2) that the article was deposited in a secure container and that the times when the article was removed from the container are accounted for [Sorge v. State, 487 P.2d 902 (Nev. 1972) (the officer did not place marijuana in a licked, sealed envelope, but he deposited it in an evidence locker)]; and

(3) that it is unlikely that any intermeddler had access to the article [United States v. Yarborough, 50 C.M.R. 149 (A.F.C.M.R. 1975) (although the vial of LSD was unguarded for a short period of time, it had been placed in a hospital office where tampering was unlikely)].

b. The standard of proof is rather slight.

(1) The article need not be kept under lock and key. See, e.g., United States v. Martinez, 43 C.M.R. 434 (A.C.M.R. 1970) (unlocked refrigerator).

(2) In showing continuous custody that preserves fungible evidence in an unaltered state, the government cannot rely solely on the presumption that a law enforcement officer has maintained the evidence properly. The government, however, need not exclude all possibilities of tampering. Rather, it must satisfy the trier of fact that, in reasonable probability, the article has not been altered in any important respect. See, e.g., United States v. Maxwell, 38 M.J. 148 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 1056 (1994) (chain of custody evidence must be adequate, not infallible); United States v. Gonzalez, 37 M.J. 456 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 1060 (1994) (government need only show reasonable probability urine sample not changed in important respects). United States v. Gardi, 6 M.J. 703 (N.C.M.R. 1978) (containers of marijuana left for 3 days in unlocked temporary evidence locker; chain upheld), petition denied, 7 M.J. 56 (C.M.A. 1979); Courts, 9 M.J. at 285 (although prosecution did not exclude every possibility of tampering, sufficient chain of custody was established so as to allow testimony with respect to chemical analysis of cocaine).

(3) In United States v. Ettleson, 13 M.J. 348 (C.M.A. 1982), to complete the chain of custody, the court used a "strong, uncontroverted inference" that the evidence custodian had received drugs from an OSI agent, even though the trial counsel had failed to establish the transfer directly on the record.

(4) In United States v. Maxwell, 38 M.J. 148 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 1056 (1994), the government could not provide a witness to say that they remembered drawing blood from the accused and forwarding the sample to the laboratory. Gaps in the chain of custody do not necessarily prevent admission. The court stated that generally gaps in the chain go only to the weight of evidence, not the admissibility and that the government is not required to exclude every possibility of tampering.

c. The courts may apply a stricter standard of proof where:

(1) There is a strong possibility that the article has been confused with other similar articles [see, e.g., Nichols v. McCoy, 235 P.2d 412 (Cal. Dist. Ct. App. 1951), aff'd, 240 P.2d 569, 38 Cal.2d 447 (1952) and United States v. Carrott, 25 M.J. 823 (A.F.C.M.R. 1988)]; or

(2) the article is a delicate one whose condition can be easily changed. See, e.g., Walker v. Firestone Tire Rubber Co., 412 F.2d 60 (2d Cir. 1969) (the standard of proof is higher if the item is subject to "easy alteration"); Erickson v. North Dakota Workmen's Compensation Bureau, 123 N.W.2d 292 (N.D. 1963) (the court in effect imposed a higher standard where the blood sample was kept in an ordinary unsealed glass container).

5. Methods of proof of chain of custody

a. Live testimony

(1) Trial counsel testimony as to chain of custody:

(a) United States v. Whitacre, 12 C.M.A. 345, 349, 30 C.M.R. 345, 349 (1961), though limiting its holding, held that it was not error per se for the trial counsel to testify where:

[t]he prosecutor did not pit his credibility against that of any other witness. He merely stated he had taken custody of the items of Government property which were turned over to him. It was other evidence which indicated that the items were the same articles seized at accused's apartment. . . . Furthermore, in arguing on the merits, the trial counsel did not attempt to capitalize on his own testimony.

(b) It is recommended, however, that trial counsel not take receipt of evidence from law enforcement officials where chain of custody issues will arise until the law enforcement officer hands the items to the trial counsel during the officer's testimony in court.

(2) Testimony of those in the chain who handled the evidence:

(a) The government may call each person in the chain to testify as to their involvement in handling the evidence. The witnesses may also testify as to the identification of their signatures on a chain of custody form to establish the authenticity of the form and also confirm their link in the chain.

(b) Missing links in chain. Military law will permit the authentication by chain of custody where there is some "missing link" in the chain, but such admission will depend on the careful sealing and/or labeling of the item, the absence of any suggestion of tampering, and a complete showing of a possession on each side of the missing link. This rule was originally set forth in the decision in United States v. Bass,

8 C.M.A. 299, 24 C.M.R. 109 (1957). Failure of one or more persons in the chain of custody to testify concerning their handling of the evidence will not render the chain fatally broken if the gaps caused by their failure to testify are, in fact, bridged by the testimony of others. United States v. Chong, 8 M.J. 592 (A.C.M.R. 1979). See also United States v. Fowler, 9 M.J. 149 (C.M.A. 1980); Courts, 9 M.J. at 285; See United States v. Gonzales, 37 M.J. 456 (C.M.A. 1993), United States v. Wallace, 14 M.J. 1019 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (failure of agent to list one exhibit on the chain of custody document did not destroy the chain of custody, in absence of any evidence that the evidence was altered or commingled with evidence from other cases).

b. Stipulations

(1) Counsel and the accused can stipulate to the chain of custody as a stipulation of fact, or

(2) in a stipulation of expected testimony.

c. Documentary evidence (Key Number 1040)

(1) The admissibility of the chain of custody receipt as a record of a regularly conducted activity or public records is addressed by Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) and 803(8), respectively. See Chapter VIII, supra. These provisions specifically provide for the document's admission, rejecting the Court of Military Appeals holding in United States v. Porter, 7 M.J. 32 (C.M.A. 1979) and United States v. Nault, 4 M.J. 318 (C.M.A. 1978).

(2) Mil.R.Evid. 803(6) and 803(8) specifically allow the admissibility of chain-of-custody documents and lab reports, inter alia, provided the proper foundation is laid for qualifying them under the appropriate rule. United States v. Cordero, 21 M.J. 714 (A.F.C.M.R. 1985); United States v. Wootton, 25 M.J. 917 (N.M.C.M.R. 1988).

C. Method no. 3: Combination of methods 1 and 2

1. If the proponent relies on strict chain of custody reasoning, the links in the chain who testify need not inspect the item and attempt to identify it. United States v. Lauer, 287 F.2d 633 (7th Cir. 1961). However, if the proponent submits the item to these witnesses and, although it is not readily identifiable, they testify that the item is the same item and in substantially the same condition, this testimony is additional probative evidence above and beyond the strict chain of custody evidence. In United States v. Martinez, 43 C.M.R. 434, 437 (A.C.M.R. 1970), the court stated: "[a]uthentication of the evidence and establishing that it has remained substantially unchanged may be accomplished (1) by establishing a chain of custody from the significant point of time to its examination, or (2) by the testimony of a witness from personal knowledge, or (3) by a combination of these methods."

If the chain-of-custody evidence leaves any doubt in the judge's mind about the items' identity or condition, the witness' additional testimony might be sufficient to remove the doubt. It is a good technique of trial advocacy to have each person in the chain called as a witness to testify about article's custody, to inspect the article, and to attempt to identify the item.

2. An accused's admissible confession may also be used to bolster an otherwise weak chain of custody. United States v. White, 9 M.J. 168 (C.M.A. 1980).

3. If the package containing a fungible substance is itself readily identifiable, even if there are breaks in the chain of custody, the substance may still be admissible under current military case law, absent evidence of tampering or alteration of the substance. Madela, 12 M.J. at 118; Lewis, 11 M.J. at 188; Courts, 9 M.J. at 285.

Example: The NIS agent seizes a "baggie" of marijuana from the accused. The agent marks his initials and the date of the seizure on the "baggie." Assume there are breaks in the chain of custody. The agent, if able to identify the baggie by identifying his initials and date thereon, will also establish the identity of the marijuana itself as the same marijuana that was seized from the accused provided there is no evidence of alteration or tampering with the substance.

4. Presumptions: The Court of Military Appeals has recognized a rebuttable "presumption of regularity" in the handling of evidence by personnel of forensic laboratories. United States v. Porter, 12 M.J. 129 (C.M.A. 1981); United States v. Strangstalien, 7 M.J. 225 (C.M.A. 1979). Therefore, it normally is not legally mandated that those who handled the evidence at a crime lab be called by the government to establish a proper handling of the evidence at the lab in order to establish a proper chain of custody.

1006 RELEVANCE

A. General. Regardless of whether the physical evidence once authenticated is demonstrative or real, a key issue to be addressed is its relevance. Does the item tend to establish a fact that is a part of an issue in the case? See Mil.R.Evid. 401-02. The Government has the burden to show that each item of real and documentary evidence it seeks to introduce at court-martial is relevant to the offense charged. United States v. Parker, 10 M.J. 415 (C.M.A. 1981).

B. Methods of establishing relevance

1. Direct connection. If the item in question is linked directly with the crime or the accused, then relevancy is normally not a problem.

Example: PVT Jones, an eyewitness to a murder, picks up the smoking pistol. At trial, he identifies the pistol as the same pistol he found at the murder scene. The pistol is relevant to the issue. It has an historical connection with the crime. It tends to establish a fact that is a part of an issue in the case, i.e., the weapon used in the murder. The proponent, however, must distinguish the concepts of "identification" and "relevancy." Simply identifying the object (same items as witness found) may not necessarily establish relevancy (found weapon at murder scene). As a practical matter, both identification and relevancy may be shown by the same witness, as was done in this example.

2. Similarity

a. Some courts hold that proof of similarity is an insufficient foundation. The proponent must prove that the item found in the accused's possession was the very item the guilty party had. See, e.g., People v. Miller, 22 A.D.2d 958, 256 N.Y.S.2d 110 (1964).

b. Some courts take an intermediate view that the evidence is admissible if the proponent makes a strong showing of similarity. In State v. Thompson, 364 P.2d 783 (Ore. 1961), the court stated that the evidence's admissibility turns on "the time and place where the accused is apprehended and the weapons found in respect to [the] time and place of the crime committed. . . ."

c. The majority view, however, is that the evidence is admissible because it is logically relevant. The fact that the accused was found in possession of a weapon or clothing similar to that of the perpetrator increases the probability that the accused is the perpetrator. The courts will also ensure that such evidence is not more prejudicial or misleading than probative. See United States v. Abraham, 617 F.2d 187 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 447 U.S. 929 (1980); United States v. Chibbaro, 361 F.2d 365 (3rd Cir. 1966). See also Mil.R.Evid. 403.

Example: The accused is charged with assault with a deadly weapon. A .25 caliber automatic pistol with a shocking-pink handgrip on one side of the handle is found 100 yards from the scene of a shooting and is marked as an exhibit in the court. The accused's roommate testifies that he has seen the accused in possession of a .25 caliber automatic pistol with a shocking-pink handgrip on one side of the handle. But, the roommate cannot positively identify the weapon shown him in court. He does, however, testify that it "looks like the pistol" he had seen in the accused's possession. The unique similarities render the in-court exhibit relevant to the case.

d. Types of items to which the similarity doctrine has been applied.

(1) Clothing similar to that which the perpetrator wore at the time of the offense. Abraham, 617 F.2d at 187; Chibbaro, 361 F.2d at 365; Caldwell v. United States, 338 F.2d 385 (8th Cir. 1964).

(2) Weapons similar to that which the perpetrator had or used at the time of the offense. United States v. Cunningham, 423 F.2d 1269 (4th Cir. 1970).

(3) Property similar to that which the perpetrator stole. Chibbaro, 361 F.2d at 365.

(4) Drugs; form and amount of chunks of hashish were similar to hashish seized from accused's yellow knapsack. United States v. Parker, 10 M.J. 415 (C.M.A. 1981).

(5) Blood stains which could be identified as the same type as the victim, but not positively the blood of the victim. United States v. Garries, 19 M.J. 845 (A.F.C.M.R. 1985), aff'd on other grounds, 22 M.J. 288 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 107 S.Ct. 575 (1987).

3. Other relevant evidence. If the item is relevant it may be admitted, even though there is no showing that the item was indeed directly connected with the accused or that the offered item is similar. In United States v. Noreen, 48 C.M.R. 228 (A.C.M.R. 1973), the accused was charged with murder. The victim's body bore several cuts and puncture wounds. A knife was found in the victim's house, but was never directly connected to the accused nor was it offered as a murder weapon. It was shown, however, to be the type of weapon which could have been used. The Army Court of Military Review held that the knife was relevant because "[t]o some degree it would show that a weapon was available which may have been used by the assailant." Id. at 233.

4. Establishing nature of a substance purported to be an illicit drug. A number of cases allow a lay person's opinion testimony to serve to establish a substance as an illicit drug. See, e.g., United States v. Accordino, 15 M.J. 825 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983); United States v. Morris, 13 M.J. 666 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982); United States v. Mackey, 7 M.J. 649 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 7 M.J. 391 (C.M.A. 1979); United States v. Watkins, 5 M.J. 612 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 5 M.J. 326 (C.M.A. 1978). In drug cases, failure to establish the substance as the drug set forth in the specification renders the physical evidence irrelevant to the case.

Example: An NIS agent, who has handled marijuana in over one hundred cases, may, upon establishing a proper foundation, render an opinion as to the nature of the "green-brown vegetable matter" he seized from the person of the accused. He may testify that, in his opinion, based upon his experience, the "baggie" of vegetable matter is in fact marijuana.

1007 LAYING A FOUNDATION AT TRIAL FOR REAL EVIDENCE

A. General. Prior to litigating the issue of admissibility of real evidence at trial, counsel should decide on the specific theory or theories justifying admission, then select the most efficient method of identification for use to gain admission. Counsel should then insure that all valuable evidence is admitted. When proving the chain of custody, for example, the witnesses called should, if possible, testify to the condition of the evidence when received and transferred even though such evidence may not be strictly necessary as a matter of theory. Furthermore, even if one method of identifying real evidence would be sufficient to gain the admission of evidence, alternative methods should also be employed if the additional steps required will not confuse the trier of fact or cause undue delay in the trial. The alternative method may add to the weight the fact-finder will give the evidence.

B. Display of evidence. It is generally considered unprofessional conduct, and possibly reversible error, for counsel to have unadmitted real evidence visible to the court members or witnesses prior to the time admission is sought. When a witness who has been called to identify a piece of evidence is, without any testimony relating to that evidence, shown the evidence and asked about it, the opposition may properly object on the grounds of a leading question. In view of the significant prejudice such an action may cause if the evidence is critical, a motion for a mistrial might be appropriate. See United States v. McDowell, 13 C.M.A. 129, 32 C.M.R. 129 (1962).

1008 SPECIAL CONSIDERATIONS

A. Verification of photographs, maps, charts, etc. The use of photographs, maps, charts, etc. as a form of physical evidence can be highly effective. It will help paint a picture of the oral testimony, highlighting for the trier of fact and appellate authorities those points considered most important by counsel. Such exhibits also help clarify complicated factual or technical testimony for the fact-finder. Notwithstanding the obvious value such testimony may have, it presents difficult issues of proof for the proponent. Exhibits in this category must be adequately verified before they can be used. For example, if a map or photograph is going to be used, a witness must first verify that the area depicted in the exhibit is what it purports to be. The witness need not have made the photo or map, but must be familiar with the area and further be able to verify that the exhibit actually looks like the area represented by the exhibit. Counsel must elicit sufficient testimony to demonstrate that the witness' personal knowledge and observation of the area is sufficient. Failure to do so will prohibit the exhibit's admission. See, e.g., United States v. Richendollar, 22 M.J. 231 (C.M.A. 1986) (legal clerk who observed photograph negatives being developed could properly authenticate photos). United States v. Howell, 16 M.J. 1003 (A.C.M.R. 1983) (photographic evidence from automated teller machine admissible using testimony of roommate as to accused's appearance); United States v. Richendollar, 22 M.J. 231 (C.M.A. 1986).

B. Use at trial. Using the exhibit presents additional problems for counsel and witness alike. The mechanical process of identifying each aspect of the exhibit and properly marking it with a number or letter is very time-consuming and, from the finder of fact's view, possibly extremely boring. Nonetheless, if the exhibit's proponent is going to use the map, photo, or chart effectively, each witness must be thoroughly prepared concerning the appropriate techniques involved. If a chart or map is to be used, it must be large enough for it to be easily read by the trier of fact, and it must be large enough to remain uncluttered and legible if marked upon by the witnesses. If a photograph is used at court, attempts should be made to have the picture taken under the same circumstances and time of day that the alleged offense occurred. Finally, a blackboard drawing should not be used unless it can be photographed or reproduced in some manner for inclusion in the record of trial. See R.C.M. 808, MCM, 1984. See also United States v. White, 23 M.J. 84 (C.M.A. 1986) concerning Mil.R.Evid. 403 considerations; United States v. Anderson, 21 M.J. 751 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985); United States v. Stroup, 24 M.J. 760 (A.F.C.M.R. 1987).

1009 FINAL COMMENTS. Physical evidence can have a significant impact upon the decision of the trier of fact. It should be recognized, however, that the significance of such evidence will be perceived by the trier of fact only if the evidence is properly submitted in a manner which will ensure its admissibility, i.e., establish proper identity, relevancy, and proper foundation. The opposing party, conversely, must be diligent in making appropriate objections to the admissibility of physical evidence if the identity or relevancy of the physical evidence is not properly established or if other requisite foundations for admissibility are not established. Additionally, opposing counsel should always consider making a Mil.R.Evid. 403 objection to any physical evidence the probative value of which is outweighed by its prejudicial effect. Opposing counsel, for example, should object under Mil.R.Evid. 403 to the introduction of gory photographs of the victim of an assault. See, e.g., United States v. Burks, 36 M.J. 447 (C.M.A. 1993) (photographs admissible for a legitimate purpose not barred simply because they also may tend to inflame or shock). United States v. Schuring, 16 M.J. 664 (A.C.M.R. 1983) (two color photographs of the murder victim were admissible because they were limited in number, clinical in nature, and relevant to corroborate the accused's confession and the pathologist's testimony). See also United States v. Murphy, 30

M.J. 1040 (A.C.M.R. 1990) (admission of gruesome photographs of murder victims' bodies was not an abuse of discretion); United States v. Nixon, 30 M.J. 501 (A.F.C.M.R. 1989) (judge did not abuse his discretion in admitting color photographs of murder victim showing injuries to victim's head, kidney, back, and buttocks where nature and extent of injuries tended to negate accused's claim of accident). It should be argued that such photographs are so inflammatory that they will be given undue and misapplied consideration by the trier of fact and, therefore, the probative value of the photographs is far outweighed by their prejudicial effect. Failure to raise such an objection will generally constitute a waiver of the issue on appeal. Mil.R.Evid. 103(a)(1). Furthermore, it would also be advisable for opposing counsel to request a limiting instruction in a member's trial with respect to any demonstrative evidence that is introduced to help ensure that the trier of fact realizes that the demonstrative evidence is for illustrative purposes only and that such evidence is not to be confused with other substantive evidence admitted at trial.

CHAPTER XI

SENTENCING

1101 INTRODUCTION (Key Numbers 1300 - 1304). In civilian trials, the sentencing authority is often a different person than the trier of fact who considered the case on the merits. In state and Federal courts, for example, if an accused has a jury trial on the merits, the jury completes its task by rendering a verdict as to guilt or innocence. The jury will not be involved in the sentencing of the accused except in rare instances (e.g., capital cases). Instead, the trial judge will sentence the accused after considering a presentencing report and other information provided by the parties. Courts-martial, however, are not bifurcated in this manner. The accused at a special or general court-martial has a right to be tried by a court composed of members, or an accused may request to be tried by military judge alone. In either case, the trier of fact on the merits will also impose the sentence. At summary courts-martial, the summary court-martial officer will act as the trier of fact on the merits and will also impose the sentence.

The sentencing hearing follows a finding of guilty, whether by military judge alone, by a court composed of members, or by a summary court-martial officer. Unlike civilian trials, which utilize neutral presentencing reports as the major basis for determining an appropriate sentence (see Fed. R. Crim. Proc. 32), court-martial procedure during sentencing continues to be an adversary proceeding. No presentence report by a neutral party is prepared. Therefore, counsel for both sides must be intimately familiar with proper sentencing procedure, and counsel must be as vigilant in presenting a sentencing case as they were in presenting their case on the merits.

In guilty plea cases, the sentencing hearing is of paramount concern to all parties since the total focus is upon a single issue—the appropriate sentence to be adjudged. All parties, therefore, are naturally motivated to conduct themselves in a tenacious, adversarial manner.

In cases contested on the merits, however, the focus is first upon resolving the issue of guilt or innocence. In a contested case, the trial on the merits may be very time-consuming and exhausting. Consequently, the sentencing portion of the trial is often viewed as anticlimactic by the counsel involved. The accused, however, views this stage of the trial to be at least as important as the trial on the merits. At this stage of the proceedings, the rank or rate, liberty, financial condition, and possibly the life of the accused are at stake. A punitive discharge, for example, may substantially prejudice the accused's ability to secure meaningful employment or to obtain government benefits. His family may also be adversely affected by the punishment imposed. The sentencing phase of the trial is important from the government's perspective as well. An appropriate sentence serves to rehabilitate the accused and acts as a specific deterrent to the accused and a general deterrent to others. Consequently, both trial counsel and defense counsel, acting in their adversarial roles, must be thoroughly familiar with sentencing procedures and must remain ever vigilant in the representation of their respective clients during this important stage of the court-martial.

1102 ORDER OF PRESENTATION OF MATTERS ON SENTENCING. R.C.M. 1001(b) sets forth the following sequence for sentencing matters:

- A. Trial counsel presents:
  - 1. The accused's service data from the charge sheet;
  - 2. the accused's personal data and character of prior service from personnel records;
  - 3. records of any prior convictions, military or civilian;
  - 4. evidence of aggravation relating to offenses on which guilty findings were made; and
  - 5. evidence of rehabilitative potential.
- B. Defense counsel presents matters in extenuation and / or mitigation.
- C. Trial and defense counsel present rebuttal and surrebuttal, as appropriate, and in the discretion of the military judge.
- D. Trial counsel presents argument.
- E. Defense counsel presents argument.
- F. Trial and defense counsel may request to present rebuttal arguments, in the discretion of the military judge.

1103 PRESENTATION OF MATTERS BY TRIAL COUNSEL (Key Number 1305)

- A. Service data of the accused. R.C.M. 1001 (b)(1). Initially, the trial counsel has the duty to inform the court of the data on the first page of the charge sheet. This includes the pay and service information and the duration and nature of any pretrial restraint imposed. The data may be read from the charge sheet, or, the discretion of the court, the data may be supplied to the court in the form of a written statement or a copy of the first page. Any objection to the data not made at trial will be waived. The nature and duration of pretrial confinement will ultimately affect the amount of adjudged confinement that may be served. The military judge must instruct the members to consider the nature and extent of pretrial restraint. United States v. Davidson, 14 M.J. 81 (C.M.A. 1982). An accused is entitled to day-for-day administrative credit for any pretrial confinement. United States v. Allen, 17 M.J. 126 (C.M.A. 1984). This credit is often referred to as "Allen credit." Additionally, R.C.M. 305(k) provides that the military judge shall order administrative credit on a day-for-day basis for periods of pretrial confinement that are considered illegal because of noncompliance with certain subsections of R.C.M. 305. The day-for-day credit for illegal pretrial confinement under R.C.M. 305(k) is to be awarded in addition to Allen credit. Additionally, case law permits the military judge to award more than the day-for-day credit allowed under R.C.M. 305(k) if the conditions of pretrial confinement are particularly harsh or if the military judge considers that the circumstances require a more appropriate remedy than day-for-day credit for the period of illegal pretrial confinement. United States v. Suzuki, 14 M.J. 491 (C.M.A. 1983).

Example: SN Smith served 30 days of pretrial confinement, all of which was illegal due to an abuse of discretion on the part of the reviewing officer. While in the brig, SN Smith is subjected to gross maltreatment. The credit that the military judge may award could be as follows:

30 days Allen credit + 30 days R.C.M. 305(k) credit + any other credit the military judge deems appropriate.

It is important to note that the convening authority is bound by the military judge's order directing administrative credit. R.C.M. 1107 (f)(4)(F).

B. *Personal data and character of prior service. R.C.M. 1001(b)(2). (Key Numbers 1305, 1306)

1. General. The trial counsel may introduce from the personnel records of the accused evidence of the marital status of the accused and the number of dependents, if any. Also, the trial counsel may introduce from such personnel records evidence of the character of the prior service of the accused. "Personnel records" include all those records "made or maintained in accordance with departmental regulations that reflect the past military efficiency, conduct, performance, and history of the accused." Normally, such information will be obtained from the service record book of the accused. Records removed from the service record but maintained by the government for some other purpose may not qualify for admission under this rule. See, e.g., United States v. Weatherspoon, 39 M.J. 762 (A.C.M.R. 1994). Live witnesses are not "personnel records." United States v. Helliker, 49 C.M.R. 869 (N.C.M.R. 1974); but see R.C.M. 1001(b)(5) (which permits the testimony of live witnesses regarding the accused's previous performance as a servicemember and potential for rehabilitation).

2. Applicability of the rule of completeness. The case of United States v. Morgan, 15 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1983) added a new twist to the presentation of evidence concerning the accused's prior service. In Morgan, the defense sought to have the trial counsel introduce favorable evidence from the accused's service record—along with some unfavorable evidence—to preclude the trial counsel from calling live witnesses to testify in rebuttal of the defense material. The court, relying on the underlying Federal Rules of Evidence (Fed.R.Evid.) and the policy behind Military Rule of Evidence (Mil.R.Evid.) 106 favoring completeness, (the Mil.R.Evid. were not in effect at the time of the accused's court-martial) held that, if the trial counsel offers in evidence personnel records that reflect the past conduct and performance of the accused, the defense may successfully object if favorable portions that would provide a more complete and accurate picture of the accused's conduct and performance are omitted from the offered record. In other words, the accused's entire service record was considered as a single "writing" for purposes of Mil.R.Evid. 106 completeness. The court held, however, that the rule applies to both sides; trial counsel may successfully object if the defense offers only documents from accused's service record that are favorable to the accused, and thus present an incomplete picture of accused's conduct and behavior. Unfortunately, the result in some cases may be that nothing is presented to the sentencing authority. Since Morgan, however, the Manual for Courts-Martial has been changed. Although Morgan addressed generally the issue of the doctrine of completeness and analogized to Mil.R.Evid. 106, the holding appeared to be based more specifically upon an interpretation of former paragraph 75(b). See Executive Order No. 12,315 dated 29 July 1981; United States v. Morgan, 15 M.J. at 128, n.8 at 134-35. The Army Court of Military Review addressed this issue upon the first MCM change after Morgan and held that the service record book of an accused is not a unitary record and that the prosecution was free to rebut evidence presented by the defense. United States v. Abner, 17 M.J. 747 (A.C.M.R. 1984). Similarly, under the 1984 revision, R.C.M. 1001(b)(2) does not treat the service record book as a unitary record. Instead, any objections that a service record document is incomplete or inaccurate must state in what specific regard the particular document is inaccurate or incomplete. See R.C.M. 1001 analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 21. In spite of these efforts to overrule Morgan, the Court of Military Appeals apparently decided to breathe new life into the Morgan decision. In United States v. Salgado-Agosto, 20 M.J. 238 (C.M.A. 1985), the court reaffirmed the Morgan case with only passing reference to the post-Morgan changes to the MCM. Both Morgan and Salgado-Agosto involved Army personnel records, a distinguishing factor for Navy and Marine Corps counsel, but in United States v. Traegler, NMCM No. 86-2320 (N.M.C.M.R. Aug. 19, 1986), the Navy-Marine Court of Military Review indicated in dicta that the same rule should apply to Navy service records. Subsequent amendment to R.C.M. 1001 has again attempted to change this result, See R.C.M. 1001 analysis, MCM 1984, app. 21 (1987 amendment). See also United States v. Merrill, 25 M.J. 501 (A.F.C.M.R. 1987) (government is not required, during sentencing, to produce material which it does not, and is not required, to maintain).

3. Prior record of service. There are a number of exhibits that may be introduced to reflect the character of the accused's service.

a. Personnel records, in general. (Key Number 1315) Documents reflecting the history of the accused's assignments, advancements or reductions in grade, awards and decorations, and mental capacity may be considered in the sentencing stage. Additionally, evidence that the accused had been given fair warning of deficiencies and was warned of the consequences of future infractions is admissible. For example, the "frequent involvement" warning placed in the accused's service record (page 13, USN; page 11, USMC) may be admissible under R.C.M. 1001(b)(2) as relevant to the issue of sentencing. Such entries reflect that the accused's prior history of service was not exemplary and, notwithstanding the fact that the accused was duly counseled about the deficiencies and was duly warned about the consequences, the accused chose to ignore the warning and again flout military authority. Even if the disciplinary actions that precipitated the frequent involvement warning are not themselves admissible, the frequent involvement warning may still be admissible. United States v. Collazo, No. 78-0322 (N.C.M.R. 13 July 1978) (unpublished). When the trial counsel desires to introduce personnel records of the accused under this provision, only those records that relate to the past conduct and performance of the accused since entering the military service are admissible. Notations on personnel records referring to such things as preservice use of drugs and preservice juvenile conviction would not be admissible. United States v. Martin, 5 M.J. 888 (N.C.M.R. 1978); United States v. Galloway, No. 76-1677 (N.C.M.R. 14 September 1976). Documents reflecting preservice misconduct, however, may be admissible for purposes of impeachment, United States v. Honeycutt, 6 M.J. 751 (N.C.M.R. 1978), or as evidence of convictions admissible under R.C.M. 1001(b)(3). See United States v. Delaney, 27 M.J. 501 (A.C.M.R. 1988) (preservice arrest record inadmissible as "personal data"). Mil.R.Evid. 403 may also come into play to exclude evidence based on the danger of unfair prejudice to the accused. See, e.g., United States v. Zakaria, 38 M.J. 280 (C.M.A. 1993) (in sentencing for larceny, abuse of discretion to admit letter of reprimand for prior sexual misconduct with a child); United States v. Zengel, 32 M.J. 642 (C.G.C.M.R.) (error to admit record documenting a prior arrest), petition denied, 33 M.J. 185 (C.M.A. 1991).

b. The right to rebut "adverse matter" in service records. There is an additional issue which must be addressed before "adverse matter" reflecting the character of accused's prior service may be admitted into evidence, and it is discussed in United States v. Shelwood, 15 M.J. 222 (C.M.A. 1983). In that case, the trial counsel introduced two "administrative remarks" counseling warnings from the page 11 of the Marine accused's service record book. One was merely signed by the accused and the other was accompanied by an illegible signature. The Shelwood court cited Article 1110 of U.S. Navy Regulations, 1973, which, at the time of Shelwood's trial, stated:

Adverse matter shall not be placed in the record of a person in the Naval service without his knowledge. . . . [S]uch matters shall be first referred to the person reported upon for such statements as he may choose to make. If the person reported upon does not desire to make a statement, he shall so state in writing.

The court then held that the entries constituted adverse matter and, since there was no indication that the accused was afforded an opportunity to make a statement with respect to the entries, they were excluded. Since the Shelwood case, further developments have clarified the issue. In United States v. West, 17 M.J. 627 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983), petition denied, 18 M.J. 22 (C.M.A. 1984), the Navy-Marine Corps Court of Military Review held that the Shelwood doctrine does not extend to records of unauthorized absence or NJP. Additionally, Article 1110 was amended on 1 March 1984. (See Article 1122, U.S. Navy Regulations, 1990.) The article now states, in effect, that, except for medical records, the right of the member to have an opportunity to peruse the matter and rebut the same applies only to officer fitness reports and correspondence relating thereto; and to enlisted performance evaluations and correspondence relating thereto of E-5's and above. See ALNAV 036/84. Therefore, Shelwood will be inapplicable to all post-amendment adverse service record entries of E-4's and below and to post-amendment adverse matters in the service records of officers and E-5's and above if such matters do not relate to fitness reports or enlisted performance evaluations. The trial advocate must take note, however, that the Shelwood rules are still fully applicable to service record entries made prior to 1 March 1984.

c. Nonjudicial punishment records. (Key Numbers 1312, 1313, 1314) Assuming the personnel record was made in accordance with appropriate regulations [e.g., MILPERSMAN, art. 5030320 (USN); IRAM, para. 4015 (USMC); JAGMAN 0109e], evidence that nonjudicial punishment (NJP) was imposed upon the accused is admissible subject to certain limitations.

(1) JAGMAN limitations. NJP's must relate to offenses committed prior to trial, during the current enlistment, and must not be more than two years old. The two-year period is measured from the date of the last offense to which the NJP related to the date of the first offense for which the accused was found guilty at court. Periods of unauthorized absence are excluded from calculating the two-year period. JAGMAN 0141.

(2) Booker limitations

(a) For persons not attached to or embarked upon a vessel at the time the NJP was conducted, such NJP must have complied with the requirements of United States v. Booker, 5 M.J. 238 (C.M.A. 1977), unless the NJP was conducted prior to 11 October 1977. United States v. Syro, 7 M.J. 431 (C.M.A. 1979). Booker does not apply to NJP proceedings involving an accused who is attached to or embarked on a vessel at the time the NJP was conducted since such an accused has no right to refuse NJP. In cases where Booker applies, trial counsel must prove that the accused was given an opportunity to consult with counsel and either that he consulted with counsel or affirmatively waived that right prior to electing NJP. See NJS Procedure Study Guide for information about how the courts define "attached to or embarked on" a vessel.

(b) May the military judge question the accused to determine if the Booker requirements were met? In 1980, the Court of Military Appeals answered this question in the affirmative, but then reversed itself two years later in light of a new Supreme Court decision. United States v. Spivey, 10 M.J. 7 (C.M.A. 1980) originally held that, in a guilty plea trial, the accused waives his right against self-incrimination. The court also held that the military judge's inquiry is not involved with the commission of an offense and thus, Article 31, UCMJ, and the capital fifth amendment are inapplicable at the sentencing stage. Furthermore, Spivey dicta indicated that the right against self-incrimination was inapplicable during sentencing even if the accused pled not guilty. However, the Navy-Marine Corps Court of Military Review rejected the principle stated in Spivey and held that it was not constitutionally permissible for the military judge to conduct such an inquiry. This court held that any effort to counsel an accused to speak against his will at the sentencing stage of the trial clearly contravenes the fifth amendment. United States v. Sauer, 11 M.J. 872 (N.M.C.M.R. 1981), aff'd, 15 M.J. 113 (C.M.A. 1983). The Sauer court relied upon the United States Supreme Court's holding in Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981) that the fifth amendment applied to the sentencing stage of a trial, and that the fifth amendment protects an accused from being a "deluded instrument" of his own execution. The Court of Military Appeals resolved the conflict when it affirmed N.M.C.M.R. in United States v. Sauer, 15 M.J. 113 (C.M.A. 1983), and overruled Spivey. The court approved the reasoning in the N.M.C.M.R. decision, relied on the Estelle decision as controlling, and distinguished Federal decisions that had limited Estelle to capital cases. Consequently, if an NJP or, by analogy, a summary court-martial conviction, does not comply with the Booker requirements on its face, the military judge may not question the accused to "fill in the blanks." See also United States v. Cowles, 16 M.J. 467 (C.M.A. 1983) (the military judge may not question an accused with regard to compliance with Booker despite his waiver of self-incrimination during the plea stage).

(c) What service record entries satisfy Booker? In United States v.

Wheaton, 18 M.J. 159 (C.M.A. 1984), the trial counsel introduced several mast records with Booker warnings which demonstrated that the accused was informed of his rights, but did not show which rights he elected. In upholding the admission of such evidence in aggravation, the Court of Military Appeals ruled that military judges may rely upon a presumption of regularity that a nonjudicial punishment following documentation that the accused was advised of his rights is indicative of the accused's decision not to request trial by court-martial. But see United States v. Elston, 34 M.J. 1036 (N.M.C.M.R. 1992) (record of prior NJP that was accompanied by rights advisement and election form indicating that accused had refused NJP did not enjoy this presumption of regularity and should not have been admitted).

(3) Other limitations. An incomplete or illegible record of punishment is generally inadmissible, except where the omission has been accounted for elsewhere in the form or by independent evidence. United States v. Mack, 9 M.J. 300, 324 (C.M.A. 1980). See also United States v. Negrone, 9 M.J. 171 (C.M.A. 1980); United States v. Rimmer, 39 M.J. 1083 (A.C.M.R. 1994). Even if a document establishing prior punishment under article 15 is sufficient on its face, but the accused establishes by independent credible evidence that there was an essential omission or irregularity in the procedure for imposing punishment, the record of NJP will not be admissible. Mack, 9 M.J. at 300.

(4) Waiver of objections. Failure to object to an obvious defect on an NJP record waives the objection. United States v. McLemore, 10 M.J. 238 (C.M.A. 1981). The majority noted that "[t]he Military Rules of Evidence now have taken a very expansive view of waiver by failure to object. See Rule 103(a)(1)." Id. at 240 n.1. Failure to object does not waive the issue, however, if there has been "plain error" which materially prejudices the substantial rights of the accused. United States v. Dyke, 16 M.J. 426 (C.M.A. 1983) (plain error to admit a record of nonjudicial punishment which contained no signature, legible or otherwise). In United States v. Yarbough, 33 M.J. 122 (C.M.A. 1991), the court held that to admit an NJP record still pending appeal was not "plain error," and failure to object waived the issue.

(5) Records of vacation. If any suspension of nonjudicial punishment is later vacated, the record of vacation is admissible in addition to the NJP record. The sentencing authority may normally infer that the vacation was the result of the accused's misconduct. The presumption is that the vacation was preceded by notice and an opportunity to reply to the adverse matters. United States v. Covington, 10 M.J. 64 (C.M.A. 1980). This presumption may be rebutted by evidence to the contrary. See United States v. Stewart, 12 M.J. 143, 144 n.2 (C.M.A. 1981): "[S]ince appellant appeared in court in the uniform of [an E-4] and testified concerning his unawareness of the reduction in grade, the military judge arguably was on notice to inquire further into compliance with the required procedures."

C. Evidence of prior conviction. R.C.M. 1001(b)(3). (Key Numbers 1310, 1311).

1. Under R.C.M. 1001(b)(3), the trial counsel may introduce evidence of prior military and civilian convictions even if the convictions are not similar to the offense or offenses of which the accused has been found guilty at his present court-martial. There are, however, certain conditions set forth below that affect the admissibility of convictions.

a. A vacation of a suspended sentence is not itself a conviction and is not admissible under this Manual provision. It may be admissible under R.C.M. 1001(b)(2), however, as reflecting the character of prior service of the accused.

b. A summary court-martial conviction, otherwise admissible, may be inadmissible due to failure to comply with the decision in Booker, 5 M.J. at 238.

c. For a civilian conviction to be admissible under R.C.M. 1001(b)(3), it must be a "conviction" under the law of the civilian jurisdiction. See United States v. Hughes, 26 M.J. 119 (C.M.A. 1988) for a decision where an "Order Deferring Adjudication" entered in a Texas court was not a conviction under Texas law, regardless of the "order's" admissibility for sentencing in a Texas courtroom. See also United States v. Smith, 25 M.J. 222 (C.M.A. 1987) and United States v. Evans, 26 M.J. 961 (A.C.M.R. 1988). A "juvenile adjudication" is not a "conviction" for purposes of this rule. United States v. Slovacek, 24 M.J. 140 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 484 U.S. 855 (1987). United States v. White, 47 M.J. 139 9C.A.A.F. 1997)

d. There are no automatic rules of exclusion based on the age of a conviction. However, Mil.R.Evid. 403 may be useful when trying to exclude a very old conviction. See also United States v. Allen, 21 M.J. 507 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 21 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1985) (civilian conviction for more recent offenses than those for which accused convicted at instant trial was admissible under R.C.M. 1001(b)(3)); United States v. Caniete, 28 M.J. 426 (C.M.A. 1989) (convictions between date of offense for which accused was on trial and date of trial were "prior convictions" admissible under R.C.M. 1001(b)(3)(A)).

2. Pendency of an appeal does not render evidence of a conviction inadmissible, except that a conviction by summary court-martial or by special court-martial without a military judge may not be used during sentencing until review is final under either Art. 64 or 66, UCMJ. Although pendency of appeals from other courts-martial does not render those convictions inadmissible, evidence of the pendency of appeal is admissible as relevant to the weight to be given such convictions.

3. Method of proof

(a) Documentary evidence. Prior convictions are usually proved by introducing the record of conviction or the pertinent personnel records of the accused (e.g., Navy service record page 7, Marine service record page 13). See United States v. Barnes, 33 M.J. 468 (C.M.A. 1992) (government may also use DOD Form 1966/3 [questionnaire accompanying the enlistment contract] to prove accused's prior civilian convictions). Records of summary courts-martial should clearly reflect the presence or waiver of counsel as required by Booker, 5 M.J. at 238. Authentication of these records of conviction will normally be in accordance with the provisions of Mil.R.Evid. 902(2), 902(4), or 902(4a). But see United States v. Mahaney, 33 M.J. 846 (A.C.M.R. 1991) (civilian conviction was not Mil.R.Evid. 902(2) self-authenticating).

b. Other evidence. Proof of convictions is not limited to documentary evidence. A witness may be called to testify to the conviction, but they may not recount the entirety of the prior case. United States v. Brogan, 33 M.J. 588, 593 (N.M.C.M.R. 1991) (extent of proof allowed: "the type of court, a brief description of the offense as would be contained in a promulgating order, the sentence, and any action by reviewing or appellate authorities is admissible information").

D. Evidence aggravating the offense. R.C.M. 1001(b)(4) (Key Number 1306).

1. General. During sentencing, the court-martial may consider any evidence properly introduced on the merits in a contested case. R.C.M. 1001(f)(2). But see United States v. Howe, 37 M.J. 1062 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993) (uncorroborated confession was never properly introduced on the merits and therefore could not be considered in sentencing). Circumstances surrounding the commission of the offense which have not been previously introduced may be introduced at the sentencing stage regardless of whether the accused pled guilty or not. See United States v. Vickers, 13 M.J. 403 (C.M.A. 1982). Such evidence may include testimony from witnesses to the incident or from the victim of the crime, and stipulations of fact or stipulations of expected testimony. Oral and written depositions are automatically admissible, except in capital cases. R.C.M. 1001(b)(4). But see United States v. Woodard, 39 M.J. 1022 (A.C.M.R. 1994) (affidavit was inadmissible hearsay).

a. What is aggravation? The aggravation evidence must directly relate to or result from the offenses of which the accused has been found guilty. R.C.M. 1001(b)(4). See, e.g., United States v. Prevatte, 40 M.J. 396 (C.M.A. 1994) (expert's testimony about the potential psychological problems of the child-victim absent incarceration of the perpetrator was admissible); United States v. Wilson, 35 M.J. 473 (C.M.A. 1992) (testimony of victim's father about family's distress and their frantic search for the missing girl was admissible as victim impact evidence); United States v. Rosato, 32 M.J. 93 (C.M.A.

1991) (commander's sentencing testimony about time and effort expended to train accused and effect of loss of security clearance admissible to show impact of offense on unit mission); United States v. Fontenot, 29 M.J. 244 (C.M.A. 1989) (testimony of victim's parents about effect of rape on victim and her family was admissible); United States v. Needham, 23 M.J. 383 (C.M.A. 1987) (Department of Justice periodical tracing the history, use, and effects of hallucinogens was admissible in sentencing for distribution of LSD to show potential effects on users); United States v. Hammond, 17 M.J. 218 (C.M.A. 1984) (expert testimony on rape trauma); United States v. Pearson, 17 M.J. 149 (C.M.A. 1984) (testimony from prosecution witnesses concerning the homicide victim's character and magnitude of loss felt by his family and military community was admissible; however, certain responses so invaded the province of the fact-finder that curative instructions were required); United States v. Marshall, 14 M.J. 157 (C.M.A. 1982) (victim's testimony regarding the effects on her lifestyle resulting from a rape was admissible); United States v. Snodgrass, 37 M.J. 844 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993) (color photograph of murder victim taken shortly after her death was admissible); United States v. Dudding, 34 M.J. 975 (A.C.M.R. 1992) (evidence of impact of child sexual abuse on victims in general was admissible, where it was consistent with evidence of the specific impact on the victim), aff'd, 37 M.J. 429 (C.M.A. 1993); United States v. Lawson, 33 M.J. 946 (N.M.C.M.R. 1991) (death certificate of road guard lost due to dereliction of duty and a summary statement of the efforts made and costs incurred to find him were admissible), aff'd, 36 M.J. 415 (C.M.A. 1993); United States v. Schwarz, 24 M.J. 823 (A.C.M.R. 1987) (government, victim of accused's negligent destruction of an ambulance, allowed to use victim impact statement); United States v. Snodgrass, 22 M.J. 866 (A.C.M.R. 1986) (expert testimony on likelihood of psychological damage to child-abuse victim), petition denied, 24 M.J. 234 (C.M.A. 1987); United States v. Hood, 12 M.J. 890 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (value of property accused stole including black market value); United States v. Corl, 6 M.J. 914 (N.C.M.R.) (effects of drugs in drug sale case), aff'd, 8 M.J. 47 (C.M.A. 1979); United States v. Zimmerman, M.J. 782 (A.C.C.A. 1996). (Accused's "white supremacist" views in disposing of stolen ordinance admissible, as racist views are destructive of good order and discipline).

In Roberts v. United States, 445 U.S. 552 (1980), refusals of an accused to cooperate with the government were held admissible. This would apply in the military where the accused is asked to cooperate prior to trial, but refuses. It would be permissible to cross-examine an accused after a sworn statement by asking if he would be willing to cooperate with the government in the future. Conversely, evidence that the accused cooperated is admissible during sentencing. See, e.g., United States v. Thomas, 11 M.J. 388 (C.M.A. 1981). Cf. United States v. Wright, 20 M.J. 518 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 21 M.J. 309 (C.M.A. 1985), where it was held proper during sentencing for the military judge to consider the appellant's sworn testimony during sentencing in a prior trial acknowledging he had made a mistake and deserved another chance, as well as the judge's admonition to the accused to avoid committing further drug offenses (the accused was convicted of two specifications of distribution of cocaine and one of attempted wrongful distribution of cocaine).

b. What is not aggravation? See, e.g., United States v. Davis, 39 M.J. 281 (C.M.A. 1994) (victim's testimony as to how he would feel if the accused received no punishment not admissible as evidence of victim impact); United States v. Kirkpatrick, 33 M.J. 132 (C.M.A. 1991) (service policy against drug use not valid aggravation); United States v. Ferrer, 33 M.J. 96 (C.M.A. 1991) (testimony of social worker as to number of child abuse cases in her jurisdiction was not directly related to accused's offenses); United States v. Sherman, 32 M.J. 449 (C.M.A. 1991) (government argument that sentence should send message that United States is concerned with lives and property of German people held to be in error, but opinion suggests community impact evidence would be admissible); United States v. Bartoletti, 32 M.J. 419 (C.M.A. 1991) (record of command crimes to show extent of car theft problem on post found to be error).

2. Use of providence inquiry. Much like the rule allowing the court-martial to consider evidence properly admitted on the merits in a contested case, the court may also consider the matters admitted by the accused during a proper guilty plea inquiry. United States v. Holt, 27 M.J. 57 (C.M.A. 1988). These statements of the accused are not automatically in evidence, however, so trial counsel must request that they be considered and defense counsel must have an opportunity to object. United States v. English, 37 M.J. 1107 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993). In a military judge sentencing, trial counsel need do nothing further. In a members sentencing, however, the members will not have heard the providence inquiry, so trial counsel must present this information to the members in some usable form. Due to the time required for transcription, stipulations are preferable. Other techniques include use of a witness who was present for the providence inquiry or a tape-recording of the inquiry. See, e.g., United States v. Irwin, 39 M.J. 1062 (A.C.M.R. 1994) (approving the procedure of playing back tape recording of inquiry to allow members to hear the aggravating circumstances admitted by the accused), petition filed, 40 M.J. 311 (C.M.A. 1994).

3. Mil.R.Evid. 403 limitations. Although aggravating circumstances surrounding the offense are generally admissible, defense counsel may properly object under Mil.R.Evid. 403 if the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by its unfair prejudice to the accused. See, e.g., United States v. Rust, 41 M.J. 472 (1995) (murder-suicide note of father of baby that died, allegedly as a result of accused's dereliction, not admissible, citing Mil.R.Evid. 403); United States v. Pooler, 18 M.J. 832 (A.C.M.R. 1984) (evidence of willingness to engage in future drug transactions expressed contemporaneously with charged offense admissible under Mil.R.Evid. 403 balancing). Failure to object, absent plain error, will waive the issue on appeal.

4. Uncharged misconduct limitations. Evidence of uncharged misconduct generally is admissible aggravation only if it is directly related to or resulting from the charged offenses. United States v. Wingart, 27 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1988). The application of this rule is found most expansively in the area of child abuse cases. In United States v. Mullens, 29 M.J. 398 (C.M.A. 1990), the court held that evidence of prior sexual liberties with members of the accused's family was admissible in sentencing for committing sodomy on the accused's son on the basis that this evidence shows the depth of the accused's sexual problems and the true impact of the offenses on the accused's family. See also United States v. Ciulla, 32 M.J. 186 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 502 U.S. 857 (1991) (court allowed testimony of the accused's fantasies about other children to be admitted on sentencing for sexually abusing his own daughter as state of mind / depth of problem evidence); United States v. Silva, 21 M.J. 336 (C.M.A. 1986) (court allowed testimony of accused's statements about prior acts given to victim of sexual abuse during commission of acts).

The Army Court of Military Review may have signaled a change of direction recently, however, stating that "[t]he evidence [the prosecution is permitted to present in aggravation] must not amount to uncharged misconduct." United States v. Pingree, 39 M.J. 884, 885 (A.C.M.R. 1994). What the court probably meant here was that uncharged misconduct is inadmissible if it is not directly related to or resulting from the charged offenses. See also United States v. Carfang, 19 M.J. 739 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984), petition denied, 21 M.J. 112 (C.M.A. 1985), where reference by the accused to uncharged drug use expressed during a dialogue with an informant was properly admitted during sentencing. See United States v. Bono, 26 M.J. 240 (C.M.A. 1988), where evidence of uncharged misconduct in an accused's confession had no bearing on the offenses charged and was inadmissible.

R.C.M. 1001(f)(2) raises another difficult issue in this area. Since the court-martial may consider any evidence (including Mil.R.Evid. 404(b) evidence) properly introduced on the merits in a contested case, shouldn't the government be able to admit the same evidence in a guilty plea case? Previous case law, following the rationale of Vickers, 13 M.J. at 403, had answered this question in the affirmative. But in the area of uncharged misconduct, the Court of Military Appeals has decided that the mere fact that evidence might have been admissible in a contested case on an issue such as motive or intent does not make this evidence admissible in sentencing if the accused pleads guilty. Wingart, 27 M.J. at 135-36. Only if the uncharged misconduct constitutes aggravating circumstances directly relating to or resulting from the offenses of which the accused is found guilty may the government offer the evidence in sentencing. Id.

5. Capital case. When a case has been referred as a capital case under R.C.M. 1004, the prosecution must seek to prove at least one of the aggravating factors listed in R.C.M. 1004(c). This evidence would not normally be introduced in the case-in-chief, but would be relevant to the imposition of the death penalty.

E. Evidence of rehabilitative potential. R.C.M. 1001(b)(5) (Key Number 1306). Under this rule, trial counsel may present, by testimony or oral deposition in accordance with R.C.M. 702(g)(1), evidence, in the form of opinion, concerning the accused's previous performance as a servicemember and potential for rehabilitation. Trial counsel must lay the appropriate foundation required for such opinion evidence in order to avoid defense objections. Defense counsel also has a valid objection if the witness testifies on direct examination about specific instances of conduct reflecting upon the accused's rehabilitative potential or past service. R.C.M. 1001(b)(5) allows evidence of specific instances to be admitted only upon cross-examination and perhaps on redirect if the defense has "opened the door." See R.C.M. 1001(b)(5) analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 21.

The purpose of this provision is to allow the court to make a more informed sentencing decision. The "introduction of evidence of this nature should not be contingent solely upon the election of the defense." Id. See United States v. Lawrence, 22 M.J. 846 (A.C.M.R. 1986), which held that it was error to consider the accused's prior sworn statement under R.C.M. 1001(b)(5) to show his limited rehabilitative potential. Lawrence illustrates two aspects of the rule. One is that other forms of evidence (other than testimony or oral deposition) are not permitted. The other is that only opinion evidence is permitted. Specific acts may be explored during cross-examination; however, which might then justify inquiry about specific acts during redirect examination.

In United States v. Horner, 22 M.J. 294 (C.M.A. 1986), a battery commander's opinion should have been stricken after the defense showed that the opinion was based solely on the witness' view of the offense and not on an assessment of the accused's character or potential. Counsel must pay close attention to the manner in which opinion testimony of rehabilitative potential is given. In United States v. Ohrt, 28 M.J. 301 (C.M.A. 1989), the court held that a witness should not be allowed to express an opinion on whether an accused should be punitively discharged. The use of euphemisms such as "[N]o potential for continued service"; "[H]e should be separated"; or the like are just other ways of saying "[G]ive the accused a punitive discharge." This type of testimony is inappropriate as an invasion of the province of the sentencing authority. The focus of rehabilitative potential testimony, therefore, is to determine whether the accused has the potential to be integrated as a productive member of society, and not whether he should remain in the armed services. This type of evidence must be based on the entire history of service of the accused and not merely on the offenses for which the accused has been found guilty. In laying a foundation for this testimony, counsel must show that the witness has sufficient contact with the accused over a sufficient period of time and under circumstances which will allow the formation of an opinion concerning rehabilitative potential. The ultimate question must be: "based on your contact with the accused, in your opinion, what is the accused's rehabilitative potential?" United States v. Aurich, 31 M.J. 95 (C.M.A. 1990). Defense counsel must be aware that, if they seek to cross-examine the witness on this foundation, they may open the door to specific instances of conduct which serve as the basis for the opinion.

The President has incorporated the holdings of these cases and others into the 1994 revision of R.C.M. 1001(b)(5), which added significant explanatory information to the previous rule. Rehabilitative potential is defined as "the accused's potential to be restored, through vocational, correctional, or therapeutic training or other corrective measures to a useful and constructive place in society." The rule also adds sections defining the proper foundation and basis for the opinion. The revision does also muddy the waters in the area of redirect examination, stating that "the scope of opinion testimony permitted on redirect may be expanded, depending upon the nature and scope of the cross-examination." Arguably, by failing to mention inquiry into specific instances on redirect, the rule may preclude it, even when such inquiry would be fair rebuttal to the cross-examination on specific instances. Alternatively, trial counsel can argue that "opinion testimony" here includes the specific instances of conduct raised on cross to test the opinion and also those raised on redirect to rehabilitate the opinion (or to rebut the inferences created by the defense cross). This latter position is probably the correct one, as it is supported by the new discussion following R.C.M. 1001(b)(5)(F).

The area of rehabilitative potential evidence has been the subject of significant litigation, even after Horner, Ohrt, and Aurich helped to define its limitations. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 41 M.J. 134 (C.M.A. 1994) (prediction of accused's "future dangerousness" is proper rehabilitative potential testimony when given by an appropriate expert as an expert opinion); United States v. Hampton, 40 M.J. 457 (C.M.A. 1994) (not only are witnesses prohibited from giving euphemism opinions, but when witnesses give a proper opinion of rehabilitative potential, trial counsel is prohibited from arguing that they testified the accused "did not deserve to remain in the Army"); United States v. Prevatte, 40 M.J. 396 (C.M.A. 1994) (in child sex abuse case, expert's testimony that accused's rehabilitative potential was high provided certain factors—including some form of confinement with treatment—were present, was pertinent to rehabilitative potential); United States v. Davis, 39 M.J. 281 (C.M.A. 1994) (victim's testimony as to how he would feel if accused received no punishment is not rehabilitative potential evidence: "Just as opinion evidence as to the propriety of a specific sentence for an accused's offense is not allowed, [Ohrt; Horner], we are not going to open the door for such testimony regarding no punishment."); United States v. Oquendo, 35 M.J. 24 (C.M.A. 1992) (testimony that accused did not have "rehabilitative potential to remain in the United States Army," despite fact that, prior to discovering these offenses, witness had held a very high opinion of the accused violated both Ohrt and Horner, since it included a euphemism and apparently was based solely on the severity of the charged offenses); United States v. Rice, 33 M.J. 451 (C.M.A. 1991) (testimony that accused "has no potential for further service" did not warrant rehearing on sentence since witnesses had valid basis for opinion and form of opinion was a mere "technical deviation"); United States v. Pompey, 33 M.J. 266 (C.M.A. 1991) (Ohrt and Horner rules apply equally to government rebuttal witnesses); United States v. Goodman, 33 M.J. 84 (C.M.A. 1991) (trial counsel questions: "Do you want [appellant] back in your unit?" and "Do you think he has a place in the Army?" violated Ohrt and Aurich); United States v. Sylvester, 38 M.J. 720 (A.C.M.R. 1994) (opinion evidence regarding rehabilitative potential is not per se inadmissible merely because defense counsel establishes on cross examination that witness assessment goes only to potential for military service rather than potential to be a productive member of society), petition filed, 40 M.J. 272 (C.M.A. 1994); United States v. Ramos, 42 M.J. 392 (CAAF 1995), (euphemism questions impermissible for defense also); United States v. Bolden, 34 M.J. 728 (N.M.C.M.R. 1991) (report stating accused had "no potential for further productive military service" inadmissible as euphemism, but also because rehabilitative potential evidence may only be "by testimony or oral deposition"); United States v. Mahaney, 33 M.J. 846 (A.C.M.R. 1991) (expert social worker who testified the accused's "prognosis for further treatment is poor" gave "exactly the sort of statement envisioned in Ohrt and R.C.M. 1001(b)(5)"); United States v. Hatchell, 33 M.J. 839 (A.C.M.R. 1991) (military judge violated Ohrt and Aurich by asking a defense witness "Do you think that he [the accused] could be rehabilitated in the sense that he could make a useful, continuing contribution in the service?").

F. Access of the defense to information to be presented by the trial counsel.
R.C.M. 701(a)(5) (Key Numbers 931, 933).

1. General. Prior to arraignment, the defense has the right, upon request, to inspect written material that the prosecution will present on sentencing. Additionally, the trial counsel must provide, upon request, a list of prosecution witnesses, if any. Failure to comply with this provision will result in a defense continuance to inspect and prepare to meet the material. R.C.M. 701(b)(1)(B) now gives the government the same rights to discovery of witnesses and written materials that the defense intends to present on sentencing.

2. R.C.M. 701(a)(5) only requires the trial counsel to disclose witnesses to be called in the government's initial case in sentencing, but does not distinguish between written material on the prosecution's initial case in sentencing and its case in rebuttal. In United States v. Clark, 37 M.J. 1098 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993) the trial counsel obtained a letter rebutting material he believed might be offered by the accused in extenuation and mitigation. The court held the government's letter did not have to be disclosed to the defense prior to trial, since it could only be used as rebuttal and could not have been offered during the government's initial case in sentencing. The court noted that this rebuttal exception would not apply if the trial counsel merely held back admissible evidence until rebuttal in an effort to "sandbag" the defense. It would still be good trial practice for the defense to make an "automatic" request, in every case, for all written material and witnesses that the prosecution intends to introduce in its initial case in sentencing and in anticipated rebuttal.

1104 PRESENTATION OF MATTERS BY THE DEFENSE.
R.C.M. 1001(c). (Key Number 1307)

A. General. The defense may present matters in rebuttal to any material presented by the prosecution and may present matters in extenuation and mitigation regardless of whether the defense offered evidence before findings. R.C.M. 1001(c)(1).

1. Matters in extenuation include circumstances surrounding the commission of an offense that do not amount to a legal defense but might cause the court to impose a lighter sentence.

Examples:

- a. The reason the accused went UA was because his father deserted his mother and left her penniless, and the accused remained UA in order to work at a better-paying job in order to support his mother.
- b. The accused returned late from liberty because there was a two-hour power failure overnight and, consequently, his trusty electric alarm clock was two hours late.

2. Matters in mitigation consist of facts concerning the particular accused which, although unrelated to the commission of the offense of which the accused stands convicted, might warrant a lesser punishment. Such evidence may, among other things, include evidence of good conduct or bravery.

Examples:

- a. The accused has an elderly parent for whom he provides the sole support.
- b. The accused has a low or high GCT.
- c. The accused's value to the service:
  - (1) Testimony from a division officer, petty officer, noncommissioned officer that the accused is a good worker;
  - (2) previous honorable discharges;

(3) awards, citations, letters of commendation, good conduct ribbons, combat record, etc.; and

(4) accused's desire to make the service a career.

d. Prior NJP for the same or related acts.

3. Allocution rights. R.C.M. 1001(c)(2).

a. Testimony. The accused may testify under oath. This rule does not, however, allow the defense to present an affidavit of the accused. When testifying in extenuation and / or mitigation, the accused is subject to cross-examination on matters brought out on direct examination and on his credibility just as is any other witness. This can be risky for the defense. In United States v. Grayson, 438 U.S. 41 (1978), the Supreme Court upheld the sentence in a case where the trial judge indicated on the record that the sentence was based, in part, on his belief that the accused had perjured himself, and that the defense evidence was a "complete fabrication." The court rejected the defense position that this was sentencing for an uncharged crime. In United States v. Young, 5 M.J. 797 (N.C.M.R.), petition denied, 6 M.J. 100 (C.M.A. 1978), the Navy court followed Grayson in a military situation. But later cases have restricted consideration of the accused's mendacity to the issue of rehabilitative potential only, disallowing any increased punishment for the perceived perjury. See United States v. Warren, 13 M.J. 278 (C.M.A. 1982) (consideration of accused's perjury on the merits). See also United States v. Edwards, 35 M.J. 351, 355 (C.M.A. 1992).

In United States v. Proctor, 34 M.J. 549 (A.F.C.M.R. 1992), aff'd, 37 M.J. 330 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 919 (1994) the court reiterated that the accused has the right to decide whether or not to testify and the manner of presenting the testimony. Defense counsel may advise against it, but the choice belongs to the accused. Here the accused chose to make a narrative sworn statement despite advice of the risks. Unfavorable matters included in the statement were properly considered on sentencing.

b. Unsworn statement. (Key Number 1309) The accused may make an unsworn statement personally, through counsel, or both. It may be oral, written, or both. An oral unsworn statement may be in the narrative form or may be made in a question-and-answer format. United States v. Michael, 4 M.J. 905 (N.C.M.R. 1978). The content of the unsworn statement is generally unrestricted. United States v. Rosato, 32 M.J. 93 (C.M.A. 1991) (military judge erred by preventing accused from discussing a rehabilitation program and his willingness to participate in it). But see United States v. Oxford, 23 M.J. 548 (A.C.M.R. 1986) (Mil.R.Evid. 412 applied to content of unsworn statement), petition denied, 24 M.J. 346 (C.M.A. 1987); United States v. Britt, 44 M.J. 731 (A.F.Ct.C.A. 1996) (unsworn statements are not "unfettered rights" and are limited to (a) extenuation (b) mitigation and (c) matters in rebuttal to the prosecution). Making an unsworn statement does not subject the accused to cross-examination, but the government may rebut any factual assertions. United States v. Konarski, 8 M.J. 146 (C.M.A. 1979). Only factual matter raised in an unsworn statement is subject to rebuttal, not the accused's statements of belief or desire. See, e.g., United States v. Partyka, 30 M.J. 242 (C.M.A. 1990); United States v. Cleveland, 29 M.J. 361 (C.M.A. 1990); United States v. Goree, 34 M.J. 1027 (N.M.C.M.R. 1992). Evidence impeaching the accused's credibility (e.g., he is a liar) is also inadmissible. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 23 M.J. 582 (N.M.C.M.R. 1986); United States v. Harris, 13 M.J. 653 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982); see also United States v. Shewmake, 6 M.J. 710 (N.C.M.R. 1978), criticized at 13 M.J. 654. After the government rebuts an unsworn statement, the accused may make a second statement to explain. United States v. Provost, 32 M.J. 98 (C.M.A. 1991).

Sworn and unsworn statements run the risk of rendering a previously accepted guilty plea improvident. Appellate courts will refrain from overturning a guilty plea absent substantial conflict with the plea, see United States v. Vega, 39 M.J. 79 (C.M.A. 1994), but defense counsel should adequately prepare their clients to help them avoid unintended results. Trial counsel must be alert for such problems if the military judge does not catch them.

c. The accused may, as always, remain silent during this phase of the trial. Trial counsel may not argue and the court may not consider the accused's silence in any adverse manner.

d. The three allocution options available to the accused are not contingent upon elections made during the trial on the merits. Thus, the fact that the accused did or did not testify on the merits is irrelevant to the type of statement, if any, he makes during sentencing.

e. The military judge is required to remind the accused of his or her rights to make a sworn or unsworn statement to the court in mitigation or extenuation of the offenses of which he stands convicted, or to remain silent. See United States v. Hawkins, 2 M.J. 23 (C.M.A. 1976). The military judge should advise the accused of these alternatives out of the presence of the court members. United States v. Richardson, 21 C.M.A. 383, 45 C.M.R. 157 (1972).

B. Relaxation of the rules of evidence for defense. R.C.M. 1001(c)(3). The formal rules of evidence may be relaxed for the defense to the extent of receiving affidavits, certificates of military and civil officers, and other writings of similar apparent authenticity and reliability as part of the defense case in extenuation and mitigation. See also Mil.R.Evid. 1101c. Note, however, that if the military judge relaxes the rules for the defense, they may also be relaxed for the prosecution in rebuttal. R.C.M. 1001(d).

C. Use of all available evidence in extenuation and mitigation. Defense counsel must be especially careful to present all available information that would be helpful to an accused in extenuation and mitigation. If counsel does not do an adequate job, there is risk of reversal due to ineffective assistance of counsel. In United States v. Rowe, 18 C.M.A. 54, 39 C.M.R. 54 (1968), the Court of Military Appeals reversed the case because the defense counsel failed to introduce evidence that the accused had been awarded the Vietnam Service Medal and the Republic of Vietnam Campaign Medal. See also United States v. Brogan, 50 C.M.R. 807 (N.C.M.R. 1976). On the other hand, if defense counsel attempts to admit excessive cumulative evidence, the court may prevent it. United States v. Harmon, 40 M.J. 107 (C.M.A. 1994).

Some evidence which was inadmissible prior to findings becomes admissible during the sentencing stage. Specific good acts, R.C.M. 1001(c)(1)(B); general good character, compare R.C.M. 1001(c)(1)(B) with Mil.R.Evid. 404(a); and letters, affidavits, and other writings that would not be admissible prior to findings can be introduced during this stage. See United States v. Maracle, 26 M.J. 431 (C.M.A. 1988) for an interesting fact situation where C.M.A. held the defense should have been allowed to present evidence of a prior court-martial and sentence as having bearing on accused's circumstances at time of trial.

While the prosecution may present evidence of the accused's lack of cooperation with law enforcement officials, the defense may want to show such cooperation and the extent to which the accused is still willing to assist law enforcement officials. If the accused is reluctant to state this in open court, the defense may request the courtroom be closed while the accused testifies about future cooperation. In United States v. Martinez, 3 M.J. 600, 602-04 (N.C.M.R. 1977), rev'd on other grounds, 5 M.J. 122 (C.M.A. 1978) (summary disposition) (C.M.A. set aside sentence because reassessment was insufficient to cure this error), the court held that, under the circumstances of the case, the trial judge abused his discretion in not closing the courtroom so that the accused could respond to questions concerning his willingness to cooperate with law enforcement officials.

The sentence of another accused at another trial is not normally proper evidence during the sentencing portion of a trial. United States v. Hutchinson, 15 M.J. 1056 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983), death sentence rev'd on other grounds, 18 M.J. 281 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 469 U.S. 981 (1984) (sentence of co-conspirator was not proper consideration during sentencing in capital case). See also United States v. Ballard, 20 M.J. 282 (C.M.A. 1985) (trial and appellate courts are not required to consider sentences of similar but unrelated cases). Highly disparate sentences in closely related cases are, however, considered by appellate courts. See, e.g., United States v. Kelly, 40 M.J. 558 (N.M.C.M.R. 1994).

D. Representing the "BCD striker"

1. One perplexing problem is representing a client who wants a bad-conduct discharge. This is commonly known in the field as a "BCD striker" case. Counsel should make a good faith effort to make his client understand the hardships that can result from being discharged in that manner. If the client is insistent on pursuing such a course, counsel must be very careful for at least two reasons. First, there is the question of determining how counsel may ethically and professionally proceed in such a case. Second, an accused who gets such a discharge may later attempt to have it overturned by claiming ineffective assistance of counsel.

2. If the defense counsel cannot dissuade the accused from such intended action, counsel must still do everything within reason to see that the accused's best case is presented at trial consistent with the accused's instructions. United States v. Blunk, 17 C.M.A. 158, 37 C.M.R. 422 (1967); United States v. Freeland, 19 C.M.A. 455, 42 C.M.R. 57 (1970). These cases indicate that the defense counsel is duty bound to present information to the court in extenuation and mitigation, and failure to do so will give rise to the claim of inadequate counsel. The Court of Military Appeals recommended that the defense counsel have the accused sign an affidavit, often referred to as a "Blunk letter," indicating that the accused requests that the defense counsel present nothing in extenuation and mitigation inconsistent with the accused's desire for a BCD. The court further recommended that counsel retain this letter on file in the event counsel's representation is later challenged by the accused as inadequate. The court also indicated in Freeland that it is appropriate for the defense counsel to allow the accused to express a desire for a punitive discharge and question the accused concerning it during the trial proceeding. In United States v. Drake, 21 C.M.A. 227, 44 C.M.R. 281 (1972), the court indicated that in appropriate cases it is not improper for the defense counsel to argue for a BCD for the accused who has expressed a desire for one, so long as the record clearly shows that the argument by counsel is in essence a plea for leniency. Even if conceding the appropriateness of a BCD at the request of the accused, and even though the imposition of a BCD may in effect be a plea for leniency, the defense counsel should still argue for the minimum of other punishments (i.e., confinement, forfeitures, reduction, etc.). See United States v. Weatherford, 19 C.M.A. 424, 42 C.M.R. 26 (1970), where counsel conceded the BCD, but argued for no confinement or minimum confinement. See also United States v. Lyons, 36 M.J. 425 (C.M.A. 1993).

The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces is moving away from a strict interpretation of its previous rule in United States v. Griffin, 25 M.J. 423 9CMA 1988) where the court previously held that the collateral consequences at courts-martial punishment are not relevant on sentencing. In United States v. Greaves, 46 M.J. 133 (C.A.A.F. 1997) the court held that when an accused is "perilously close" to retirement eligibility, the trial court should at the very least respond to members questions concerning the effects of a sentence, and moreover, give an appropriate instruction. The accused was 9 weeks away from retirement eligibility. See United States v. Becker, 46 M.J. 141 (C.A.A.F. 1997) (trial court should have permitted evidence of the projected value of retirement benefits where accused was 3 months away from retirement eligibility and would not have had to reenlist to vest).

N.M.C.M.R. has given very explicit instructions on the proper handling of BCD striker cases. In United States v. Sharrock, NMCM No 90-3841, 1991 CMR LEXIS 867 (N.M.C.M.R. Jun. 19, 1991), the court was confronted with a situation where the defense counsel queried the accused on his desires for a discharge as part of an unsworn statement; counsel also brought out the fact that he had advised the accused that this was against his interest, had tried to talk him out of it, had been directed to offer no evidence in extenuation and mitigation, and then attached the Blunk letter to the record of trial. The military judge further questioned the accused about his desires for a discharge. In ordering a rehearing on sentence, the court found that the conduct of counsel in trying to dissuade the accused and the accused's advice concerning presenting no evidence in extenuation and mitigation were simply irrelevant. The court went on to hold that questioning the accused about his desire for a discharge and an explanation of his understanding of the consequences would be sufficient, without going into the underlying dynamics of the process of attorney-client discussion of this decision. If the accused testifies, the military judge may ask questions to further clarify whether the accused truly desires a discharge and understands the lasting consequences of this decision. The Blunk letter should not be attached to the record of trial as an appellate exhibit or otherwise. See also United States v. Hunter, NMCM No 91-1289, 1991 CMR LEXIS 1466 (N.M.C.M.R. Dec. 5, 1991).

1. Even when the accused is protected by a pretrial agreement, the defense counsel has a duty to present extenuation, mitigation, and argument. Counsel may be able to secure a sentence lower than that contained in the agreement, and it is his or her duty to attempt to do so.

2. The accused's service record should be checked closely for favorable information (such as letters of commendation or appreciation, performance evaluations, and records of courses taken and schools attended).

3. One difficult task is to argue for an appropriate punishment after the accused's guilt has been contested at length. Counsel must accept at this stage of the trial that the court has found the accused guilty, and that there is no longer any use in contesting his guilt at the trial level. Do not argue guilt or innocence at this stage of the trial. Such argument may militate against the accused.

4. Testimony of the accused: Sworn, unsworn, or silence? This basic decision as to which method to use will inevitably turn on the desire of the accused and the following three criteria: the demeanor of the accused, how controlled the accused can be on the stand, and what, if anything, the accused has to hide. The impact of an unsworn statement varies tremendously among individual judges and court members. However, there are three possible (and common) attitudes of the judiciary toward such statements:

- a. It will be given the same weight as sworn testimony;
- b. it will be given some weight, though very little; or
- c. it will be given no weight and, in fact, offends the judge.

Counsel must remember that, regardless of the inclinations of a particular judge, what the judge is most apt to notice are these factors: (a) is the statement consistent with other evidence?, and (b) what has the accused left out? Counsel would be foolish to think that the military judge will not notice, for instance, that the accused in his unsworn statement expressed no desire to return to duty or to go to sea if ordered.

Other considerations:

- a. Total silence by the accused can be dangerous—even a statement by counsel is better;
- b. an unsworn statement before members can be dangerous, since they may wish to cross-examine; when told that they cannot do so, they are also reminded that an unsworn statement is "not evidence"; and
- c. a sworn statement may be equally dangerous if the accused has something to hide or can be easily impeached.

5. Presenting the accused. Whenever possible, the accused should be "fleshed out" as much as possible, assuming that "control" considerations described above in section (4) do not dictate otherwise. A very cursory presentation of the accused, with no background information, is of little value in making him appear to be a real person. Members are often reluctant to give harsh sentences to "real people." In this same vein, counsel must remember his or her duty to make the accused comfortable in court. This includes the obligation of counsel to position himself or herself when questioning the accused so that the accused can comfortably speak to the military judge or members, and not just to counsel. On the other hand, defense counsel should remember that the more information he draws out of an accused, the more information an astute trial counsel has available upon which to cross-examine.

6. Assuming that the accused is going to testify under oath, and therefore be subject to cross-examination, counsel must decide whether to present this testimony before or after other extenuation and mitigation evidence. If the accused testifies first, the court cannot cross-examine him about matters later presented in his behalf. Counsel should remember that such evidence, if presented before the testimony of the accused, may provide considerable material, perhaps the only material, from which the trial counsel may cross-examine the accused.

7. Counsel should be wary of the "professional" extenuation and mitigation witnesses who will always speak well of personnel they supervise. Such witnesses are easily impeached—often by the use of evaluations which they themselves have completed and which are inconsistent with their own testimony.

1105 REBUTTAL AND SURREBUTTAL. R.C.M. 1001(d).

A. Trial counsel may offer evidence to rebut any matter presented by the defense counsel in extenuation or mitigation, even if it has arisen through an unsworn statement by the accused. See, e.g., United States v. Hamilton, 20 C.M.A. 91, 42 C.M.R. 283 (1970). In a case of potentially far-reaching implications for both trial and defense counsel, the Court of Military Appeals has further stated that the defense "must accept responsibility not only for the specific evidence it offers in mitigation, but also for the reasonable inferences which must be drawn from it." United States v. Strong, 17 M.J. 263, 266-267 (C.M.A. 1984). In this case, where the defense testimony implied that the accused had an outstanding military character, the trial counsel was properly allowed to correct this impression through inquiry into an inadmissible NJP. But see United States v. Edwards, 39 M.J. 528 (A.F.C.M.R. 1994) (Air Force Regulation prohibiting admission of old NJP records in rebuttal controlled over the Strong principle), petition filed, 39 M.J. 439 (C.M.A. 1994).

The military judge generally has broad discretion in determining what is proper rebuttal. See, e.g., United States v. Dudding, 37 M.J. 429 (C.M.A. 1993) (recommendation for confinement was allowed as proper rebuttal to defense witness recommendation for group therapy for the accused); United States v. Flynn, 28 M.J. 218 (C.M.A. 1989) (evidence of sex offender treatment program at confinement facility was proper rebuttal to defense evidence that confinement of child molesters was inappropriate). See also United States v. Hamilton, 20 C.M.A. 91, 42 C.M.R. 283 (1970) (prior convictions); United States v. Oakes, 3 M.J. 1053 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977) (performance ratings); United States v. Blau, 5 C.M.A. 232, 17 C.M.R. 232 (1954) (specific acts of misconduct); United States v. Ledezma, 4 M.J. 838 (A.F.C.M.R. 1978) (evidence that accused told supervisor that, if he found who had reported him, he would "get a contract on them").

Unsworn statement rebuttal is limited to factual matters. United States v. Partyka, 30 M.J. 242 (C.M.A. 1990); United States v. Cleveland, 29 M.J. 361 (C.M.A. 1990);

United States v. Goree, 34 M.J. 1027 (N.M.C.M.R. 1992). In an unsworn statement in United States v. Britt, 16 M.J. 971 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983), when the accused portrayed his drug involvement as passive and reluctant, the prosecution was allowed to rebut with extrinsic evidence of Britt's active drug involvement including uncharged misconduct.

In United States v. Oenning, 20 M.J. 935 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985), it was permissible to introduce extrinsic evidence of nonjudicial punishment (not admissible under R.C.M. 1001(b)(2) because of the two-year limitation) to rebut a performance evaluation submitted by the defense.

JAGMAN 0141, unlike the Air Force regulation at issue in Edwards, 39 M.J. at 528, explicitly limits its applicability to R.C.M. 1001 (b)(2). Hence NJP records in the Navy and Marine Corps may be used in rebuttal under R.C.M. 1001(d) regardless of their age. The next logical question is whether or not the Booker rules are similarly limited. In United States v. Irvin, NMCM 84-3149 (N.M.C.M.R. 30 Oct. 84), petition denied, 19 M.J. 258 (C.M.A. 1984), the court held that admission of NJP records not complying with Booker was not abuse of discretion, relying on Strong. (Note that even evidence which has been suppressed due to constitutional violations may be admissible sometimes for impeachment. Mil.R.Evid. 304(b)(1) and 311(b)(1).)

B. Presenting evidence of the accused's character during sentencing is not normally constrained by Mil.R.Evid. 404(a) and 405(a) in the first instance (opinion or reputation testimony introduced by the defense first). R.C.M. 1001(b) explicitly permits the prosecution to introduce the accused's character first, to use documentary evidence in some categories, and to use specific instances in some categories. R.C.M. 1001(c) allows the defense very wide latitude for presenting evidence of the accused's character. Nevertheless, it may be argued that rebutting a defense character witness, who merely offers opinion or reputation testimony, is limited by Mil.R.Evid. 405(a) (contrary specific instances may only be explored intrinsically, and extrinsic rebuttal is limited to contrary opinion or reputation testimony). However, defense evidence of the accused's character is seldom presented so narrowly during sentencing, and recent case law has not highlighted distinctions between rebutting opinion or reputation testimony, rebutting other character evidence (for which Mil.R.Evid. 405(a) has been relaxed), and merely contradicting facts presented by an opponent. Indeed, the tendency has been to permit the prosecution a wide scope in rebutting impressions or inferences which may be drawn fairly from the defense evidence. The Air Force Court of Military Review, however, found plain error to exist where the trial counsel cross-examined a defense character witness with three instances of uncharged misconduct on the part of the accused in "rebuttal" to the witness' opinion of the manner in which the accused performed in a job-related environment. United States v. Kitching, 23 M.J. 601 (A.F.C.M.R. 1986).

C. In addition, where the defense has introduced affidavits, certificates, writings, etc., the formal rules of evidence are similarly relaxed for the prosecution. R.C.M. 1001(d). Indeed, there are several Court of Military Review decisions which suggest that the rules of evidence with regard to live testimony are also relaxed during this stage. See, e.g., United States v. Boughton, 16 M.J. 649 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983) (testimony of commander admissible in rebuttal during sentencing stage even though testimony was based on hearsay); United States v. Stark, 17 M.J. 778 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983) (evidence of on-duty marijuana usage was admissible to rebut mitigation evidence of good military character).

D. The defense in surrebuttal may rebut any rebuttal evidence offered by the prosecution.

E. Rebuttal and surrebuttal is subject to the discretion of the military judge.

1106 ARGUMENT AND INSTRUCTIONS. Following rebuttal and surrebuttal, counsel will be given an opportunity for argument. The law applicable to argument on sentence is fully explained in chapter XV of this text.

In a case with court members, an article 39a session is held to discuss instructions with regard to sentencing matters. See United States v. Wheeler, 17 C.M.A. 274, 38 C.M.R. 72 (1967); Military Judges' Benchbook, DA Pam. 27-9, 1982. When the instructions are decided upon and the court members return to the courtroom, argument on sentence is made by counsel for both sides. Following the presentation of arguments, the instructions are given to the court members. Upon receipt of instructions, the court closes for deliberation.

CHAPTER XII
ADMISSIONS, CONFESSIONS,
AND THE RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION

1201 INTRODUCTION (Key Numbers 534, 1134 - 1139)

A. Requirements. Before a confession or admission of an accused may be admitted into evidence over defense objection, the following legal considerations must be addressed:

1. The substantive rights against self-incrimination as found in the Fifth Amendment and Uniform Code of Military Justice, Article 31;
2. the Article 31(b), UCMJ warning requirements;
3. the warning requirements of Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966), as applied to the military by United States v. Tempia, 16 C.M.A. 629, 37 C.M.R. 249 (1967), and Mil.R.Evid. 305(d);
4. the voluntariness doctrine [see Mil.R.Evid. 304(e)(1)]; and
5. the rights to counsel as found in case law interpretations of the sixth amendment and the Uniform Code of Military Justice.

B. Corroboration (Key Number 1115). A confession or admission will also require corroboration by independent evidence before it may be considered against the accused on the question of guilt or innocence. See Mil.R.Evid. 304(g).

1202 THE RIGHT AGAINST SELF-INCRIMINATION (Key Number 534)

A. The substantive rights

1. The Fifth Amendment to the U.S. Constitution provides:

"nor shall [any person] be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself."

2. Article 31, UCMJ provides:

(a) No person subject to this chapter may compel any person to incriminate himself or to answer any question the answer to which may tend to incriminate him.

(b) No person subject to this chapter may interrogate, or request any statement from an accused or a person suspected of an offense without first informing him of the nature of the accusation and advising him that he does not have to make any statement regarding the offense of which he is accused or suspected and that any statement made by him may be used as evidence against him in a trial by court-martial.

(c) No person subject to this chapter may compel any person to make a statement or produce evidence before any military tribunal if the statement or evidence is not material to the issue and may tend to degrade him.

(d) No statement obtained from any person in violation of this article, or through the use of coercion, unlawful influence, or unlawful inducement may be received in evidence against him in a trial by court-martial.

The statutory right against self-incrimination in the armed services stems from both article 31(a) and article 31(b). Article 31(b) requires that an interrogator warn a suspect or an accused of the nature of the accusation, of his right to remain silent, and of the consequences of speaking before the interrogator requests a statement.

1. Generally. Both the Fifth Amendment and article 31 protect an individual against "self-incrimination." The Supreme Court has declined to consider whether the Fifth Amendment privilege against self-incrimination or the right to counsel during a custodial interrogation applies of its own force to the military. Davis v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 2350 n.2 (1994). However, the Court of Military Appeals has held that United States Supreme Court case law construing the Fifth Amendment and the Court created procedural safeguards apply to military interrogations and effect the admissibility of the evidence obtained. See, e.g., United States v. McLaren, 38 M.J. 112, 115 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1056 (1994). When considering the question of self-incrimination, an attorney must determine both whether the consequence involved approximates a criminal penalty and whether the type of act involved is protected by the right against self-incrimination. See chapter XI for a discussion of self-incrimination issues at the presentencing phase of a court-martial.

a. Consequences

– Fifth Amendment. Under the Constitution, a criminal penalty must be involved. United States v. Ward, 448 U.S. 242 (1980) ("civil penalty," fine against an oil lessee levied upon filing required oil spill report with Coast Guard held not sufficient to trigger right). Thus, deportation, prison discipline proceedings, and other administrative proceedings are generally not consequences that trigger the fifth amendment. Generally speaking, neither is loss of employment or livelihood, although this may not be true for disbarment proceedings. The right against self-incrimination does apply at administrative proceedings where testimony could lead to criminal sanction. E.g., Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U.S. 1 (1964) (right upheld at state statutory hearing into gambling that could conceivably lead to criminal gambling charges). Further, waiver of an existing right against self-incrimination cannot be compelled by a threat of loss of livelihood. Lefkowitz v. Cunningham, 431 U.S. 801 (1977) (New York statute that divested political officials of their offices and forbade holding of office for five years upon refusal to testify or waive immunity before grand jury or other authorized tribunal is violative of fifth amendment). "[T]he touchstone of the fifth amendment is compulsion, and direct economic sanctions and imprisonment are not the only penalties capable of forcing the self-incrimination which the amendment forbids." See generally 8 J. Wigmore, Evidence 2256-57 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). Because of the unique nature of the armed services, most of the civilian problems in this area are rare or unknown.

b. The nature of the act. Both the Fifth Amendment and article 31 protect only a limited range of actions generally related to verbal expression. Putting on clothes or taking them off is, for example, unprotected. Nonetheless, the scope of coverage of the two rights differs significantly and is discussed below.

2. Fifth Amendment (Key Numbers 1106, 1111)

a. The Fifth Amendment prohibits compulsory taking of incriminating verbal statements or soliciting unwarned incriminating statements when the warnings are required.

b. It may also prohibit compulsory production of incriminating papers held by an accused or requesting such evidence of an accused without proper warnings when warnings would be required for a verbal admission.

(1) The traditional rule was that papers were as privileged as oral admissions. See, e.g., United States v. White, 322 U.S. 694 (1944); Boyd v. United States, 116 U.S. 616 (1886). The Supreme Court has sharply curtailed the application of the privilege to documents by holding, in 1976, that it does not extend to personal "business" papers. Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463 (1976) (where probable cause existed, seizure of business papers did not violate fifth amendment); Fisher v. United States, 425 U.S. 391 (1976) (tax records given to lawyer not protected).

(2) The Fifth Amendment privilege adheres to the person and not to the information that may incriminate him; a party is privileged from producing the evidence, but not from its production. Because this concept is difficult to apply, the extent to which the constitutional privilege now extends to personal papers, including diaries and letters, is unclear. It can be asserted that, if documents of this kind can be protected, they must be in the hands of the accused rather than his attorney or accountant. In re Grand Jury Proceedings, 632 F.2d 1033 (3d Cir. 1980) (attorney need not comply with subpoena to produce client's records because of right against self-incrimination). Contra United States v. Couch, 409 U.S. 322 (1973) (no Fifth Amendment violation in the summons of tax records regularly delivered to an independent accountant). The difference involves the application of the attorney-client privilege. If documents are protected in the hands of the client, they may be protected by the attorney-client privilege in the hands of the client's attorney. The attorney-client privilege section of this study guide discusses this subject in further detail.

c. Generally, the Fifth Amendment does not prevent the compulsory taking of handwriting and voice exemplars. See, e.g., United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973) (grand jury may compel creation of voice exemplars); United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973) (grand jury may order witness to furnish handwriting exemplars); Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263 (1967) (handwriting exemplar is an identifying physical characteristic, outside constitutional protection); United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967) (compelling accused to submit to fingerprinting, photography, measurements, to write or speak for identification, to assume a stance, or make a particular gesture does not become testimonial within the scope of the privilege against self-incrimination because required in a pretrial lineup).

d. The Fifth Amendment will not prohibit a suspect's being compelled to put clothes on for identification purposes. United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967); United States v. Holt, 218 U.S. 245 (1910).

e. The Fifth Amendment allows the compulsory taking of blood and urine samples unless the Rochin "shock the conscience" test is violated. Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952); see also Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966). Such evidence is not considered a testimonial act, which is protected. Remember, though, that fourth amendment protections still must be considered when dealing with body fluids.

f. The Fifth Amendment allows some regulatory reporting schemes that have socially accepted purposes that are not principally prosecutorial [e.g., California v. Byers, 402 U.S. 424 (1971) (upholding state statute that required motorists involved in accidents to stop and give name and address)]; but prohibits others that are primarily for prosecution purposes [e.g., United States v. Leary, 395 U.S. 6 (1969) (prohibiting requirement to pay tax on drugs when the report renders the individual criminally liable)].

3. Article 31, UCMJ (Key Numbers 1106, 1107, 1109)

a. Article 31(a) prohibits compulsory self-incrimination.

b. Article 31(b) prohibits questioning of a suspect or an accused without first providing warnings as to the nature of the accusation, the right to remain silent, and the consequences of speaking.

c. Article 31 is potentially broader than the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination, partially due to the wording of article 31(a) ("may compel any person to incriminate himself" vs. "nor shall [any person] be compelled . . . to be a witness against himself") and partially due to the requirement of article 31(b) that warnings be given before a statement can be taken. In the past, the word "statement" has been interpreted expansively by the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces. Some examples are considered below.

(1) In United States v. Lloyd, 10 M.J. 172 (C.M.A. 1981), however, the court indicated that article 31 did not protect handwriting or voice samples. The accused had been asked to produce his military ID card so that his signature could be compared with possible forgeries. The court drew no distinction between presenting an already existing sample and making one on the scene. It seems safe to conclude that, because the court is leaning generally towards restricting the scope of article 31, there is no distinction to be made. See also United States v. Akgun, 19 M.J. 770 (A.C.M.R. 1984), aff'd, 24 M.J. 434 (C.M.A. 1987) (production of a voice exemplar does not violate the privilege against self-incrimination provided by the Fifth Amendment and Article 31, UCMJ); United States v. Chandler, 17 M.J. 678 (A.C.M.R. 1983), petition denied, 18 M.J. 132 (C.M.A. 1984); United States v. Harden, 18 M.J. 81 (C.M.A. 1984) [a handwriting sample is not a "statement" triggering article 31(b) nor is it within the purview of article 31(a)].

(2) Article 31 may prohibit an unwarned vocal utterance made by a suspect in response to official questioning. The key word is "suspect." The article 31 right applies to anyone suspected of an offense, not merely to those guilty of an offense. See, e.g., United States v. Williams, 2 C.M.A. 430, 9 C.M.R. 60 (1953) (examiner's article 31 rights advisement was improper where he advised the accused that he had a right to remain silent only if his answers to questions asked would tend to incriminate or degrade him and that otherwise he was required to answer). See also United States v. Hundley, 24 C.M.A. 538, 45 C.M.R. 94 (1972) (article 31 warning improperly modified where interrogating agent advised suspect that, if he was not involved in the offense but was aware of information, he could be held responsible for withholding information). The question need not be incriminating to be barred. The key is that what is either being sought or what is a reasonable consequence of the interrogation would be incriminating. See Mil.R.Evid. 305(b)(2). See also United States v. Pruitt, 48 C.M.R. 495 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974) (officer conducting article 32 investigation of charges of wrongful sale of marijuana admittedly suspected witness at that investigation of being involved as a purchaser; witness should have been warned of his rights under article 31; therefore, his testimony was not admissible at the subsequent perjury court-martial of the witness). The original intent of the drafters of the UCMJ was to allow nonincriminating administrative questioning. Lederer, Rights Warnings

(3) Article 31 allows display of external body characteristics. See, e.g., United States v. Cain, 5 M.J. 844 (A.C.M.R. 1978) (gold tooth); United States v. Martin, 9 M.J. 731 (N.C.M.R. 1979), aff'd, 13 M.J. 66 (C.M.A. 1982) (tooth impressions).

(4) Article 31 will not prohibit the involuntary furnishing of body fluid samples for use at criminal proceedings. Murray v. Haldeman, 16 M.J. 74 (C.M.A. 1983) (urine); United States v. Armstrong, 9 M.J. 374 (C.M.A. 1980) (blood).

(a) In Armstrong, 9 M.J. at 374, C.M.A. held that the taking of blood samples is not the creation of evidence that is testimonial in nature and, hence, a compulsory taking of such samples is not protected by article 31. The accused in Armstrong was suspected of driving while intoxicated, thus causing an accident in which his passenger was killed. He was taken to an American military hospital where he was advised that he was suspected of driving under the influence of alcohol, that he had the right to remain silent, that he had the right to refuse to take a blood-alcohol test, but that, if he did refuse, his military driving permit would be revoked. He was also told that he could be taken to a German hospital where a blood sample could be taken forcibly and later used against him in a German court. The court stated:

[W]e conclude that, in enacting the compulsory self-incrimination provision of Article 31, Congress did not plan for blood samples to be covered by the privilege. Instead, the clearly manifested intent of Congress . . . was merely to afford to servicepersons a privilege against self-incrimination which paralleled the constitutional privilege. Accordingly, Article 31 did not apply to the taking of blood specimens from Armstrong since body fluids are not within the purview of the Fifth Amendment.

Id. at 382-83 [emphasis added].

(b) In Armstrong, Chief Judge Everett also expressed the view that article 31 was never meant to give any broader protections than the Fifth Amendment provides. He wrote: "Nothing in the wording of Article 31(a) reveals any intent to extend a serviceperson's protection against self-incrimination to include types of evidence that would not fall within the Fifth Amendment's purview." Id. at 380.

Judge Cook, joined by Judge Fletcher in his concurring opinion, would not associate himself with this holding. He did, however, agree that the taking of blood specimens is not protected by article 31.

(c) In Murray v. Haldeman, 16 M.J. 74 (C.M.A. 1983), the court extended the Armstrong rationale to urine samples, with Judge Cook concurring in Chief Judge Everett's opinion.

(d) The drafters of the Military Rules of Evidence intended that the taking of body fluid samples be treated as nontestimonial in nature and thus not protected by article 31. Although article 31 does not apply to the taking of body fluid samples, the search and seizure considerations found in Mil.R.Evid. 312(d) must be applied, although the production of a urine sample through normal elimination is not an "extraction." See Murray v. Haldeman, 16 M.J. at 74.

d. Article 31 does not apply to requests or orders to produce business and government records, for use as evidence or otherwise, when the record or writing is under an individual's control in a representative rather than a personal capacity, as when the writing is in the individual's control as a records custodian.

(1) The accused, in United States v. Haskins, 11 C.M.A. 365, 29 C.M.R. 181 (1960), ran the base Air Force Aid office. He was confined after he was discovered embezzling funds from the base theater where he worked part-time. Of necessity he was replaced in the aid office, and 34 loan ledger cards were found to be missing. He was asked to locate the cards, and did. The cards supplied evidence of embezzlement from the aid office. The Court of Military Appeals found that, at the time the accused was asked for the cards, he was not a suspect and that, in any event, he had a duty to return the government records to his replacement. Thus, article 31 did not apply.

(2) In United States v. Sellers, 12 C.M.A. 262, 30 C.M.R. 262 (1961), the accused, a captain who was the company unit fund officer, was reassigned within the battalion. He failed to turn over his records to his replacement and then went UA, disobeying orders to turn over the books to the executive officer. Knowing that the records were in the accused's car, the battalion commanding officer sent men to get the books. They told the accused's wife to open the car. The Court of Military Appeals held that, since the government has a right to its own records, no Fifth Amendment or article 31 privileges existed.

(3) The means of obtaining the records, of course, must be reasonable. Further, in the absence of case law to the contrary, it may be presumed that article 31 protects private papers. When government property is not held in a representative capacity, the rule relating to lawful custodians does not apply; a demand for production must be preceded by a complete article 31 warning or a search authorization. See United States v. Jones, 31 M.J. 189 (C.M.A. 1990).

e. Article 31 does not affect otherwise lawful searches although, in some cases, the "verbal acts" doctrine may be implicated. See, e.g., United States v. Coakley, 18 C.M.A. 511 40 C.M.R. 223 (1969) (request for identification from deserter who had just been apprehended not a violation of article 31); United States v. Insani, 10 C.M.A. 519, 28 C.M.R. 85 (1959) (suspect's consent to search not incriminating); United States v.

Dutcher, 7 C.M.A. 439, 21 C.M.R. 747 (1956). If the search is accompanied by questions, article 31 and Miranda may apply.

f. Article 31 does apply to "verbal acts."

(1) A verbal act may be loosely defined as a physical act, the result of which is similar to a testimonial utterance. Verbal acts are sometimes referred to as "testimonial acts;" they are considered speech analogs and thus are "statements" within the meaning of article 31(b).

(2) A synthesis of the decisions

(a) Where a lawful search is being conducted and the suspect is merely required to cooperate and therefore lacks any discretion, article 31 does not apply. For example, in a search incident to a lawful apprehension, an order to the suspect to empty his pockets will not require the giving of article 31 warnings.

(b) Where a search is unlawful and the accused, without being warned under article 31, is asked to perform an act that incriminates him, the requirements of article 31 will have been violated. For example, if a search is a result of an illegal apprehension, an order to the suspect to empty his pockets will be illegal due to the mandates of both the fourth amendment and article 31, and the resulting evidence will be suppressed. See, e.g., United States v. Kinane, 1 M.J. 309, 311 n.1 (C.M.A. 1976); United States v. Hay, 3 M.J. 654, 656 (A.C.M.R. 1977) (emptying pockets violated article 31).

(c) Where a search occurs and the suspect is required to perform a discretionary act that will be incriminating, article 31 will apply. In a search of an individual suspected of drug possession, for example, an order to "take the drugs out of your pocket" may be barred by article 31. On the other hand, an act that is not incriminating or renders only preliminary assistance will not violate article 31. For example, after securing authorization to search a suspect's locker, CID agents tell the suspect to point out which locker is assigned to him. Article 31 is not violated if the identity of the locker assigned to the suspect is not the issue in question.

(3) The cases

(a) United States v. Nowling, 9 C.M.A. 100, 25 C.M.R. 362 (1958). The accused was suspected by an MP of being off base without a pass. The MP demanded Nowling's pass; he received from Nowling a pass which had another man's name on it. Charged with possession of an unauthorized pass, Nowling claimed that his article 31(b) rights had been violated by the request for the pass. The Court of Military Appeals held that producing the pass was equivalent to a verbal statement and was covered by article 31(b), because Nowling was a suspect at the time the MP demanded and received the pass.

(b) United States v. Corson, 18 C.M.A. 34, 39 C.M.R. 34 (1968). Believing that the accused possessed marijuana, a chief petty officer found the accused and said, "[Y]ou know what I want, give them to me. . . ." The accused turned the marijuana over to the chief petty officer. Article 31 warnings were held to be necessary because the chief petty officer suspected the accused at the time he asked for the marijuana.

(c) United States v. Kinane, 1 M.J. 309 n.1 (C.M.A. 1976). An order to a person suspected of having stolen blank ID cards to empty his pockets was held to be a fourth amendment and article 31 violation.

(d) United States v. Taylor, 5 C.M.A. 178, 17 C.M.R. 178 (1954). Having been told that the accused possessed marijuana, military police asked him to point out his clothes. He did so, and marijuana was found. The court held that article 31 applies to "any statement." Here, the accused was suspected of an offense and the "chase was too hot." Article 31 warnings were required. The court indicated that asking a person's name will not normally be incriminating. This may not be true, of course, in desertion cases. But cf. United States v. Davenport, 9 M.J. 364 (C.M.A. 1980) (statement as to suspect's identity not covered by article 31).

(e) United States v. Morris, 1 M.J. 352 (C.M.A. 1976). The accused was apprehended after an investigation of a break-in and theft at a hobby store. He and a friend had been seen pushing a car in the vicinity of the crime. When the investigating agent approached them and asked who owned the car, the appellant stated that he was the owner and subsequently orally consented to a search of the car. The court held that this acknowledgement of ownership or dominion and control over property does not constitute a "statement." The results in Morris may have been different if the accused had requested counsel. In United States v. Burns, 33 M.J. 316 (C.M.A. 1991), the accused consented to the search of various areas, but requested counsel and refused to make a statement. Investigator's subsequent questions asking for the identification of certain property were held to be violations of the accused's Fifth Amendment rights. A distinction must be made between granting consent to search and having property identified. Requesting consent to search property in which a suspect has an interest is not prohibited by a prior request for counsel, but asking a suspect to communicate information as to the location of the property is prohibited. Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477, 101 S.Ct. 1880 (1981).

(f) United States v. Whipple, 4 M.J. 773 (C.G.C.M.R. 1978). The act of handing over a bag of cocaine and admitting being its possessor after a lecture to the entire crew urging crew members to "come clean" and join the drug exemption program, was a verbal act requiring article 31 warnings.

(4) Regulatory reporting schemes. The regulatory reporting requirements of the various military departments can be a troublesome area, as article 31 issues seem to abound.

(a) In United States v. Heyward, 22 M.J. 35 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 1011 (1986), the court held that an Air Force regulation that required airmen to report the drug abuse of other airmen was valid, but the privilege against self-incrimination protected against a conviction for dereliction of duty for failure to make the required report where "at the time the duty to report arises, the witness to drug abuse is already an accessory or principal to the illegal activity." Id. at 37. See also United States v. Hoff, 27 M.J. 70 (C.M.A. 1988), where C.M.A. held that an accused's privilege against self-incrimination did not excuse him from reporting his shipmates' larceny of government property in which he was allegedly involved only as an accessory after the fact so that a specification alleging a failure to make appropriate disclosure under Navy Regulations should not have been struck; and United States v. Kelleher, 31 M.J. 701 (N.M.C.M.R. 1990), where a regulation requiring naval personnel to obtain a commander's approval before visiting or contacting a Communist country or establishment did not violate the Fifth Amendment. Compliance was necessarily required before the commission of any illegal act.

(b) In United States v. Medley, 33 M.J. 75 (C.M.A. 1991), the court refused to modify and extend the protection stemming from the Heyward decision. In Medley, the accused unsuccessfully argued that the ongoing drug activities of her social circles were so interrelated that it would have been impossible for her to report one incident without potentially incriminating herself with respect to the other incidents. The court stated:

However, the possibility of touching off a chain reaction that might come back to bite her is not the litmus test for self-incrimination . . . (fact that "the information disclosed may focus attention on the reporting servicemember and may eventually lead to criminal charges being brought against him . . . alone does not invalidate the reporting requirement"). . . . This classic duty not to tolerate malfeasance cuts to the very core of military leadership and responsibility. It is a duty with respect to others that clearly exceeds the duty of ordinary citizens.

(c) Another form of regulatory reporting is reflected in the regulations requiring a servicemember to show possession of a tax- exempt item or the authorized disposition of same. In United States v. Lee, 25 M.J. 457 (C.M.A. 1988), the court held that the regulations requiring servicemembers to produce documentation showing continued possession or lawful disposition of duty-free goods could not be used by military police to have the accused's commander conduct a "show-and-tell" inquiry when the accused is a suspect at the time of the inquiry, and rights warnings were required prior to inquiry and questioning. See also United States v. Smalls, 32 M.J. 398 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 112 S. Ct. 636 (1991); United States v. Gregorio, 32 M.J. 401 (C.M.A. 1991); United States v. Williams, 29 M.J. 112 (C.M.A. 1989); United States v. Jones, 31 M.J. 189 (C.M.A. 1990); United States v. Hilton, 32 M.J. 393 (C.M.A. 1991).

(d) The requirement that "unauthorized" possessors of classified material deliver that material to an authorized official pursuant to the Federal Espionage Act does not violate a servicemembers right against self-incrimination. United States v. Oxfort, 44 M.J. 337 (C.A.A.F. 1996).

(5) Waiver. In United States v. Smith, 4 M.J. 210 (C.M.A. 1978), the accused was given an order to perform physical fitness training. He refused, feigning an ankle injury. He argued on appeal that the order was illegal because, if he had performed the training, he would have incriminated himself. The court stated that, on its face, the order was legal and not intended to obtain evidence. Therefore, by not asserting any right to refuse compliance, he had waived any rights he might have had. The holding in Smith, however, is a limited one. The court implies that preliminary article 31(b) warnings were not required because, at the time of the order to perform physical training, the accused was not suspected of an offense. Thus, the accused's failure to assert his right to remain silent was critical. Had he been a suspect, failure to assert his right to remain silent would not have mattered because the order would have had to be preceded by article 31(b) warnings.

4. Verbal acts and the problem of requiring identification

a. Few procedures are as common to military life as the requirement to identify oneself. Yet, the identification requirement in the case of a criminal suspect is a difficult question not yet resolved. Whether the request is for a verbal statement or for an ID card, the usual MP request could constitute a request for a statement within the usual meaning of article 31(b). Since an individual's identity does not usually involve an element of any offense, it is generally not within the ambit of article 31(b). See United States v. Davenport, 9 M.J. 364 (C.M.A. 1980) (asking for the name of an individual is not interrogation requiring article 31(b) warnings, even when the charge is making a false official statement by giving a false name). See also United States v. Lloyd, 10 M.J. 172 (C.M.A. 1981) (asking for ID card not interrogation); United States v. Anderson, 1 M.J. 246 (C.M.A. 1976); United States v. Ziegler, 20 C.M.A. 523, 43 C.M.R. 363 (1971); United States v. Taylor, 5 C.M.A. 178, 17 C.M.R. 178 (1954); United States v. Jackson, 1 C.M.R. 764, 767 (A.F.C.M.R. 1951).

b. In United States v. Nowling, 9 C.M.A. 100, 25 C.M.R. 362 (1958), the court stated that not every routine or administrative check of a servicemember's pass or identification card must be preceded by article 31(b) warnings. But, where the member is suspected of possessing a false pass or identification card, the request for production of the card must be preceded by appropriate warnings. See also United States v. Meyers, 15 C.M.R. 745 (A.F.B.R. 1984). The holding in Nowling has been criticized. See, e.g., United States v. Earle, 12 M.J. 795, 797 n.1 (N.M.C.M.R. 1981); Whipple, 4 M.J. at 773 (accused's turning of cocaine over to drug exemption officer in response to executive officer's speech was verbal act).

C. Immunity—overcoming the proper exercise of the right against self-incrimination. See chapter XIV.

D. Self-incrimination before trial

1. Interrogations generally. Under the Fifth Amendment and article 31, every servicemember has a right to refuse to incriminate himself. The privilege is implemented through the rights warnings and the voluntariness doctrine.

2. Polygraph examinations. Examination by a "lie detector" is no different from any other form of interrogation. A suspect may not be compelled to participate. Defense counsel should note that polygraph activities often yield incriminating statements from suspects who are convinced they can "beat" the polygraph. See United States v. Martinez, 38 M.J. 82 (C.M.A. 1993) (despite rights acknowledgement and waiver, confession during polygraph examination was involuntary as a result of psychological coercion). But see, United States v. Shaeffer, ___ U.S. ___ (1998), 118 S.Ct. 1261 (1998). Also, see Chapter 7, supra, for further discussion on admissibility of polygraph evidence.

3. Nonjudicial punishment. While the right against self-incrimination applies to all military personnel regardless of forum, the exclusionary rule found in article 31(d) refers to "trial by court-martial." In Dobzynski v. Green, 16 M.J. 84 (C.M.A. 1983), the Court of Military Appeals recognized that nonjudicial punishment does not require use of rules of evidence or exclusionary rules. At least one Federal case suggests that the exclusionary rule does not apply at the article 15 hearing. See Dumas v. United States, 620 F.2d 247 (Ct.Cl. 1980) (Fifth and Sixth Amendment rights applicable at a criminal trial do not apply at nonjudicial punishment hearing); Moore v. United States, 956 F.2d 1172 (Fed. Cir. 1992) (interpreting that Dumas does not stand for proposition that Fifth Amendment protections are inapplicable in an Article 15 proceeding).

E. Self-incrimination at trial

1. Exercising the right against self-incrimination

a. The accused's right against self-incrimination can properly be exercised only if there is some chance for incrimination. Traditionally, incrimination under the Fifth Amendment has meant only a possibility of criminal penalty. See, e.g., Chavez-Raya v. Immigration & Naturalization Service, 519 F.2d 397 (7th Cir. 1975) (the right does not apply when only deportation can take place). But see Gardner v. Broderick, 392 U.S. 273 (1968) (a city charter provision that permitted discharge of police officers who refused to waive immunity from prosecution violated their privilege against self-incrimination).

b. The Article 31 requirement for warnings does not apply at trial. United States v. Bell, 44 M.J. 403 (C.A.A.F. 1996). However, Mil.R.Evid. 301(b)(2) states that if a witness who is "apparently uninformed of the privileges under this rule" appears likely to incriminate himself/herself, the military judge should advise them of their rights. An investigating officer at an Article 32 should take the conservative approach and advise a witness suspected of an offense of their Article 31(b) rights. United States v. Pruitt, 48 C.M.R. 495 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974); United States v. Williams, 9 M.J. 831 (A.C.M.R. 1980). However, failure to warn will not preclude a later prosecution for perjury based upon testimony given at the Article 32. Bell, 44 M.J. at 406.

c. The right against self-incrimination may be raised by the witness. If a witness indicates that the answer to a question may tend to incriminate him, the military judge should carefully inquire into the basis of the assertion. See Mil.R.Evid. 301(c).

d. By taking the stand, an accused normally waives his privilege against self-incrimination with respect to the matters on which he testifies. Mil.R.Evid. 301(e). If a witness incriminates himself, he may be compelled to continue to testify so long as he is not in danger of further incrimination; that is, he may be cross-examined as to those offenses about which he has testified, and may be questioned about other relevant matters. See United States v. Rogers, 340 U.S. 367 (1951) (a witness who testified about her connections with the Communist Party could not properly invoke the privilege against self-incrimination as grounds for refusing to disclose the identity of the person to whom she delivered party records, when the disclosure would not present a reasonable danger of further incrimination); Mil.R.Evid. 301(d). In United States v. Varcoe, 46 C.M.R. 1282 (A.C.M.R. 1973), the court upheld denial of a defense motion to strike the testimony of the witness / drug purchaser because he invoked the right against self-incrimination when he refused to name persons to whom he passed some of the purchased drugs. The court held that the witness' exercise of the privilege concerned collateral matters affecting only his credibility. If an accused chooses to testify and, having done so, leaves the stand, does the right against self-incrimination prevent his recall to the witness stand without express consent? In United States v. Newton, 1 M.J. 654 (N.C.M.R. 1975), the court held that an accused could not be recalled without his express consent. In United States v. Ray, 15 M.J. 808 (N.M.C.M.R.), petition denied, 16 M.J. 177 (C.M.A. 1983), however, another panel of the court indicated that the Newton decision was overly broad and that the Fifth Amendment does not prevent the recall of the accused without his consent. The court reasoned that an accused's election to testify carries the possibility of thorough cross-examination which, however, should be circumscribed by the military judge's discretionary authority to control trial proceedings. Thus, the accused should not be subjected to overly repetitive questioning, harassment, or other abuses.

e. The right against self-incrimination is ultimately waived as to any particular offense by a guilty plea to that offense. Failure by the defense counsel to so advise an accused might invalidate a plea or result in a finding of inadequacy of counsel. See generally, United States v. Dunsenberry, 23 C.M.A. 287, 49 C.M.R. 536 (1975).

2. Effects of the refusal of a witness to testify

a. If a witness exercises the right against self-incrimination, the witness is held to be "unavailable" for purposes of former testimony and certain hearsay exceptions. See United States v. Matthews, 16 M.J. 354 (C.M.A. 1983) (an article 32 case).

b. Striking direct testimony. If a witness has testified on direct examination, but refuses to testify on cross-examination, relying on the right against self-incrimination, the trial judge may have to strike the direct testimony. See, e.g., United States v. Moore, 36 M.J. 329 (C.M.A. 1993) (harmless error to strike testimony of defense witness who invoked Fifth Amendment privilege while testifying on direct); United States v. Hill, 18 M.J. 459 (C.M.A. 1984) (military judge properly struck testimony of defense witness who claimed Fifth Amendment privilege); United States v. Rivas, 3 M.J. 282 (C.M.A. 1977) (failure of defense counsel to move that witness' testimony be stricken, after witness invoked privilege against self-incrimination, constituted ineffective assistance of counsel); United States v. Colon-Atienza, 26 C.M.A. 674, 47 C.M.R. 336 (1973) (failure of military judge to strike direct examination of a witness who invoked the privilege against self-incrimination on cross-examination concerning a relevant matter was error). If the matters to which the witness refused to testify are merely "collateral," however, the direct examination need not be stricken. United States v. Varcoe, supra; United States v. Anderson, 4 M.J. 664 (A.C.M.R. 1977) (witness' use of heroin was an issue collateral to the accused's defense of entrapment); United States v. White, 4 M.J. 628 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977) (no ineffective assistance of counsel where defense counsel failed to move to strike testimony related only to general credibility matters), aff'd, 6 M.J. 12 (C.M.A. 1978). See United States v. Richardson, 15 M.J. 41 (C.M.A. 1983) (questions asked of defense witness about unrelated drug dealings in order to attack credibility relating to a collateral matter). Accord United States v. Williams, 16 M.J. 333 (C.M.A. 1983); United States v. Hunter, 17 M.J. 738 (A.C.M.R. 1983); United States v. Lawless, 18 M.J. 255 (C.M.A. 1984). See also Mil.R.Evid. 301(f)(2).

3. Does the right against self-incrimination exist at the sentencing stage? Yes. A brief historical summary of the cases follows. In United States v. Mathews, 6 M.J. 357 (C.M.A. 1979), the court addressed the question of whether a military judge could question the accused concerning the admissibility, under United States v. Booker, 5 M.J. 238 (C.M.A. 1987), of an article 15 punishment. The court said:

When there has been a plea of guilty, the segment of a trial designated as the extenuation and mitigation hearing obviously is subsequent to entry of the plea. Extenuation and mitigation hearings are not part of the procedure that give rise to a finding of guilty. A sentence does not go to prove that a crime has been committed but results from conviction of a crime. Self-incrimination therefore, stops as to the crime charged at the time the plea of guilty is accepted. We specifically find that Article 31, 10 U.S.C. § 831 is not applicable to extenuation and mitigation hearings except where evidence could be produced that would give rise to a charge being laid to a different crime.

6 M.J. at 358. The Mathews rationale was reaffirmed in United States v. Spivey, 10 M.J. 7

(C.M.A. 1980). A short while later, however, the Supreme Court apparently rejected that rationale in Estelle v. Smith, 451 U.S. 454 (1981) (there is no basis to distinguish between the merits and penalty phases of a capital murder trial so far as protection of the Fifth Amendment privilege is concerned). In United States v. Sauer, 11 M.J. 872 (N.M.C.M.R. 1981), the Navy-Marine Corps Court of Military Review held that the Mathews / Spivey holding had been overtaken by Estelle, and forbade military judges from questioning an accused concerning prior NJP's sought to be admitted in aggravation. In United States v. Sauer, 15 M.J. 113 (C.M.A. 1983), the Court of Military Appeals affirmed the Navy-Marine Corps Court's decision by holding that the Fifth Amendment affirmatively forbids a situation wherein an accused is forced to provide information that will increase his sentence. See also United States v. Cowles, 16 M.J. 467 (C.M.A. 1983) (waiver of privilege against self-incrimination by guilty plea does not extend to sentencing phase; extension of Sauer, but rendered unimportant by requirement to place accused under oath before providency inquiry).

F. Self-incrimination after trial

– The general need for finality. An accused's conviction is not final until all appeals have been completed and the action executed. The right of an accused to assert the privilege against self-incrimination as to the offenses of which he has been convicted is retained until the conclusion of the final direct appeal. Article 69 appeals and collateral attacks normally are not treated as appeals for this purpose. See, e.g., Mills v. United States, 281 F.2d. 736 (4th Cir. 1960). A discussion of this principle as it relates to military prosecutions can be found in Lederer, Reappraising the Legality of Post-Trial Interviews, The Army Lawyer 12 (July 1977).

G. Article 31(c)—degrading statements

1. Article 31(c) prohibits coercing a person to make a statement or produce evidence "before any military tribunal if the statement or evidence is not material to the issue and may tend to degrade" that person. Article 31(c) is a survival of the common law privilege against self-infamy, tempered by the need for probative evidence.

2. In current practice, article 31(c) appears to be rarely employed. Reviewing the legislative history, there is reason to believe that issues of credibility were viewed as "non-material." Thus, article 31(c) might be available but, at most, to prevent unnecessarily embarrassing impeachment of a witness. See Mil.R.Evid. 303. There appear to be no cases construing article 31(c).

3. Previously, one possible application of article 31(c), as restated in Mil.R.Evid 303 was in the area of sex offenses. Congress found the information safeguarded by the "rape shield law" (Mil.R.Evid. 412) to be degrading and therefore it arguably would fall within the gambit of article 31(c). Counsel might attempt to rely on article 31(c) to protect sex offense victims at article 32 investigation hearings. This point is now moot as the President has now mandated that the protections of Mil.R.Evid. 412 apply at article 32 proceedings. See MCM, R.C.M. 405(i) (C6, 23 Dec. 1993).

1203 THE WARNING REQUIREMENT (Key Number 1109)

A. Historical development and policy

1. The Fifth Amendment. The warning requirements of the Fifth and Sixth Amendments promulgated by Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436 (1966) are the result of the Supreme Court's dissatisfaction with police interrogation techniques. The warnings are designed to interrupt the presumed inherent coerciveness of police stationhouse interrogations and to supply a useful defensive weapon to the suspect—the right to counsel.

2. The article 31(b) warnings. The article 31(b) warnings were first enacted as an amendment to Article of War 24 in 1948. Although one reason for their enactment was to attempt to redress the imbalance in interrogations caused by rank differential, the primary reason for their original inclusion in the amendments to the Articles of War was the mistaken belief of their proponent that similar warnings were required in most states. See Lederer, Rights Warnings in the Armed Services, 72 Mil. L. Rev. 1 (1976).

3. Article 31(b) warnings predate Miranda warnings by more than 15 years. The article 31(b) warnings, unlike Miranda, do not include advice concerning the right to counsel. Article 31(b) warnings also have a different trigger than Miranda warnings: the statutory warnings are required for any interrogation or request for a statement from an accused or suspect, while the Miranda warnings come into play when the interrogation is custodial; that is, when the accused is in custody or deprived of freedom of action in any significant way.

B. Content of the warning

1. Fifth Amendment. If the Miranda warning requirement applies, the accused must be told that he has a right to remain silent; that anything he says may be used against him in court; that he has a right to a lawyer during the interrogation and that he may obtain a civilian lawyer, at his own expense, or, if the suspect cannot afford a lawyer, a lawyer will be appointed at no expense to him.

2. Article 31(b)

a. General. No person subject to the UCMJ may interrogate, or request any statement from, an accused or a person suspected of an offense without first informing that individual of the nature of the accusation and advising him that he does not have to make any statement regarding the offense of which he is accused or suspected and that any statement made by him may be used as evidence against him in a trial by court-martial. Art. 31(b), UCMJ.

b. The nature of the offense. The purpose of requiring that an accused or suspect be informed of the nature of the offense is to orient him about the accusation so he can intelligently decide whether to answer questions concerning it. United States v. Johnson, 5 C.M.A. 795, 19 C.M.R. 91 (1955). It is not necessary to delineate the details of the accused's alleged misconduct with technical nicety in order to adequately inform him of the nature of the charge being investigated. It suffices if the accused is made aware of the general nature of the allegations involved.

(1) United States v. Nitschke, 12 C.M.A. 489, 31 C.M.R. 75 (1961). The accused was involved in an automobile accident in Germany, killing a pedestrian. Because the accused had been drinking, he was asked by a CID agent to give a blood sample—which was supplied. The agent did not tell the accused that he had killed someone because a local doctor advised against it, in view of the accused's mental state. The accused respectfully stated that he must have killed someone. The court found that the agent did not lie, but simply omitted the fatality, and that, in view of all the circumstances, the accused sufficiently knew the nature of the offense. Particularity is unnecessary. All the accused needs to know is the general nature of the offense.

(2) United States v. Willeford, 5 M.J. 634 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 6 M.J. 87 (C.M.A. 1978). Investigators suspected the accused of two housebreakings at a women's barracks, both on the same night and in the same building—but in different rooms. One incident involved a rape; the other, an indecent exposure with a different victim. An investigator properly advised Willeford about the suspected rape, but failed to mention the indecent exposure incident. Willeford was then asked about both events. The court held that, as to the indecent exposure, the warning was deficient.

(3) United States v. Quintana, 5 M.J. 484 (C.M.A. 1978). The accused was advised that he was suspected of larceny of ship's store funds, but not that he was also suspected of wrongful appropriation of the same funds during an earlier period. The court held that the warning adequately informed the accused that "misuse" of the fund was the object of the investigation.

(4) In United States v. Erie, 29 M.J. 1008 (C.M.A. 1990), the accused was given rights warnings for the use of hashish and cocaine. The Army court said this was sufficient to cover later charges for distribution of both drugs. The court reasoned that the investigators were focused on these controlled substances, and the rights warnings had oriented the accused to that fact. The court further stated that the legal sufficiency as to the nature of the accusation will be analyzed by a totality of the circumstances approach.

c. The right to remain silent

(1) A statement obtained from an accused or suspect in violation of the right to remain silent is inadmissible, even if the accused or suspect knew he had the right despite the lack of warning. Proof of warnings and voluntariness are two distinct requirements placed upon the prosecution before it may introduce an incriminating statement. United States v. Dohle, 1 M.J. 223 (C.M.A 1975).

(2) The right to remain silent is absolute. A warning that the accused has the right to remain silent only if his answers would tend to incriminate him, and that otherwise he is required to answer, is a violation of article 31(b). United States v. Williams, 2 C.M.A. 430, 9 C.M.R. 60 (1953); United States v. Murray, 11 C.M.R. 495 (A.B.R. 1953). See also United States v. Hundley, 24 C.M.A. 538, 45 C.M.R. 94 (1972). In Hundley, the accused was ultimately charged with riot, assault, and involuntary manslaughter. After having been properly warned by an investigator, the accused was told that, if he was not involved and refused to give a statement, he could be held responsible for interfering with the investigation. The court held that the agent's statement modified the original warnings and rendered them improper. A second statement (taken three days after the first) was found, in the absence of convincing evidence to the contrary, tainted by the first. At the second session, the statement taken during the first was left on the table before the accused. In United States v. Peebles, 21 C.M.A. 466, 45 C.M.R. 240 (1972), the accused was suspected of larceny and murder. CID agents told him that, if he were not involved and withheld knowledge, he could be an accessory after the fact and could receive 300 years in jail. Since article 31 rights depend only on whether the individual is a suspect, and not on whether he is guilty, the resulting confession was held involuntary.

d. Consequences of speaking. The individual must be told that any statement made by him may be used as evidence against him. Failure to add the words "in a trial by court-martial" will not necessarily render the warnings ineffective. United States v. O'Brien, 3 C.M.A. 325, 12 C.M.R. 81 (1953). The warning, however, may be negated by further comments of the interrogator. A warning that leads an accused or suspect to believe that a statement would be used only for a limited purpose other than a trial by court-martial may violate article 31. However, an accused need not be told that his statement will be used against him. United States v. Goldman, 18 C.M.A. 389, 40 C.M.R. 101 (1970). See also United States v. Erie, supra.

(1) In United States v. Green, 15 C.M.A. 300, 35 C.M.R. 272 (1965), CID agents warned the two defendants properly, then granted a request that they be permitted to speak together privately. They were allowed to use a "bugged" room. The court held that, in effect, the agents negated the warnings by their conduct in promising confidentiality.

(2) In United States v. Hanna, 2 M.J. 69 (C.M.A. 1976), military investigators unsuccessfully questioned the accused for some time. Finally, one of the investigators, who was playing the "good guy" role, put his chair close to the accused and said "between you and me, did you do it?" The accused admitted his involvement in several arsons. The court held that this promise of confidentiality negated the warnings. Two questions must be asked in such cases: Can the statement be construed as a pledge?; and, what impact did the investigator's statement have on the accused?

(3) See also United States v. Churnovic, 22 M.J. 401 (C.M.A. 1986) (promise of immunity: "XO confirmed, the guy would not get in trouble") from prosecution in return for a confession renders the statement involuntary, as it operates to deprive suspect or accused of the mental freedom either to speak or to remain silent). In Cunningham v. Gilevich, 36 M.J. 94 (C.M.A. 1992), the co-accuseds' commanding officer told them to speak freely before an administrative board investigating a safety mishap, and that they had nothing to worry about. The court found the accuseds' testimony before the board was the result of improper influence which was not neutralized by the administration of article 31(b) warnings.

e. Rights to counsel (See § 1204, infra) (Key Number 1111)

C. Who must warn?

1. Fifth Amendment. Government agents (police, FBI, Secret Service, etc.) must give warnings when the suspect is in custody.

2. Article 31

a. Persons not subject to the UCMJ

(1) Generally, any military member who interrogates a military suspect about an offense under the UCMJ must give article 31(b) warnings. Civilian police or investigators also must give article 31(b) warnings if they are acting in furtherance of a military investigation or the civilian investigation has merged into the military one. See Mil.R.Evid. 305(h). As a general rule, however, persons not subject to the UCMJ have no duty to warn under article 31(b). In United States v. Lonetree, 35 M.J. 396 (C.M.A. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1813 (1993), civilian intelligence agents were not required to read article 31 rights to the accused who was suspected of espionage. The court reasoned that the agents were not authorized to conduct a criminal investigation, their investigation had not merged with the NCIS investigation, and they had not become an instrument of the military.

(2) In United States v. Kellam, 2 M.J. 338 (A.F.C.M.R. 1976), the accused, suspected of stealing stereo equipment, was advised of his rights by Air Force investigators and requested counsel. He was allowed to leave. A local deputy sheriff accompanied military investigators to the residence of the accused's girlfriend, where they hoped to obtain information concerning the stolen property. While the military investigators were inside talking to the accused's acquaintances, the civilian deputy obtained an inculpatory statement from the accused. The court held that the deputy's role in the critical stage of the investigation was substantial and was solely designed to further the military investigation. He was, therefore, bound by the accused's earlier request for counsel, and the government was prohibited from using the results of the deputy's improper interrogation.

(3) In United States v. Jones, 6 M.J. 226 (C.M.A. 1979), German authorities were not required to give warnings when their only connection with military authorities consisted of the latter making the accused available for interrogation. See, e.g., United States v. Ravine, 11 M. J. 325 (C.M.A. 1981). United States v. Coleman, 25 M.J. 679 (A.C.M.R. 1987), aff'd, 26 M.J. 451 (C.M.A. 1988), cert. denied, 109 S.Ct. 850 (1989).

(4) In United States v. Quillen, 27 M.J. 312 (C.M.A. 1988), the Court of Military Appeals opined that a civilian detective was an agent of the military and should have given rights warnings to a soldier suspected of shoplifting. The court stated "The detective was an 'instrument of the military' whose conduct in questioning the suspect was at the behest of military authorities and in furtherance of their duty to investigate crime."

(5) Mil.R.Evid. 305(h)(2) provides that, in interrogations conducted abroad by agents of a foreign government, the mere presence of American military personnel will not trigger article 31(b). Similarly, neither the fact that American personnel acted as interpreters nor that they took steps to mitigate harm to the accused will alter the character of the interrogation. In United States v. French, 38 M.J. 420, 427 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1056 (1994), the court held that an army first sergeant who led British police to the accused pursuant to a treaty agreement was not part of the British investigation, but was solely present at the interrogation as a "support person" for the accused. The court concluded that the mere presence of the first sergeant at the foreign interrogation did not trigger the need for article 31(b) warnings.

b. Unofficial interrogations

(1) Official questions. The phrasing of article 31(b) suggests that any member of the armed services attempting to question a suspect or accused must first give article 31(b) warnings. Case law, however, has sanctioned a number of exceptions to this literal interpretation of the statute.

(2) The Duga rule. In United States v. Duga, 10 M.J. 206 (C.M.A. 1981), with Chief Judge Everett writing the opinion, the Court of Military Appeals set out the current standard for determining who is required to give article 31(b) warnings. Without disregarding the position of authority test, the court reviewed the background of article 31 and stated:

Therefore, in light of Article 31(b)'s purpose and its legislative history, the Article applies only to situations in which, because of military rank, duty, or other similar relationship, there might be subtle pressure on a suspect to respond to an inquiry.

Accordingly, in each case it is necessary to determine whether (1) a questioner subject to the Code was acting in an official capacity in his inquiry or only had a personal motivation; and (2) whether the person questioned perceived that the inquiry involved more than a casual conversation. Unless both prerequisites are met, Article 31(b) does not apply.

Id. at 210 [citations and footnote omitted].

In Duga, the two prerequisites had not been met. The questioner, a military policeman friend of the accused, had simply been asked to keep his eyes and ears open; hence, he was not acting in an official capacity. The conversation was purely casual, therefore the second prerequisite was not met. The Duga rationale was applied in United States v. Barrett, 11 M.J. 628 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981), where it was held that, even conceding the officiality of inquiries made by a higher ranking fellow security guard, the accused in no way perceived the conversation to be official interrogation or anything other than a casual inquiry. See also United States v. Price, 44 M.J. 430 (C.A.A.F. 1996) (although military subordinate providing information to law enforcement agency, his questioning of accused was not perceived as being official and did not create a coercive atmosphere). United States v. McDonald, 14 M.J. 684 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982) (casual conversation with security policeman friend did not require article 31 warnings); United States v. Martin, 21 M.J. 730 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) (Duga applied to admit statements to victim, acting under direction of Naval Investigative Service agents, confirming the accused's acts of indecent assault).

c. Defining officiality. Normally, a superior in the immediate chain of command of the suspect subordinate will be presumed to be acting in a command disciplinary function and, thus, be "official" for purposes of necessitating article 31(b) warnings. In United States v. Loukas, 29 M.J. 385 (C.M.A. 1990), however, the Court of Military Appeals wrestled with the issue of whether the operational nature of questioning by a superior requires warnings. Loukas was an aircraft crewman who was having hallucinations in-flight when he was asked by his crew chief whether he had taken any drugs. Loukas replied he had taken cocaine the night before. No article 31(b) warnings were given. The court held that the operational nature of the question does not equate to official capacity as required for warnings; rather, the interrogation need in some way be connected with a criminal justice or disciplinary purpose. It is unclear at this point whether Loukas is fact-specific or whether the criminal justice / disciplinary purpose is now a prerequisite to a finding of official capacity or the existence of an interrogation, thus requiring article 31(b) warnings. United States v. Good, 32 M.J. 105 (C.M.A. 1991) is good reading as the court tries to provide a legal analysis to be utilized in determining whether rights warnings are required. The court also builds on the Loukas officiality test by stating, "When the questioning is done by a military supervisor in the suspects' chain of command, the government must rebut a strong presumption that the questioning was done for disciplinary purposes." However, in United States v. Pittman, 36 M.J. 404 (C.M.A. 1993), the accused was suspected of child abuse and his section leader was tasked with escorting him anytime he needed to leave post. While escorting the accused to his off-base residence, the section leader asked the accused "what was going on." The court found the accused's incriminating response to be admissible finding that the section leader was not interrogating, but was simply motivated by his own curiosity.

d. Persons subject to the UCMJ—specific examples

(1) "Personal" questioning by those not in an official capacity. Rights warnings are not required when the questioning is done by an individual not in a position of authority who is acting as a private citizen. The leading case in the private capacity area is United States v. Trojanowski, 5 C.M.A. 305, 17 C.M.R. 305 (1954). In Trojanowski, the accused admitted a barracks theft after the victim hit him and threatened to continue to beat him if he failed to return the missing wallet and money. The court held that the victim, another private, was acting in a personal capacity and did not have to give warnings prior to his request for the admission. However, the beating was in violation of article 31(a), which prohibits obtaining a statement through the use of coercion; thus, the resulting evidence was held inadmissible at trial. A number of cases have discussed this joint article 31(a) / article 31(b) issue. See, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 5 C.M.A. 305, 17 C.M.R. 305 (1954). Cf. United States v. Carter, 15 C.M.A. 495, 35 C.M.R. 467 (1965) (requirement to surrender stolen property viewed as a search and seizure issue rather than a testimonial act problem). The coercion is usually the critical issue and renders the resulting statement involuntary and inadmissible.

(2) Defense counsel. In United States v. Milburn, 8 M.J. 110 (C.M.A. 1979), the court concluded that, in some cases, defense counsel may have an ethical obligation to warn a witness of his article 31(b) rights. The accused in Milburn, who at the time had no lawyer, was interviewed by the defense counsel for one Ellis. Milburn made several incriminating admissions during the interview. Later, Milburn was called to testify as a witness for Ellis. Still unrepresented by counsel, Milburn gave testimony that included more incriminating admissions. Neither Ellis' defense counsel nor the military judge gave any warnings to Milburn. Milburn's testimony was later used against him at his own trial. In reversing the conviction, the court emphasized that, as an officer of the court, Ellis' defense counsel had an ethical duty to warn Milburn of his article 31(b) rights. The court also noted that Milburn was unsure of his potential criminal liability and that, at one point, he attempted to obtain Ellis' lawyer for himself. Milburn could present military defense counsel with an ethical dilemma: whether to warn the witness and risk losing exculpatory evidence; or omit the warnings and possibly be accused of unethical conduct. To some extent, the problem in Milburn has been solved. Mil.R.Evid. 301(b)(2) provides that the military judge may give article 31(b) warnings to apparently uninformed witnesses. Also, under R.C.M. 704(e), the defense has a mechanism for obtaining immunity for defense witnesses. Thus, a defense counsel who gives article 31(b) warnings will not invariably "lose" the testimony that might have been available had the witness not been warned.

(3) Trial counsel. In United States v. Carter, 4 M.J. 758 (A.C.M.R. 1977), petition denied, 5 M.J. 155 (C.M.A. 1978), the trial counsel was not required to give warnings during an interview with a government witness who attempted to bribe him. The court reasoned that the interview was not an "interrogation."

(4) Physicians. The common law doctor-patient privilege is inapplicable to the military. Mil.R.Evid. 501(d). Furthermore, the law of the forum determines the application of the privilege. Thus, if a servicemember should consult a doctor in a jurisdiction with a doctor-patient privilege, such a privilege would be inapplicable if the doctor were called as a witness before a court-martial. See analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 501. The traditional test as to whether article 31 warnings were necessary has been whether the physician was acting purely in a medical capacity or was acting in a disciplinary role. The Court of Military Appeals has held that a physician who questions an individual solely to obtain information upon which to predicate a diagnosis, so that he can prescribe appropriate medical treatment or care for the individual, is not performing an investigative or disciplinary function, nor is he engaged in perfecting a criminal case against the individual. As such, the doctor's questions are not within the reach of article 31, and the doctor may be called to testify not only as to his medical opinion, but also as to the specific answers given by the accused or suspect to his questions.

— In United States v. Fisher, 24 C.M.A. 557, 44 C.M.R. 277 (1972), the accused was brought into the emergency room with respiratory depression. The court held that it was proper for the doctor to question him without warning the accused of his rights under article 31. The accused was subsequently charged with use of cocaine.

— In United States v. Bowerman, 39 M.J. 219 (C.M.A. 1994), the court held that the military pediatrician who questioned the accused was not conducting an interrogation, but rather was doing so to provide treatment to the accused's injured infant son. The accused's unwarned statements to the doctor were admissible despite the pediatrician's belief while questioning the accused that child abuse was a "distinct possibility." See also, United States v. Schoolfield, 36 M.J. 545 (A.C.M.R. 1992), aff'd, 40 M.J. 132 (C.M.A. 1994) (nurse who questioned HIV positive accused concerning sexual contacts did so for community health concerns, not disciplinary purposes).

— In United States v. Dudley, 42 M.J. 528 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. 1995), the court held that a psychiatrist was not required to provide Article 31 warnings even when asking the accused about the offenses he allegedly committed where the questions were motivated by the fear that the accused might be suicidal.

(5) Article 32 investigating officer. If rights warnings are not given, a witness may still be prosecuted for perjury. United States v. Bell, 44 M.J. 403 (1996). The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has also indicated that "[t]he Article 31 requirement for warnings does not apply at trial." Id.

e. Social workers. A social worker engaged in patient treatment is not required to give article 31 warnings. Even if a social worker had a duty to report suspected cases of child abuse to criminal investigators, this does not necessarily make the social worker an arm of the law enforcement team. See United States v. Raymond, 38 M.J. 136 (C.M.A. 1993) (psychiatric social worker not required to give article 31 warnings to accused who voluntarily sought counseling at military hospital); United States v. Moreno, 36 M.J. 107 (C.M.A. 1992) (social worker not required to give warnings as her investigation was separate and unrelated to military criminal investigation).

f. Psychiatrists

(1) Prior to the U.S. Supreme Court's recent decision in Jaffee v. Redmond, 116 S.Ct. 812 (1996) the rules applicable to physicians, stated above, also applied to psychiatrists. The Court in Jaffee held that F.R.E. 501 does include a psychotherapist - patient privilege by interpreting "the principles of common law. . . in the light of reason and experience." This privilege appears to extend not only to psychiatrists, but to psychologists and licensed social workers in the course of psychotherapy. The Army Court of Criminal Appeals dealt with the Jaffee decision in United States v. Demmings, 46 M.J. 877 (Army Ct.Crim.App. 1997). There, the court decided that because the Military Rules of Evidence did not preclude a psychotherapist-patient privilege, the Jaffee decision could apply to the military. If the privilege is applied, psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers would not be required to issue Article 31 warnings to their patients.

(2) Whether or not Jaffee creates a general privilege of confidentiality for servicemembers, a partial privilege already exists pursuant to Mil.R. Evid 302 which provides that an accused, who has been examined to determine his mental status under R.C.M. 706, has a privilege to prevent his statements and any derivative evidence from being used against him at trial. The privilege may be claimed regardless of whether rights warnings were given. The accused may, of course, waive the privilege by first introducing such statements or derivative evidence. See Yustas, Mental Evaluations of an Accused Under the Military Rules of Evidence—An Excellent Balance, The Army Lawyer 24 (May 1980); United States v. Littlehales, 19 M.J. 512 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984), aff'd, 22 M.J. 17 (C.M.A. 1986) (derivative evidence does not include interviews by trial counsel with examining psychiatrist where no attempt is made to gain access to statements given by accused to psychiatrist). Note, however, that a member of the R.C.M. 706 board may still testify for the prosecution as to the board's conclusions regarding the mental state of the accused and the reasons therefore if expert testimony offered by the defense regarding the mental condition of the accused has first been received in evidence. Mil.R. Evid. 302(b)(2). See United States v. Bledsoe, 26 M.J. 97 (C.M.A. 1988) (trial counsel was allowed to introduce evidence relating to accused's mental state in its case-in-chief where defense counsel alerted members to this issue during voir dire and the accused was neither surprised nor prejudiced).

– Confidentiality and the AIDS virus. See chapter VI.

g. Undercover agents. Generally, undercover agents are not required to warn their "target" of his rights. United States v. Hoffa, 385 U.S. 293 (1966). Undercover personnel, civilian or military, are usually either law enforcement agents themselves or working for law enforcement agencies. Few people would expect an undercover agent making a drug buy to first interrupt the seller and inform him of his rights. Civilian cases escape the military statute, and thus the problem, because Miranda v. Arizona applies only to custodial interrogation, while article 31 applies to all interrogations of a suspect or an accused by a military member. While the Miranda rationale, that police stationhouse interrogation is inherently coercive, is inapplicable to undercover agent situations, basic questions of statutory interpretation and policy apply. In Illinois v. Perkins, 110 S.Ct. 2394 (1990), an undercover government agent was placed in the cell of an accused, who was incarcerated on charges unrelated to the undercover agent's investigation. The respondent made statements that implicated him in the crime the agent sought to solve. The court opined that an undercover law enforcement officer posing as a fellow inmate is not required to give Miranda warnings before asking questions that may elicit an incriminating response. A key point in this case was that the accused had not been charged, so the analysis was from a Fifth Amendment vice sixth amendment perspective. Furthermore, under the sixth amendment, counsel warnings are required before an indicted accused who has retained an attorney can be interrogated about the offense for which he was indicted. Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964) (improper, after indictment of defendant, to bug co-defendant's car without knowledge of defendant to obtain incriminating statements). Massiah applies to bugging situations and undercover interrogations.

(1) As previously noted, the court, in United States v. Duga, 10 M.J. 206 (C.M.A. 1981), adopted a two-part test for determining whether article 31 warnings must be given. Unless the questioner is acting in an official capacity and the person questioned perceives that something more than a casual conversation is involved, the article 31 warning requirement will not be triggered. As a practical matter, Duga means that most confidential informants will not be required to give article 31 warnings before questioning their target. Duga brought military practice in this area in line with the prevailing Federal rule. See discussion of Duga, supra. See also United States v. Hoffa, supra.

(2) Care must be taken to distinguish between the use of undercover agents or informers to obtain inculpatory statements before and after the accused has been arraigned and has retained a lawyer. The Supreme Court has put constitutional limitations on the latter. Massiah v. United States, supra. This is especially true where the accused is confined awaiting trial. Governmental activities of this nature may result in a denial of the effective assistance of counsel. In United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980), government agents told an informant, an inmate confined in the same cell block as the accused, to be alert to any statements made by him but not to initiate any conversations. The informant, who was paid for his services, reported certain incriminating statements made by the accused. The court ruled that the statements were inadmissible because the accused was in custody when the statements were made, and the government deliberately created a situation likely to induce an incriminating statement. Such actions by the government interfered with the accused's sixth amendment right to the assistance of counsel. In support of the Massiah rationale are United States v. Lowry, 2 M.J. 55 (C.M.A. 1976) and United States v. McOmber, 1 M.J. 380 (C.M.A. 1976). Cf. Weatherford v. Bursey, 429 U.S. 545 (1977) (sixth amendment does not establish a per se rule forbidding undercover agent from meeting with defendant's counsel).

g. Chaplains. Chaplains are generally not required to warn persons whom they are counseling. In United States v. Richards, 17 M.J. 1016 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984), the accused claimed that the chaplain to whom he admitted crimes should have warned him of his article 31 rights once she suspected him of an offense. The court held that there was no requirement for the chaplain to warn because the communications were privileged (the accused waived the privilege by asking that the chaplain report the crimes to Navy authorities).

D. Who must be warned?

1. Fifth Amendment—suspects in custody. Miranda and its military analogue, United States v. Tempia, 16 C.M.A. 629, 37 C.M.R. 249 (1967), indicate that both warnings of the right against self-incrimination and rights to counsel attach when an individual is involved in a "custodial interrogation." The difficulty has been in determining what constitutes such an interrogation.

2. Article 31(b) applies to "an accused or a person suspected of an offense."

a. Suspects or accused persons

(1) In United States v. Good, supra, the court explains that a servicemember's status as a suspect is answered by considering all the facts and circumstances at the time of the interview to determine whether the military questioner believed or reasonably should have believed that the servicemember questioned committed an offense. The court went on to recognize the subjective standard that courts historically utilized in determining whether one was a suspect, but opined the better approach is that of "a reasonable man" objective analysis utilized in Berkmer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420, 104 S.Ct. 3138 (1984). See also Pennsylvania v. Burder, 488 U.S. 9, 109 S.Ct. 205 (1988).

(2) In United States v. Tibbetts, 1 M.J. 1024 (N.C.M.R. 1976), an NCIS special agent was called to a crime scene to investigate an aggravated assault. After receiving a description of the assailant and the vehicle used by him, the investigator located the accused. The accused matched the description of the assailant given by the victim, and was interrogated, but the agent did not give rights warnings until after the accused had made several incriminating remarks. The investigator testified that he failed to give warnings because he did not initially consider the accused a suspect. The court, however, held that the agent's subjective belief was not dispositive. Rather, on the facts of the case, a reasonable investigator should have considered the accused a suspect who was entitled to article 31 warnings. Accordingly, the accused's initial statements were suppressed, along with a subsequent statement, which was held to be "fruit of the poisonous tree." See also United States v. Morris, 13 M.J. 297 (C.M.A. 1982).

3. In United States v. Brown, 40 M.J. 152 (C.M.A. 1994), an accused's command had an "official" counseling session with the accused concerning checks written to the exchange which the bank did not honor. The court held that the commander was not required to give the accused article 31 warnings because the commander logically believed that the checks were bouncing because of a bank administrative error. The commander was deemed not to be conducting an interrogation, but was rather simply trying to prod the accused to quickly clear up the banking error. See also United States v. Kendig, 36 M.J. 291, 294 (C.M.A. 1993) (test to determine if one is a suspect is whether considering all facts and circumstances at the time of the interview, the government interrogator believed or reasonably should have believed that the one interrogated committed the offense).

4. In United States v. Shepard, 38 M.J. 408 (C.M.A. 1993) the accused arrived late for morning muster and told his squad leader that the MPs needed to be called. The accused was then taken to his platoon sergeant who began conversing with the accused about his family. During the course of this unwarned conversation, the accused stated that he had killed his wife. The court held that the sergeant was not required to give article 31 warnings because the accused spontaneously confessed to a murder which the sergeant had no reason to suspect him of having committed. The court did warn however that at some point in the interview the sergeant should have reasonably suspected the accused of murder and given the appropriate warnings.

b. Imputed knowledge. Suspicion of the accused held by some government agents will not be imputed to other government agents. See United States v. Dickenson, 6 C.M.A. 438, 20 C.M.R. 154 (1955). Dickenson involved a repatriated American prisoner of war who was suspected of offenses by counterintelligence officers in the United States, but not in Japan where the questioning took place. The court stated that "agency should not be confused with the chain of command. . . ." Id. at 444, 20 C.M.R. at 160. The court's opinion may be dictum, however, in view of its alternative finding that the only omission in the article 31 warnings given the accused by the counterintelligence officers was the advice on suspicion of the offense. Such omission was harmless because of the accused's knowledge of the officers' suspicion from the surrounding circumstances and the advice of the Red Chinese before repatriation. Imputing suspicion of one government agent to another should be distinguished from inputing knowledge of a Miranda / Tempia rights assertion. See Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675, 687 (1987) (burden is on the officer conducting the interrogation to ensure accused has not previously asserted his right to counsel); United States v. Simmons, 11 M.J. 515 (N.C.M.R.), petition denied, 11 M.J. 409 (C.M.A. 1981) (statement not admissible where inexperienced 17-year-old, after twice telling military police he wanted to speak to a lawyer, was questioned by a Naval Investigative Service agent who had no knowledge of the prior questioning, and gave a statement after being given full warnings).

c. Suspicion arising during interrogation. When suspicion arises during an investigation, the mandate of article 31(b) must be followed. See, e.g., United States v. Doyle, 9 C.M.A. 302, 26 C.M.R. 82 (1958) (investigation into embezzlement of "United Success Drive" funds lasted over a number of months before a lieutenant was suspected). See also United States v. Ravenel, 26 M.J. 344 (C.M.A. 1988).

d. In order for one to be a suspect within the meaning of article 31(b), the suspicion must have crystallized to such an extent that a general accusation of some recognizable crime can be framed. United States v. Kendig, 36 M.J. 291 (C.M.A. 1993) (accused who was first person interviewed in a police misconduct investigation was not suspected of making a false official statement until much later in the investigation); United States v. Haskins, 11 C.M.A. 365, 29 C.M.R. 181 (1960) (accused was obviously guilty of poor records management, but questioner had no reason to believe a theft of funds was involved). See also United States v. Lavine, 13 M.J. 150 (C.M.A. 1982).

E. When must the warnings be given?

1. Interrogation. The general rule is that warnings must be given when questioning designed to elicit an incriminating response takes place. Mil.R.Evid. 305(b)(2) defines "interrogation" as including any formal or informal questioning in which an incriminating response is either sought or is a reasonable consequence of such questioning. The drafters state, in the analysis, that interrogation encompasses more than just the putting of questions to an individual. For discussions of "interrogation" and conversation that may be the functional equivalent, compare Rhode Island v. Innis, 446 U.S. 291 (1980) ("interrogation . . . refers . . . to express questioning, . . . [and] also to any words or actions on the part of police that the police should know are reasonably likely to elicit an incriminating response. . . ."), where a conversation between police while transporting suspect to station—that children from a nearby school for the handicapped might find suspect's gun and hurt themselves—was held to not constitute an interrogation because it was not directed to the suspect and the police had no reason to believe he was susceptible to such remarks, with Brewer v. Williams, 430 U.S. 387 (1977) ("Christian burial speech" intended to elicit incriminating information and was tantamount to interrogation; police knew accused was "deeply religious," and directed speech to him). If Miranda's custody definition applies, the warnings must be given before questioning can take place. The general rule is that spontaneous statements are admissible, despite a failure to give the warnings, if they are otherwise voluntary. "There is no requirement that police stop a person who enters a police station and states he wishes to confess to a crime. . . . Volunteered statements of any kind are not barred by the Fifth Amendment. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 478 (1965); United States v. Seeloff, 15 M.J. 978 (A.C.M.R. 1983)..

Article 31(b) applies when questioning or conversation designed to elicit a response takes place. United States v. Borodzik, 21 C.M.A. 95, 44 C.M.R. 149 (1971) ("conversation" between NCIS agent and accused, who was apprehended in his home and was awaiting transportation to a confinement facility, held to require article 31(b) warnings).

In United States v. Dowell, 10 M.J. 36 (C.M.A. 1980), advising a confined accused of additional charges was held to be the functional equivalent of an interrogation. In United States v. Ray, 12 M.J. 1033 (A.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 13 M.J. 472 (C.M.A. 1983), keeping the accused in the investigator's office for a few minutes while the agent was "getting a few papers together" was not conduct designed to induce the accused to waive a prior invocation of his rights. United States v. Byers, 26 M.J. 132 (C.M.A. 1988) (investigative technique of lecturing a suspect on the weight of the evidence against him prior to a rights advisement is the functional equivalent of an interrogation for purposes of article 31 and Miranda / Tempia). See also United States v. Steward, 31 M.J. 259 (C.M.A. 1990). But cf., United States v. Guron, 37 M.J. 942 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993) (nine-minute preface conversation that OSI agents had with accused about his duty specialty and personal background was not equivalent of interrogation and therefore could precede advisement of rights).

a. Article 31(b) warnings are not needed when asking for consent to search. United States v. Morris, 1 M.J. 352 (C.M.A. 1976) (NCIS agent, without giving article 31(b) warnings, preceded a request of the accused to search an automobile with a query as to who owned the car); United States v. Murphy, 39 M.J. 486 (C.M.A. 1994) (accused voluntarily consented to an admissible urinalysis shortly after her article 31(b) rights had been violated); United States v. Pabon, 37 M.J. 836 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993) (accused voluntarily consented to provide urine sample 30 minutes after invoking his rights). United States v. Stocker, 17 M.J. 158 (C.M.A. 1984) (article 31(b) warnings not required to search the accused's car and barracks room with accused's consent). While the use of warnings is permissible, most criminal investigators will give "consent to search" advice, rather than article 31(b) warnings.

b. Article 31(b) and Miranda warnings are not needed in the limited situation where, under the "public safety" doctrine, there exists the possibility of saving human life or avoiding serious injury by rescuing the one in danger, and the situation is such that no course of action other than questioning the suspect promises relief. New York v. Quarles, 467 U.S. 649 (1984). In a military application of this exception, compliance with article 31(b) and Miranda warnings was excused by this "rescue" doctrine where the accused appeared at the military police station to report an injury to another person and the military policeman on duty, on eliciting that the accused had stabbed the victim, contacted the medical dispensary and, at the direction of the corpsman, inquired of the accused where and how he had stabbed the victim and where the victim was located. United States v. Jones, 26 M.J. 353 (C.M.A. 1988); United States v. Carrillo, 16 F.3d 1046 (9th Cir. 1994) (unwarned questions to determine if accused had drugs or syringes on him not violative of Miranda).

c. Article 31(b) warnings may be unnecessary at a subsequent interrogation if the warnings were read properly at the first interrogation and the time between the two sessions is short enough.

(1) In United States v. Boster, 38 C.M.R. 681 (A.B.R. 1968), seven military policemen were accused of trying to burn their sergeant's tent with him in it. All were represented by the same defense counsel. One accused, when first interviewed after receiving proper warnings, denied guilt. At a second session, held over a week later and with improper warnings, he confessed. The court held that the statement should have been suppressed, since the interrogation was not continuous and there was no carry-over between the two sessions.

(2) In United States v. Schultz, 22 C.M.A. 353, 41 C.M.R. 311 (1970), the accused was suspected of murder. In his first interview, the accused was told that there was a possible murder charge. Seven hours later, the accused's wall locker was searched and he identified the clothing he had been wearing at the time of the offense. The court found that, since "separate periods of inquiry can constitute a single continuous interrogation" [citing United States v. White, 17 C.M.A. 211, 38 C.M.R. 9 (1967)], and since the delay between the search and the first interview was so short, the period constituted a continuous interrogation and the failure of the agents to warn Schultz during the search was not error.

(3) A twenty-day delay and different offenses have been held not to involve a continuous investigation. United States v. Weston, 1 M.J. 789 (A.F.C.M.R. 1976) (first offense involved unlawfully opening three letters and the second involved opening 140 letters). But, in United States v. Paul, 24 C.M.R. 729 (A.F.B.R. 1957) and United States v. Radford, 17 C.M.R. 595 (A.F.B.R. 1954), delays of 13 and 30 days, respectively, were permissible because the same subject matter was being continuously investigated and there were no indications that the accused had forgotten or misunderstood their rights.

(4) In United States v. Thompson, 31 M.J. 781 (A.C.M.R. 1990) the accused's superior officer conducted an interrogation seven hours after an initial interrogation where the accused was properly advised of his rights. The court held that a rights advisement was not required at the commencement of this second interrogation because of the short time lapse and the fact that the same offenses were discussed.

(5) In United States v. Dowell, 10 M.J. 36 (C.M.A. 1980), however, an interval of at least three, and probably as many as twelve, days was sufficient to require new warnings, especially where the accused was in confinement.

e. After a previous inadmissible confession. In United States v. Steward, 31 M.J. 259 (C.M.A. 1990), the Court of Military Appeals recognized two distinct situations surrounding the admissibility of a statement after a previous statement has been illegally elicited. If an initial statement was improperly obtained because the suspect had not been properly warned of his panoply of rights to silence and counsel, voluntariness of the second confession is determined by the totality of the circumstances including the earlier, unwarned statement. Where a confession is obtained at a lawful interrogation that comes after an earlier interrogation in which a confession was obtained due to actual coercion, duress, or inducement, the subsequent confession is presumptively tainted as a product of the earlier one. See United States v. Phillips, 32 M.J. 76 (C.M.A. 1991) (court seems to suggest that burden to show voluntariness is on the government by a preponderance in both situations, though a higher standard seems called for when a presumptive taint exists). The Supreme Court's unwillingness to continue to apply a presumptive taint which required "cleansing warnings" was demonstrated in Oregon v. Elstad, 470 U.S. 298 (1985). In this case, the suspect's previous unwarned admission did not require suppression of a second statement preceded by warnings (but not cleansing warnings), since there was no indication that the accused's second statement was the product of unlawful coercion. The exact application of Elstad to the military remains unclear, at least with respect as to whether an unwarned first admission creates a "presumptive taint" to later admissions. In United States v. Spaulding, 29 M.J. 156 (C.M.A. 1989), however, the Court of Military Appeals held that a confession is not automatically inadmissible even though it was made after another involuntary confession if the government can show that the second confession was preceded by an article 31(b) warning and was not the product of the earlier violation of article 31(b). In United States v. Marquardt, 39 M.J. 239 (C.M.A. 1994), the court held that they would not presume taint from a prior unwarned confession. The court found the later confession to be admissible because: greater than one month had passed since the obtaining of the illegal statement; the accused was properly warned and waived his rights prior to the giving of the second statement; the prior statement was not exploited by the second interrogator; and there was no intentional disregarding of constitutional rights. See also United States v. Norfleet, 36 M.J. 129 (C.M.A. 1992); United States v. Gooden, 37 M.J. 1055 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993).

f. Spontaneous or volunteered statements. Spontaneous remarks are those not made in response to questioning, and no rights warnings are required. United States v. Miller, 7 M.J. 90 (C.M.A. 1979); United States v. Barnes, 19 M.J. 890 (A.C.M.R. 1985), aff'd, 22 M.J. 385 (C.M.A. 1986); United States v. Seeloff, 15 M.J. 978 (A.C.M.R. 1983). See also Mil.R.Evid. 304(a) analysis; Mil.R.Evid. 305(c) analysis. They may not permit, much less require, a preliminary warning under article 31(b). United States v. Workman, 15 C.M.A. 228, 35 C.M.R. 200 (1965) (accused requested a pass from his superior NCO for the purpose of obtaining money to make up a shortage in his mess funds); United States v. Willeford, 5 M.J. 634 (A.F.C.M.R. 1978) (wallet left at scene of rape—OSI knocked on door of owner, who opened it and blurted out "I've been expecting you, you've got my wallet, you've got enough on me."); United States v. Thompson, 47 C.M.R. 565 (N.C.M.R. 1973).

Similarly, if an individual voluntarily initiates a conversation amounting to a confession, there is no requirement for authorities to stop him and give article 31(b) warnings. United States v. Hinkson, 17 C.M.A. 126, 128, 37 C.M.R. 390, 392 (1967) (No requirement to warn an accused when the government informant testified he asked no questions. After listening to the informant's story of his own criminal misconduct, "the accused elected to disclose his own complicity in a similar crime. His choice was not the product of a false sense of security induced by a friendly official. . ."). See also United States v. Seeloff, supra.

Furthermore, if an interrogator, who does not suspect an individual of an offense, questions that person for a legitimate purpose, any spontaneous incriminating statements made are admissible against him. United States v. Ballard, 19 C.M.A. 96, 37 C.M.R. 360 (1967) (When asked to identify himself, the accused said, "give me a break" and "how much is it worth to you," and "fifty dollars if ya let me go").

g. Obligation to rewarn. If there is a break between the initial warning and a subsequent interrogation, must the interrogator rewarn the suspect? In United States v. Jefferson, 44 M.J. 312 (1996), the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces held that a four-day gap between rights warnings and the suspect's confession is acceptable where the same agent conducted both interrogations, both interrogations dealt with the same subject, and the agent reminded the suspect of the rights warnings.

3. "Caught in the act" and preliminary questioning

a. Miranda

(1) Because Miranda involved a stationhouse interrogation, a number of courts have held it inapplicable to questions asked on the scene when police surprise and arrest individuals during criminal activity. The claim is that such questioning does not constitute "interrogation" in the Miranda sense. Some support for this position may be found in Miranda's facts and the Court's view of the Miranda case itself. See, e.g., Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973). Although the current civilian trend is in favor of limiting Miranda, military prosecutors should not attempt to rely upon this interpretation of Miranda, particularly when conducting classes for military police. It does, however, provide a fall-back position should military police, CID, or NCIS agents give proper article 31(b) warnings but neglect proper counsel warnings during apprehension.

(2) A related topic is the propriety of preliminary or administrative questions not involving the offense. Although these questions will often supply incriminating information, the majority civilian rule appears to allow them. Questions usually relate to name, address, marital status, employment, etc., each of which is termed "pedigree" or "non-investigative." See, e.g., United States ex rel. Hines v. LaValle, 521 F.2d 1109 (2d Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1090 (1976). See generally The Applicability of Miranda to the Police Booking Process, 1976 Duke L.J. 574 (1976). Because of the phrasing of article 31, administrative questions in the military should be considered suspect at best. But cf., United States v. Guron, 37 M.J. 942 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993) (nine minute prefatory conversation properly preceded rights warning); United States v. Davenport, 9 M.J. 364 (C.M.A. 1980) (asking for identification need not be preceded by warnings). See also United States v. Leiffer, 13 M.J. 337 (C.M.A. 1092) [statement as to suspect's name / address not covered by article 31(b)].

b. Article 31

(1) The primary military case dealing with an accused "caught in the act" is United States v. Vail, 11 C.M.A. 134, 28 C.M.R. 358 (1960). Vail and two others were apprehended as a result of an attempted theft of arms from an Air Force warehouse in Morocco. At the time of the apprehension, the provost marshal asked one of

Vail's co-accused to show him to the weapons that had been removed from the warehouse. The weapons were apparently produced in response to the demand which, had it occurred during a later interrogation, would have violated article 31(b). The court chose not to decide the key question of Vail's standing to raise a violation of his co-accused's rights. Rather, the court stated: "The real question is whether an accused apprehended in the very commission of a larceny must be advised of his rights under article 31 as a condition to the admission of testimony of his reply to a demand to produce stolen weapons." Id. at 135, 28 C.M.R. at 359. Judge Quinn answered his own question thus:

Common sense tells us the arresting officer cannot be expected to stop everything in order to inform the accused of his rights under Article 31. On the contrary, in such a situation he is naturally and logically expected to ask the criminal to turn over the property he has just stolen. . . . In our opinion, Article 31 is inapplicable to the situation presented in this case.

(2) Judge Latimer concluded that the conditions necessary for article 31 to come into play were absent and that the demand for weapons was not an interrogation within the sense of article 31. Judge Ferguson's well-written and seemingly correct dissent argued that Vail was contrary to earlier decisions and contrary to congressional intent.

(3) Conversations by police with a military suspect who (after shooting his mother-in-law) barricaded himself in a base housing residence were admissible despite the lack of Article 31 (b) warnings. United States v. Moses, 45 M.J. 132, (CAAF 1996).

F. Waiver requirements

1. Questioning may not begin unless the accused or suspect has made a knowing and voluntary waiver of his rights. As a practical matter, this means that he has affirmatively indicated that he understands his rights, wishes to waive them, and wishes to make a statement. Usually these representations are made in response to the interrogator's questions. The degree to which an express affirmative waiver is required is unclear. The Air Force Court of Military Review has sustained the admission of an accused's statements obtained by a deputy sheriff who warned him of his rights. While the accused said he understood his rights, and then made a statement, he never affirmatively waived the right to counsel. United States v. Gochenour, 47 C.M.R. 979 (A.F.C.M.R. 1973). Gochenour is in accord with the majority civilian rule.

2. Questioning must stop whenever the suspect indicates a desire not to make a statement or a desire to stop making one.

a. In Michigan v. Mosley, 423 U.S. 96 (1975). 'the court indicated that the fact that a suspect has exercised his right to remain silent will not forever bar subsequent interrogation. Rather, the question in cases involving renewed interrogation will be whether the suspect's right to cut off questioning was "scrupulously honored." Mosley dealt with a case where the renewed interrogation pertained to an offense unrelated to the subject of the initial interrogation. Yet the Mosley rationale could be applied to renewed interrogation regarding the same offense. Mil.R.Evid. 305(f) provides that questioning must cease immediately when the accused exercises his right to remain silent. The rule does not address renewed interrogation, although the analysis indicates that the drafters recognized the possible impact of Mosley on the rule.

b. Reconsideration. An interrogator may properly ask a suspect who has declined to make a statement, or stopped making a statement while the interrogation was in progress, to reconsider his decision not to make a statement. See United States v. Lowry, 2 M.J. 55, 60 n.6 (C.M.A. 1976). The question in such cases will be whether the accused's invocation of the right to remain silent was "scrupulously honored" by the interrogator. See Mosley, supra.

(1) While a polite second request is legitimate, the number and manner of follow-ups that will be held legitimate is uncertain. At some point, the interrogator will run the risk of being found to have violated the suspect's rights. In United States v. Attebury, 18 C.M.A. 531, 40 C.M.R. 243 (1969), the accused was charged with a number of offenses, including murder. He was interviewed by CID agents three times in a four-day period. The first time he was reluctant to talk about the offenses, the second time he refused to make a statement, and the third time, after preliminary warnings, he engaged in a conversation with the agents ultimately leading to an incriminating statement. Without deciding the particular point at which CID should have stopped trying for a statement, the court held that the final statement was the result of interrogation that should have ceased at some earlier time when the accused indicated his desire not to talk. The accused's judicial confession made in open court was found to have been impelled by the earlier statements, and the charges were dismissed.

(2) In United States v. Watkins, 34 M.J. 344 (C.M.A. 1992), the court held that there was no per se prohibition against reapproaching an accused who had invoked his right to remain silent. The court noted that government officials can "scrupulously honor" an accused's rights assertion even if they reapproach the accused 1-2 hours after the initial right to silence invocation.

(3) While a second attempt at interrogation may be possible, a second attempt made without warnings will usually be held unlawful. See United States v. Heslet, 27 C.M.A. 705, 48 C.M.R. 596 (1974).

3. Refusal to make a written statement. Mere refusal to make a written statement is insufficient to show a refusal to make any statement. See United States v. Graham, 21 C.M.A. 489, 45 C.M.R. 263 (1972). See also United States v. Nielsen, 392 F.2d 849 (7th Cir. 1968), stating that, where the accused said that he would not sign anything until he saw his lawyer, insufficient evidence of waiver existed. An honest belief that only a written statement can be used at court, however, may make an oral statement inadmissible. In one recent case, the Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals found that a suspect's reluctance to sign a written statement constituted an invocation of the suspect's right to remain silent. In United States v. Doucet, 43 M.J. 656 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. 1995), the court held that a suspect's refusal to sign a confession prepared by an NCIS agent, and the suspect's request to take the statement home to review it, constituted an invocation of the right to remain silent. NCIS agents violated the suspect's rights by continuing the interrogation after the suspect made these statements.

1204      RIGHTS TO COUNSEL (Key Numbers 1106, 1109, 1111)

A.      *Rights to counsel at interrogations in the military: generally

1.      Customary rights warnings. Any examination of rights to counsel at military interrogations must distinguish between those rights that are customarily extended and those that must be given according to law. Customary rights warnings can be found in any of the standard cards or waiver certificate (e.g., NAVJAG Form 5810 / 10—suspect's rights acknowledgement / statement).

2.      Military warnings. The rights usually given by military interrogators are far broader than those required by Miranda. The minimum right to counsel at interrogations appears in Mil.R.Evid. 305, which creates a right to free appointed counsel for any military member (who may also have civilian counsel retained at no expense to the government). Under the military rule, the suspect has a right to both a military and a civilian attorney if he so desires. Prior to the adoption of the Military Rules of Evidence, the Court of Military Appeals held that the right to a free military lawyer depended on indigency, as in Miranda. United States v. Hofbauer, 5 M.J. 409 (C.M.A. 1978). Mil.R.Evid. 305 effectively overrules Hofbauer by affording the suspect a free military lawyer regardless of the suspect's financial situation. During the interrogation stage, the right to a military lawyer does not extend to a military lawyer of the suspect's choice (i.e., "individual military counsel") unless the suspect is already being represented as to the allegation by a particular military lawyer. The Secretary of the Navy has the authority to extend the right to individual military counsel to the interrogation stage, but thus far has not exercised that authority.

B.      *The Miranda rights to counsel

1.      The minimum Miranda counsel warning is: "You have a right to have a lawyer present to assist you at this interrogation and if you cannot afford one, one will be appointed for you." Note that the minimum warning does not include the automatic right to free military counsel regardless of indigency, and the right to have free detailed military counsel in addition to a retained civilian attorney—both of which are part of the military rights warnings.

2. When are Miranda warnings needed?

– Miranda and its military analogue, United States v. Tempia, 16 C.M.A. 629, 37 C.M.R. 249 (1967), indicate that both warnings of the right against self-incrimination and rights to counsel attach when an individual is involved in a "custodial interrogation." The difficulty has been in determining what constitutes such an interrogation.

3. What is "in custody"?

a. Mil.R.Evid. 305(d)(1)(A) indicates that counsel warnings are required whenever testimonial or communicative evidence is sought and the suspect or accused is "in custody, could reasonably believe himself / herself to be in custody, or is otherwise deprived of his / her freedom of action in any significant way." The drafters' analysis to this rule indicates that this language was intended to adopt an "objective" standard for determining custody. Mil.R.Evid. 305(d)(1)(B) provides that counsel warnings are also required whenever the suspect is in pretrial restraint, or where the interrogation takes place after preferral of charges, regardless of whether restraint has been imposed.

b. Recently the Supreme Court set out a two-part test to determine the mixed question of law and fact of what is "in custody":

- (1) What are the circumstances surrounding the interrogation, and
- (2) Given those circumstances, would a reasonable person have felt he or she was not at liberty to terminate the interrogation and leave.

Thompson v. Keohane 516 U.S. 99, (1995). United States v. Miller, 46 M.J. 80 (C.A.A.F. 1997) adopted this two part test

c. The Supreme Court held in California v. Beheler, 463 U.S. 1121 (1983), that a criminal defendant who voluntarily accompanied officers to the police station and was specifically told he was not under arrest, was not subjected to a "custodial" interrogation and therefore was not entitled to counsel rights warnings. See also Oregon v. Mathiason, 429 U.S. 492 (1977).

d. In Beckwith v. United States, 425 U.S. 341 (1976), IRS agents visited the accused at his house and interviewed him for three hours. The accused admitted he was free to leave and could have discontinued the interview at any time. The defense argued that since the investigation had "focused" on the accused, he was entitled to rights warnings because the pressures of a "focused investigation" were as severe as a jail-house interrogation. The Court rejected this "focus" test and found the confession to be admissible because the accused was not and knew he was not in custody.

e. The Supreme Court held in Berkemer v. McCarty, 468 U.S. 420 (1984), that the subjective belief of the police officer is not controlling in determining if one is "in custody." The police officer's unarticulated plan to arrest the motorist he had just stopped was irrelevant. The Court opined that the only relevant inquiry was how a reasonable person in the suspect's position would have understood the situation. See also United States v. Schake, 30 M.J. 314 (C.M.A. 1990) (adopting an objective standard as to whether a person is in custody rather than focusing on the accused's subjective state of mind); United States v. McCarthy, 37 M.J. 595 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993) (accused not in custody during a traffic stop by civilian policeman despite policeman's unexpressed belief that the accused was not free to leave); United States v. Curtis, 44 M.J. 106 (1996) (holding that a civilian police officer did not violate the accused's right against self-incrimination by failing to provide Miranda warnings while questioning the accused about driving off of the road, indicating that during a routine traffic stop, a police officer may ask a moderate number of questions to determine a driver's identity and to obtain information confirming or dispelling the officer's suspicions without giving Miranda warnings).

C. Non-Miranda rights to counsel

1. Massiah v. United States, 377 U.S. 201 (1964), held that an indicted defendant with known, retained, or appointed counsel could not be placed in a "bugged" area without notice to counsel, even though the defendant was not in custody, since a Sixth Amendment constitutional right to counsel exists at the post-indictment stage. Some authority exists for an extension of the Massiah rule to arraignment or other formal beginning of criminal proceedings. Referral in military practice seems the closest to indictment. See Mil.R.Evid. 305(d)(1)(B). Massiah is particularly important in undercover cases in which the interrogation is noncustodial and not subject to Miranda warnings. However, in Maine v. Moulton, 474 U.S. 159 (1985), the Supreme Court held that, where there is a pending indictment on the one hand and an ongoing investigation into additional charges on the other, the police are free to use a secret agent who elicits information from the accused, but the information may be used only in prosecutions for offenses that have not yet reached the indictment stage.

2. Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U.S. 478 (1964), a stepping-stone to the Miranda decision, stands for the minimum proposition that a defendant in custody, with a retained or appointed lawyer, has a right to see his attorney if he should ask to do so during an interrogation involving a crime where suspicion has focused on him.

3. In United States v. Turner, 5 M.J. 148 (C.M.A. 1978), the Court of Military Appeals held that the right to counsel at interrogations may be invoked by the accused's counsel under the sixth amendment. Turner appears to be an aberrational case and its vitality is questionable in view of the Supreme Court case of Moran v. Burbine, 106 S.Ct. 1135 (1986) (even if suspect has already, prior to police questioning, established an attorney-client relationship, he has no sixth amendment right to have the police not interfere with that relationship; thus, accused's rights not violated when police declined to tell him that his family had retained a lawyer who was trying to contact him, or when police falsely told the lawyer that accused would not be interrogated until the following day).

4. The Sixth Amendment rights find some application under the Military Rules of Evidence. Mil.R.Evid. 305(d)(1)(B) provides that counsel warnings are required before questioning an individual after preferral of charges or imposition of pretrial restraint.

5. The initiation of the Sixth Amendment right to counsel during a judicial proceeding does not constitute an invocation of the Miranda right to counsel and the protections of the Fifth Amendment. McNeil v. Wisconsin, 501 U.S. 171 (1991). In McNeil, an accused who was arraigned on a robbery charge was subsequently read rights and confessed during an interrogation concerning an independent murder charge. The Court held that the Sixth Amendment right is offense specific and that its invocation does not preclude subsequent government interrogation on unrelated offenses. This differs from a Miranda / Tempia right to counsel invocation where the government cannot reapproach an accused who is deemed to have informed the government that they only desire to deal with the police through counsel. See Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146 (1990).

6. In United States v. Henry, 447 U.S. 264 (1980), the defendant made incriminating statements to a paid informant who was confined in the same cellblock as the defendant. The informant had been told by government agents to be alert to any statements made by prisoners but not to initiate conversations with or question the defendant regarding the charges against him. Nevertheless, the Court held that Henry's statements were inadmissible as being "deliberately elicited" from the defendant in violation of his sixth amendment right to counsel. However, in Kuhlmann v. Wilson, 477 U.S. 436 (1986), the court indicated it distinguishes between active eliciting of information and mere passive receipt of information. Thus, finding Massiah and Henry not violated, where a jailhouse informant was placed in accused's cell and told not to ask accused any questions, but simply to "keep his ears open" for information.

D. Notice to counsel and reinitiation of interrogation
(Key Number 1112)

1. In United States v. McOmber, 1 M.J. 380 (C.M.A. 1976), the court held that an interrogator must notify counsel prior to interrogating a suspect whenever the interrogator knows or reasonably should know that the accused has an appointment or retained lawyer as to the suspected offense. It is questionable whether McOmber is still good law based upon recent amendments to Mil.R.Evid. 305. A practitioner should exercise great caution in relying upon case law which came out prior to this recent amendment.

2. Old Mil.R.Evid. 305. Prior to the amendment in change 7 to the MCM, Mil.R.Evid. 305(e) required an interrogator to notify counsel prior to questioning if they knew or reasonably should have known that either counsel had been appointed for or retained by the accused or suspect and that counsel was to be given a reasonable time to arrange for attendance at the interrogation.

3. Amended Mil.R.Evid. 305. The amended rule continues to protect Sixth Amendment rights as it requires that subsequent to preferral, any interrogation concerning the offenses or matters that were the subject of the preferral cannot be conducted without counsel being present if the accused has either requested counsel or has an appointed or retained counsel. Mil.R.Evid. 305(e)(2) and 305(d)(1)(B). Mil.R.Evid 305(g)(2) also has a great impact in this area. This rule makes it clear that the government is not totally locked out if the accused asserts his/her right to counsel during a custodial interrogation. The government will be able to obtain a subsequent waiver of rights and talk to this individual at a later time if they can demonstrate by a preponderance of the evidence that (1) the accused or suspect initiated the communication leading to the subsequent waiver; or (2) the accused or suspect has not continuously had his or her freedom restricted by confinement or other means, during the period between the request for counsel and the subsequent waiver.

4. Impact of Rules of Professional Conduct. While the Military Rules of Evidence may create a window for the government to reapproach a represented accused without notifying counsel, there still may be some ethical restrictions. Rule 4.2 of our Professional Conduct Rules states that "In representing a client, a judge advocate shall not communicate about the subject of the representation with a party the judge advocate knows to be represented by another judge advocate in the matter, unless the judge advocate has the consent of the other judge advocate or is authorized by law to do so." Additionally, you cannot circumvent this rule by having an investigator do the second interrogation at the behest of the trial counsel (Rule of Professional Conduct 5.3).

5. In United States v. Lemasters, 39 M.J. 490 (C.M.A. 1994), the suspect invoked his right to counsel during an interrogation and shortly thereafter entered into an attorney-client relationship with a military counsel. Subsequently, the accused initiated contact with the investigators and after waiving his Article 31 rights, confessed. The court held that where an accused voluntarily reinitiates contact with investigators and affirmatively waives his right to have his counsel notified, the investigators are under no obligation to notify counsel. This is a valid waiver under Mil.R.Evid. 305(g)(1).

6. In United States v. Rollins, 23 M.J. 729 (A.F.C.M.R. 1986), a female enlistment applicant was acting as an agent for OIS where recruiter (accused) was suspected of engaging in sexual intimacies with female applicants. The court held that applicant's return of recruiter's phone call was not an interrogation that triggered need for warning and/or notice to counsel.

7. In United States v. Sager, 36 M.J. 137 (C.M.A. 1992), the court held that the notice provision of Mil.R.Evid. 305(e) is offense specific. Prior to interrogation, investigators were not required to notify the accused's counsel who was representing him on civilian charges.

8. Initiating interrogation after an invocation of right to counsel. Once the suspect requests counsel or has obtained counsel, may he be interrogated concerning an offense without notifying counsel? A literal reading of Mil.R.Evid 305 would allow this so long as there is a break in confinement/custody between the questionings (suspect has not continuously had his or her freedom restricted by confinement, or other means, during the period between the request for counsel and the subsequent waiver). It was once perceived that the bright line rule established by the Supreme Court in Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981) (once request counsel during custodial interrogation, no further interrogation until lawyer provided) and refined in Arizona v. Roberson, 486 U.S. 675 (1988) (request lawyer during custodial interrogation - no further interrogation on any offenses) and Minnick v. Mississippi, 498 U.S. 146 (1990) (cannot reapproach one who has invoked right to counsel even if they consulted with counsel) would preclude reapproaching an accused who invoked the right to counsel. However, C.A.A.F. held in United States v. Vaughters, 44 M.J. 377 (1996), that these Supreme Court cases should not be read so broadly, and that as long as there has been a release from custody and the accused is given a meaningful opportunity to consult with counsel (in this case 19 days), interrogation can be reinitiated after readvising the accused of his/her rights. See also United States v. Faisca, 46 M.J. 246 (C.A.A.F. 1997).

E. Failure to comply with the warnings requirements

1. General rule. Failure to give the warnings properly will result in suppression of the evidence upon proper defense objection. Mil.R. Evid. 304(a).

2. Exception. If the warning defect involves the right to remain silent or counsel warnings, an otherwise voluntary statement may be used for impeachment purposes. Mil.R.Evid. 304(b).

3. In addition, where the statement itself constitutes an offense, it is admissible—withstanding the absence of warnings. See United States v. Olson, 17 M.J. 176 (C.M.A. 1984) (charge of communicating a threat); United States v. Lausin, 18 M.J. 711 (A.C.M.R. 1984), petition granted, 22 M.J. 89 (C.M.A. 1986) (charge of false swearing from a statement made to CID agents).

4. Knowledge of rights. Evidence that the suspect knew his rights does not excuse the government from informing the accused of his rights, although, if the suspect intentionally frustrates the reading of the rights, he may be held to have waived them.

a. In United States v. Sikorski, 21 C.M.A. 345, 45 C.M.R. 119 (1972), the evidence showed not only that the accused knew his rights, but also that he frustrated the agent's continuing attempts to read the rights to him. The court found a knowing and intelligent waiver. At trial, the defense requested and received an instruction that, if the court found the pretrial statements to be involuntary, the court should decide if the accused's in-court testimony was impelled by the involuntary statements. On appeal, the instruction was held to be in error because it allowed the possibility of the court disregarding the defendant's testimony. However, due to the facts of the case, the error was not

b. The only omission from the rights warnings that may not invariably result in suppression of a statement appears to be the advice as to the nature of the offense of which the individual is suspected. There is some authority to support the proposition that, if the suspect can be shown to have known of what offense he was suspected, the failure to warn will not be fatal. See United States v. Nitschke, 12 C.M.A. 489, 31 C.M.R. 75 (1961) (no error for agents investigating an auto accident to fail to tell accused of a resultant fatality where they did so on a doctor's advice, and the accused at least suspected that someone had died); United States v. O'Brien, 3 C.M.A. 105, 11 C.M.R. 105 (1953) (accused was not told of the offense, but his wife had died violently two days earlier, and the questioning concerned the details of her death); United States v. Burns, 47 C.M.R. 874 (N.C.M.R. 1973) (advising accused he was suspected of larceny, but failing to advise him he was also suspected of false swearing, not a fatal defect where statement falsely sworn to was an earlier statement attempting to cover up the facts of the larceny). Note, however, that only O'Brien involves a complete failure to advise the suspect of the nature of the suspected offense. It seems unlikely that the Court of Military Appeals will sanction such an omission today.

c. "Substantial compliance"? In California v. Prysock, 453 U.S. 355 (1981), the accused was not specifically told of his right to have a lawyer appointed for him prior to any further interrogation. The Miranda warnings were otherwise correct. The court held that the warnings were adequate and that Miranda does not require any precise "word formula" or "incantation." In United States v. Erie, 29 M.J. 1008 (A.C.M.R. 1990), the court held that warning an accused that he was suspected of using hashish was sufficient to encompass all incriminating statements relating to criminal offenses involving any controlled substances. The court opined that an investigator need not spell out the details of the investigation with legal nicety but rather only has to orient the accused so that he can intelligently weigh the consequences of answering questions.

d. "Presumption of regularity"? In United States v. Annis, 5 M.J. 351 (C.M.A. 1978), the court held that, in the absence of a defense objection, testimony that the investigator read the rights warning card to the accused creates a presumption of regularity.

F. Waiver (Key Numbers 1112, 1114)

1. A suspect or accused, having been informed of the rights to remain silent and to have counsel, may always waive them. The waiver, however, must be a voluntary, intelligent, affirmative waiver. Mil.R.Evid. 305(g) requires that the suspect or accused acknowledge affirmatively that he or she understands the rights involved, affirmatively declines the right to counsel, and affirmatively consents to the making of a statement. A passive waiver of the right to counsel, however, may be demonstrated by the prosecution. See North Carolina v. Butler, 441 U.S. 369 (1979); Mil.R.Evid. 305(g)(2).

2. The suspect must be asked if he or she wants a lawyer. Silence cannot be considered a waiver. See, e.g., United States v. Long, 37 C.M.R. 696 (A.B.R. 1967). The suspect must also be asked if he is willing to make a statement. See analysis to Mil.R.Evid. 305(g).

3. In United States v. Masemer, 22 C.M.A. 442, 41 C.M.R. 366 (1970), the affirmative use of a pretrial admission at trial by the defense constituted waiver.

4. Request for counsel (Key Numbers 1113, 1114). If, at any time, the individual indicates a desire to see or speak with counsel, questioning must stop. He is not subject to further interrogation until counsel has been made available to him, unless he, himself, initiates further communication. United States v. Applewhite, 23 M.J. 196 (C.M.A. 1987) (accused's failure to contact an attorney during five days between time that he agreed to polygraph examination after requesting an attorney and the time he appeared for the examination did not show a waiver of the prior invocation of right to counsel). The request should be treated as an indication that the individual does not wish to speak. There is some support for the proposition, however, that, if the individual merely states that he does not wish to continue the interrogation, the investigator may at some later point ask the individual to reconsider. See, e.g., United States v. Lowry, 2 M.J. 55, 60 n.6 (C.M.A. 1976); United States v. Collier, 1 M.J. 358 (C.M.A. 1976). Cf. Edwards v. Arizona, 451 U.S. 477 (1981), where the Supreme Court held that, once a suspect invokes the right to counsel, a valid waiver of that right cannot be established by showing only that he responded to further police-initiated custodial interrogation even if he has been advised of his rights. Furthermore, an accused, having expressed his desire to deal with the police only through counsel, is not subject to further interrogation by authorities until counsel has been made available, unless the accused himself initiates further communication, exchanges, or conversations with the police.

In Minnick v. Mississippi, 111 S.Ct. 486 (1990), we see the Supreme Court building on and clarifying the Edwards decision. Prior to Minnick, some confusion existed as to what happens once counsel had been made available. Some federal circuits interpreted Edwards to mean that, once counsel had been made available, government officials could initiate a reinterrogation. Minnick establishes a bright-line rule that neither the opportunity nor consultation itself is sufficient to open the door for officials to initiate a reinterrogation. Further, at any subsequent interrogation initiated by officials, counsel must be present. The one exception, once again, is if the accused initiates the interrogation. See McNeil v. Wisconsin, 111 S.Ct. 2204 (1991) (requesting assistance of an attorney at a bail hearing does not equate to . . . invoking a Miranda / Edwards interest). See also Oregon v. Bradshaw, 462 U.S. 1039 (1983) (where accused given Miranda warnings requests lawyer, then later approaches police officer and asks "well, what is going to happen to me now," statement amounted to initiation of further conversation under Edwards and subsequent confession admissible); United States v. Young, 46 M.J. 768 (Army Ct Crim App. 1997). Police investigator's comment to accused who had demanded counsel to remember that he had given accused chance was not reasonably likely to elicit retraction of accused's request for counsel. United States v. Stinde, 21 M.J. 734 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) (Edwards applied and confession held inadmissible where suspect asked for a lawyer and CID ceased interrogation, but battalion legal officer later told suspect he "did not rate an attorney" until preferral); United States v. Alba, 15 M.J. 573 (A.C.M.R. 1983) (Edwards violated where accused was reapproached after requesting counsel and error not harmless beyond a reasonable doubt); United States v. Ray, 12 M.J. 1033 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (accused initiated further conversation where he told CID he did not want his CO to find out about the incident); United States v. Vidal, 23 M.J. 319 (C.M.A. 1987) (Edwards not triggered by request for counsel made to foreign official, and suspect adequately protected if warned under American law when first questioned by American officials); Conn v. Barrett, 479 U.S. 523 (1987) (Edwards not violated where suspect stated that he was willing to talk verbally, but would put nothing in writing until he contacted his lawyer; court specifically held that an accused's ignorance of the full consequences of his decisions does not vitiate their voluntariness). See also United States v. Dock, 40 M.J. 112 (C.M.A. 1994) (requesting "American" counsel while being interrogated by German officials conducting independent foreign investigation did not preclude American CID agents from subsequently obtaining a rights waiver and confession); United States v. Coleman, 26 M.J. 451 (C.M.A. 1988), where previous request for counsel made of German police did not invalidate later CID interrogation when no counsel was provided ("overseas exception").

5. A "Break in Custody" In United States v. Vaughters, 44 M.J. 377, (CAAF 1996). The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces held that where a suspect invokes his right to counsel during a custodial interrogation and is subsequently released from custody and provided a "meaningful" opportunity to consult with counsel, government agents may re-initiate contact with the suspect. Although Staff Sgt Vaughters had been released from custody for 19 days and had an opportunity to speak w/counsel, he did not.

6. The timing and the wording of the request for counsel. In Davis v. United States, 114 S. Ct. 2350 (1994), a sailor, during an interrogation, told the investigator, "Maybe I should talk to a lawyer." The Supreme Court found this request to be ambiguous and therefore did not view it as an invocation of the right to counsel. Furthermore, the court stated that the government agent was under no obligation to clarify this ambiguous statement but rather could forge ahead with the interrogation. It is recommended, however, that agents do clarify such ambiguous requests as the Court stated, that this will often be "good police practice" and will minimize the chance of suppression by judicial second guessers who may view the various statements as being unequivocal. See also United States v. McClaren, 38 M.J. 112 (C.M.A.), cert. denied 114 S. Ct. 1056 (1994) (pre Davis decision where court opined that investigator confronted with an ambiguous counsel request must either clarify or cease the interrogation).

In United States v. Schroeder, 39 M.J. 471 (C.M.A. 1994), the accused, while in custody, told the government agent that he did not want to provide a urine sample until after he had a chance to talk to a lawyer. The court concluded this was not a valid counsel rights invocation because it was made by the accused prior to being advised of his rights and prior to the commencement of the interrogation. Therefore, the accused has the burden of exercising his rights at the appropriate time for it to be an effective invocation. See also United States v. Sager, 36 M.J. 137 (C.M.A. 1992) (accused must assert rights at the appropriate time).

7. The mental condition of the individual being questioned should bear heavily upon any waiver. That is, did the suspect understand his rights? See, e.g., United States v. Norfleet, 36 M.J. 129 (C.M.A. 1992) (having a lower-than-average intelligence level does not, as a matter of law, insulate one from interrogation); United States v. Gill, 37 M.J. 501 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993) (interrogating a person who is tired and unusually compliant does not per se make a statement involuntary). United States v. Dison, 8 C.M.A. 616, 25 C.M.R. 120 (1958) (accused did not possess emotional stability or intelligence to understand); United States v. Hernandez, 4 C.M.A. 465, 16 C.M.R. 39 (1954) (limited grasp of English language, did not fully understand rights); United States v. Molinary-Rivera, 13 M.J. 975 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (deficiency in English comprehension, coupled with ambiguous statement of rights, prevented knowing waiver); United States v. Michaud, 2 M.J. 428 (A.C.M.R. 1975) (accused lacked mental ability to understand warnings); United States v. Thornton, 22 M.J. 574 (A.C.M.R. 1986) (prior ingestion of 6-8 beers did not preclude knowing waiver). However, accused's mental condition, by itself and apart from its relation to official coercion, should never dispose of an inquiry into constitutional voluntariness. Thus, the taking of statements of a mentally ill accused, who, following the "voice of God," approached a police officer and confessed to homicide after being advised of his Miranda rights did not make the statement involuntary. Colorado v. Connelly, 479 U.S. 157 (1986).

8. Other factors bearing on whether a valid waiver was obtained include the accused's age, prior experience, nervousness, and condition as to sobriety. See generally Fare v. Michael C., 422 U.S. 707 (1979).

1205 THE VOLUNTARINESS DOCTRINE (Key Numbers 1106, 1107)

A. Introduction. Although the voluntariness doctrine has its origins in the same policy considerations that gave rise to the privilege against self-incrimination, the doctrine was and is distinct from the privilege. It has been only recently that the voluntariness doctrine has tended to merge into the privilege, and then only in the United States. Traditionally, the privilege against self-incrimination has been a "fighting right" that is lost when an individual chooses to speak or act for whatever reason. Under the voluntariness doctrine, however, the admissibility of a statement requires that it have been made voluntarily. The assumption is made that involuntary statements are likely to be unreliable. As it is quite possible to obtain voluntary statements (the term "voluntary" being a term of art) in violation of the right against self-incrimination, it is important to distinguish between the two legal concepts.

Statements obtained in violation of either the voluntariness doctrine or in violation of the various warning requirements are generally termed "involuntary." This is particularly true in military practice, as Mil.R.Evid. 305(a) defines a statement obtained in violation of its warning requirements as being "involuntary." See also Mil.R.Evid. 304(a), which continues the use of the term "involuntary." Accordingly, counsel desiring to attack the admissibility of a confession or admission generally challenge the "voluntariness" of the statement regardless of the nature of the actual error involved.

B. The voluntariness doctrine in the United States. While the common law doctrine arose primarily as a check on the reliability of confessions as evidence, the American view in the 20th century has placed due process considerations above reliability. Thus, the primary consideration under the Constitution is the nature of the circumstances surrounding the statement. See, e.g., Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560 (1958) (confession was held involuntary where "dull 19 year-old Negro" was not advised of any rights, kept incommunicado for three days, denied food for long periods, and finally told that there would be 30 or 40 people there in a few minutes to "get him"); Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278 (1936) (confession of blacks involuntary where a white mob extracted confessions after hanging defendants for short periods of time and whipping them; time from indictment to sentencing to death for murder was two days).

Despite a brief foray into the reliability question, the Supreme Court has made it clear that the fact that a statement may indeed be reliable is irrelevant to considerations of voluntariness. In Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U.S. 534 (1961), the Court held that: "confessions which are involuntary, i.e., the product of coercion, either physical or psychological, cannot stand. This is not because such confessions are unlikely to be true, but because the methods used to extract them offend an underlying principle in the enforcement of our criminal law: that ours is an accusatorial and not an inquisitorial system." Id. at 540-41. If a statement is voluntary but unreliable, however, the judge may in his discretion refuse to admit it. The American rule seeks to assure that a statement was, considering "the totality of the circumstances," the product of an essentially free and unrestrained choice by its maker "whose will was not 'overborne' by the interrogator." Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218, 227 (1973). See also Culombe v. Connecticut, 367 U.S. 568 (1961) (confession found to be involuntary where defendant with mental age of nine and one-half, who was easily influenced and subject to intimidation, was detained for four days and repeatedly questioned). In practice, the test cited above breaks down into two sub-tests: involuntary per se and causal connection.

1. Involuntary per se. Analysis of the cases reveals a range of conduct that will generally result in a confession being held to have been involuntary without regard to the actual effects of the improper conduct involved. Physical brutality is the primary conduct that results in near automatic exclusion. Conduct that "shocks the conscience" also escapes causal analysis. See, e.g., Brooks v. Florida, 389 U.S. 419 (1967) (15 days solitary confinement while naked); Ashcraft v. Tennessee, 322 U.S. 143 (1944) (36 hours of constant questioning using relays of interrogators); United States v. O'Such, 16 C.M.A. 537, 542, 37 C.M.R. 157, 162 (1967) (confinement in lightless segregation cell in "conditions bespeaking a brutality completely at odds with any civilized notion of treatment . . .").

2. Causal connection. Most voluntariness cases involve police misconduct that would not necessarily overbear the will of a suspect. Accordingly, the trial court must determine whether under the actual facts of the case it was likely that the police misconduct, considering the totality of the circumstances, resulted in an overborne will. The line between these cases and those applying an automatic exclusion rule is narrow at best and frequently will depend upon the individual trial judge's perceptions. See, e.g., United States v. Carmichael, 25 C.M.A. 132, 45 C.M.R. 304 (1972), where a statement made by an Air Force accused, after being told that if he refused to make a statement his case would be turned over to the Nationalist Chinese for trial, was not involuntary. The trial court determined that no causal connection existed between the confession and the statement of the interrogator's intent.

C. Improper law enforcement or command conduct

1. Physical coercion includes torture, improper confinement or detention, denial of medical treatment, or sustained interrogation. See, e.g., Stidham v. Swenson, 506 F.2d 478 (8th Cir. 1974), cert. denied, 429 U.S. 941 (1976) (discussion of conditions of imprisonment that might render confession inadmissible). In United States v. Jones, 6 M.J. 770 (A.C.M.R. 1978), petition denied, 7 M.J. 41 (C.M.A. 1979), eight hours in the company of investigators, without more, was not coercive per se. In Mincey v. Arizona, 437 U.S. 385 (1978), the accused was lying on his back in a hospital "encumbered by tubes, needles, and breathing apparatus" and the court found the confession made under the circumstances was involuntary. The mere status of being a drug addict will not render a statement involuntary. Hayward v. Johnson, 508 F.2d 322 (3d Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 422 U.S. 1011 (1975). However, a statement obtained during withdrawal is likely to be involuntary. United States v. Arcediano, 371 F. Supp. 457, 466 (S.D.N.Y. 1974).

2. Threats. Virtually any form of threat can render a statement involuntary. Particularly common are cases in which prosecution of friends or relatives is threatened if the accused fails to confess, and cases threatening harsher punishment if a statement is not given. See also Arizona v. Fulimante, 499 U.S. 279 (1991) (telling incarcerated accused that he would only be protected from other inmates if he came forward and told the truth rendered statements involuntary); United States v. Butner, 15 M.J. 139 (C.M.A. 1983) (investigator's threat to "hang a snitch coat" on accused unless accused named his accomplice rendered resulting statement involuntary); United States v. O'Such, 16 C.M.A. 557, 37 C.M.R. 157 (1967) (confession ruled involuntary where coercive interrogation methods were employed, including denying accused sleep and confinement under stringent physical conditions); United States v. Houston, 15 C.M.A. 211, 35 C.M.R. 211 (C.M.A. 1965) (voluntariness instruction necessary where several matters were brought forth, including a threat to involve accused's girlfriend); United States v. Askew, 14 C.M.A. 251, 34 C.M.R. 37 (1963) (improper for interrogator to tell accused that if he confessed, accused's wife would probably not have to be questioned).

3. Promises and inducements. Most improper inducements include promises of immunity (to be distinguished from an actual grant of immunity) or leniency towards either the accused or friends or family. United States v. Murphy, 18 M.J. 220 (C.M.A. 1984) (trial counsel's statement to accused that Japanese would favor accused making a statement and that, if Japanese took jurisdiction, U.S. likely would not prosecute, not unlawful inducement where accused did benefit in Japanese prosecution, although the U.S. later prosecuted on a related offense). An accused who initiates a bargaining session will not normally be heard to complain of improper inducement. See, e.g., United States v. Faulk, 48 C.M.R. 185 (A.C.M.R. 1973) (where interrogators were unaware of the fact that the accused was married until he brought up the subject by expressing a desire to see his wife, the interrogator's denial of permission to do so until the accused made a statement was not sufficient coercion to render the statement involuntary). Traditionally, a mere exhortation to tell the truth was not an improper inducement. However, such a statement cannot be used unless the individual has already agreed to waive his right to remain silent. In United States v. Whipple, 4 M.J. 773 (C.G.C.M.R. 1978), the accused turned over his drug cache after being assured that he would fall within the drug exemption program. The court held that the accused's subsequent act of handing over his drugs amounted to an involuntary statement. But see United States v. St. Clair, 19 M.J. 833 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984) (NCIS agent's promise to go to the legal officer and request that accused not be placed on restriction if the accused cooperated did not amount to an improper inducement).

4. Psychological coercion. Coercion may be psychological as well as physical. The line between proper and improper interrogation tactics is extremely difficult to define. While "Mutt and Jeff" interrogation may generally be acceptable [United States v. Howard, 18 C.M.A. 252, 39 C.M.R. 252 (1969)], specific facts may render a statement involuntary. In United States v. Bubonics, 45 M.J. 93 (C.A.A.F 1996), the court held that "Mutt and Jeff", or "good cop/bad cop" routines did not render a confession per se coerced and inadmissible. However, threatening to deprive the accused of liberty and threatening to turn him over to civilian police if he did not cooperate was deemed coercive. Similarly, playing upon a suspect's religious, political, or sexual beliefs may render a statement involuntary. See, e.g., State v. Edwards, 111 Ariz. 357, 529 P.2d 1174 (1974) (female police officer playing upon female suspect's belief in "sisterhood"). But see United States v. Wheeler, 22 M.J. 76 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 827 (1986) (appeals to the religious beliefs of a suspect are not per se coercive but must be considered part of the totality of the circumstances). In United States v. Collier, 1 M.J. 358 (C.M.A. 1976), the accused confessed after a one-hour parade of "emotion-laden matters." His statement was held to be involuntary. But see United States v. Wheeler, 18 M.J. 823 (A.C.M.R. 1984), aff'd, 22 M.J. 76 (C.M.A. 1986), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 827 (1986) (urging the accused to pray for forgiveness after the accused initiated the discussion of religion did not make the accused's subsequent confession involuntary).

D. Totality of the circumstances

1. Among the numerous factors that must be taken into account in determining voluntariness are:

- a. Force, threats, promises, or deceptions;
- b. the manner of interrogation (length of session or sessions, relays, number of interrogators, conditions, manner of interrogation);

c. the character of any detention (warning of rights, access to friends, relatives, or counsel, conditions); and

d. the character of the accused (health, age, education, intelligence, mental condition, and physical condition).

2. Frequently, the character of the suspect or accused may prove determinative. The health, intelligence, etc., of a suspect are factors to be considered. Thus, low intelligence or poor mental health may be determinative. See United States v. Michaud, 2 M.J. 428 (A.C.M.R. 1975) (psychiatrists testified that accused was not able to sufficiently understand his rights so as to knowingly and consciously waive those rights); United States v. Dison, 8 C.M.A. 616, 25 C.M.R. 120 (1958) (accused too intoxicated to understand warnings); United States v. Rogan, 8 C.M.A. 739, 25 C.M.R. 243 (1958) (accused lacked intelligence or emotional stability to understand advice). Conditions, such as hunger or sleeplessness, will not per se render a statement involuntary. See United States v. Tua, 4 M.J. 761 (A.C.M.R. 1977), petition denied, 5 M.J. 91 (C.M.A. 1978), where accused unsuccessfully argued an invalid waiver of rights because of his age, GT score, ethnic background (Samoan) and lack of food and sleep. Also, interrogation itself is not inherently coercive. United States v. Moore, 4 C.M.A. 482, 16 C.M.R. 56 (1954). The court, in United States v. Jones, 6 M.J. 770 (A.C.M.R. 1978), said that the fact that a person is easily led or of low mentality does not per se render a confession involuntary. See also United States v. Vigneault, 3 C.M.A. 247, 12 C.M.R. 3 (1953), and United States v. Robinson, 26 M.J. 361 (C.M.A. 1988), where the court held that a character defect or personality quirk of compulsion to make a confession does not automatically render an accused's statement inadmissible. This case is interesting because it involves the use of previous hypnotism.

E. Deception. Police use of deception to obtain confessions is far from unknown and usually takes the form of the police stating that the accused has been identified by an eyewitness, or an accomplice has confessed, or the evidence is enough to close the case when the exact opposite is true. According to McCormick, "except for a few early cases, there are almost no decisions holding that even intentional misrepresentation by interrogators of the accused's factual situation makes a resulting confession involuntary." C. McCormick, Handbook of the Law of Evidence 322 (2d ed. 1972). The military rule seems similar [United States v. Kluttz, 9 C.M.A. 20, 25 C.M.R. 282 (1958)], and has been phrased as follows: "Investigators may use deception to obtain confessions as long as the deception was not used to obtain an untrue confession." United States v. McKay, 9 C.M.A. 527, 531, 26 C.M.R. 307 (1958). Deception may be used after the suspect has made a valid waiver, but not to achieve a waiver of rights. Miranda v. Arizona, 384 U.S. 436, 476 (1966). In United States v. Melanson, 15 M.J. 765 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 16 M.J. 321 (C.M.A. 1983), the court found no illegality where investigators falsely told the accused his crime was recorded on film, even though the deception occurred prior to waiver of rights by the accused. In United States v. Thrower, 36 M.J. 613 (A.F.C.M.R. 1992), the interrogating agent employed a ruse involving a crystal ball which "supposedly" could be used to tell if the accused was lying. The court found that this ruse was nothing more than an adjuration to the accused to speak the truth and did not render the confession involuntary. If deceit overbears the suspect's will, the resulting statement will be involuntary. See generally White, Police Trickery in Inducing Confessions, 127 U. Pa. L. Rev. 581 (1979).

F. The voluntariness doctrine and overseas cases. Although foreign officials are not normally bound to give preinterrogation warnings [United States v. Covington, 758 F.2d 383 (9th Cir. 1985)], article 31(d) prevents admission into evidence of any statement obtained through coercion, unlawful influence, or unlawful inducement. No limitation appears on article 31(d)'s expansive scope to allow an exception for statements obtained by foreign officials or nonmilitary personnel. Thus, the voluntariness doctrine applies to all statements. See, e.g., United States v. Jourdan, 1 M.J. 482 (A.F.C.M.R. 1975), where the accused was held by Belgian authorities who threatened him and subsequently obtained statements. The court held that the article 31(d) exclusionary rule applied, notwithstanding foreign interrogation. See also United States v. Talavera, 2 M.J. 799 (A.C.M.R. 1976), aff'd, 8 M.J. 14 (C.M.A. 1979) (accused held by Japanese authorities; confessions admitted although he had been held for 24 days, suffered heroin withdrawal, and could not eat jail food); United States v. Frostell, 13 M.J. 680 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982) (statements to Japanese authorities not coerced where accused was confined in Iwakuni police station under cold and somewhat unsanitary conditions with a diet of Japanese prison food and U.S. C-rations); United States v. Jones, 6 M.J. 226 (C.M.A. 1979). See also Mil.R.Evid. 305(h)(2).

G. The voluntariness doctrine and Miranda

1. The Supreme Court's decision in Miranda was based on the assumption that stationhouse custodial interrogation constituted a form of psychological coercion. Thus, Miranda represents an expansion of the voluntariness doctrine. However, as Miranda also involves the right against self-incrimination, it represents a partial merger of two legal concepts. In practice, a proper Miranda waiver will usually show a voluntary statement. Indeed, many prosecutors feel that Miranda is far more helpful than it is harmful for that reason. However, the voluntariness doctrine should be more properly viewed as a significant factor in determining voluntariness of a statement, even when the rights warnings have been properly given.

2. Miranda's absolute exclusionary rule is in doubt, and it is possible that the constitutional rule will return to a determination of voluntariness using the pre-Miranda standard with the absence of proper Miranda warnings being only one factor to be considered. See 18 U.S.C. § 3501 (1982); United States v. Crocker, 510 F.2d 1129 (10th Cir. 1975); Gandara, Admissibility of Confessions in Federal Prosecutions: Implementation of Section 3501 by Law Enforcement Officials and the Courts, 63 Geo. L.J. 305 (1974).

H. Miscellaneous. The voluntariness doctrine applies even though the right against self-incrimination does not. Thus, if torture is used to extract a confession from a suspect who refuses to talk despite receipt of a grant of immunity, the confession would appear to be involuntary and inadmissible. The proper threat of contempt of court, however, will not make a statement involuntary.

1206 THE EXCLUSIONARY RULE

A. Involuntary statements inadmissible. Article 31(d), UCMJ; Mil.R.Evid. 304.

1. Definition of "involuntary." For purposes of admissibility, involuntary usually means that a statement was taken in violation of the right against self-incrimination, the rights warnings requirements, or the voluntariness doctrine. In practice, an involuntary statement is apt to be one in which the interrogator failed to obtain a proper article 31 / Miranda waiver.

2. As a general rule, involuntary statements are not only inadmissible on the merits, they are also inadmissible for all purposes. However, Mil.R.Evid. 304(b) specifically adopts Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971), in that a statement inadmissible against a defendant during the prosecution's case-in-chief because the defendant had not been advised of his rights to counsel prior to making a statement, but which otherwise satisfied the legal standards of trustworthiness, is admissible for impeachment purposes to attack the defendant's trial testimony. See, e.g., United States v. Lucas, 19 M.J. 773 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984), aff'd, 25 M.J. 9 (C.M.A. 1987); Mil.R.Evid. 304(b) analysis. The statement must be otherwise voluntary to be admissible.

B. Exclusion of derivative evidence

1. General rule. The general rule in military practice is that evidence derived from an involuntary statement is inadmissible as "fruit of the poisonous tree," and is incorporated in Mil.R.Evid. 304(a). The Court of Military Appeals has adopted the inevitable discovery doctrine in the search and seizure area [United States v. Kozak, 12 M.J. 389 (C.M.A. 1982)], but has never specifically applied it to confessions and evidence derived from them. But see United States v. Anderson, 21 M.J. 751 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) (nonverbal statement pointing out gun suppressed, but doctrine of inevitable discovery permitted admission of gun). The Supreme Court sanctioned the doctrine of inevitable discovery in Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984). Mil.R.Evid. 304(b)(2) incorporates Nix.

2. Inevitable discovery. The former military rule was to reject inevitable discovery (i.e., the government argument that it would have found the tainted evidence anyway) whenever an illegality has in fact been exploited. What has actually taken place is considered more important than what could have occurred. United States v. Peurifoy, 27 C.M.A. 157, 160, 48 C.M.R. 34 (1974). However, in United States v. Kozak, 12 M.J. 389 (C.M.A. 1982), the Court of Military Appeals rejected Peurifoy and adopted the "inevitable discovery" rule. See also Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984), in which the Supreme Court expressly adopted the inevitable discovery rule and United States v. Anderson, 21 M.J. 751 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) for application of the rule.

3. Attenuation. Attenuation (i.e., the lessening of the illegal taint through time or factual circumstances) may deprive an illegality of its derivative evidence effect, depending on the circumstances; A "but for" test is not applied. United States v. Wong Sun, 371 U.S. 471 (1963) (the test of excludability is not whether evidence would not have come to light but for illegal actions of police, but whether evidence was come at by exploitation of illegality rather than by means sufficiently distinguishable to be purged of primary taint); United States v. Collier, 1 M.J. 358 (C.M.A. 1976) (attenuation found; no exploitive link between unwarned interview of the accused and the surrendering of a rifle by the accused a few days later, where the rifle was not brought up at the interview and accused conceded he was not upset by the interview); United States v. Atkins, 26 C.M.A. 153, 46 C.M.R. 244 (1973) (attenuation rejected; seizure invalidated where unwarned questioning provided the probable cause basis to apprehend and led to a search incident to the apprehension). See also United States v. Butner, 15 M.J. 139 (C.M.A. 1983) (attenuation found: "cleansing warning," passage of time, and lack of confinement dissipated taint of earlier unlawfully obtained confession).

C. Impelled statements at trial. If a pretrial statement was improperly introduced into evidence, the court on appeal must test the judicial confession made by the accused at trial to determine if it was impelled by the erroneous admission of the pretrial statement. United States v. Bearchild, 17 C.M.A. 598, 38 C.M.R. 396 (1968). If the government's evidence will show that the in-court statement was not so impelled, the judicial confession will override the prejudice otherwise resulting from the improper admission of the pretrial statements. United States v. Hundley, 24 C.M.A. 538, 45 C.M.R. 94 (1972) (the evidence aside from improperly admitted pretrial statements, although extensive, was insufficient to convince beyond a reasonable doubt that the accused's decision to testify was influenced by the use of his pretrial statements; thus, his testimony did not cure the prejudice resulting from the use of the statements). See also United States v. DeWitt, 3 M.J. 455 (C.M.A. 1977) (Bearchild rule does not apply to cases where there is no primary illegality on the part of government investigators). The court in DeWitt rejected the accused's argument that an improperly admitted Army form used to establish the inception date of an unauthorized absence impelled his judicial confession); United States v. Carey, 23 C.M.A. 947, 43 C.M.R. 639 (1971) ("impelled" testimony instruction regarding accused's testimony held harmless error); United States v. Hurt, 19 C.M.A. 206, 41 C.M.R. 206 (1970) (dealing with instructions to members concerning the effect of in-court testimony if defense contests voluntariness of out-of-court statement).

1207      STANDING TO RAISE FIFTH AMENDMENT / ARTICLE 31 ISSUES AT TRIAL

— The general rule is that Fifth Amendment / article 31 rights are personal ones and that only the accused at trial may raise a self-incrimination or confession issue. Mil.R.Evid. 304(a). Thus, even if a co-accused makes an unwarned statement that the prosecution intends to use against the accused, the accused lacks standing to raise the issue of the accomplice's lack of warnings. One exception seems to exist, however. Where the statement to be offered is claimed to be involuntary in the traditional sense (e.g., coerced, and if so, its reliability would be suspect), a hearing may be held to determine the voluntariness of the statement. See LaFrance v. Bohlinger, 499 F.2d 29 (1st Cir. 1974) (use of statement allegedly obtained by police from a witness "strung out on drugs," by threats, for impeachment of the witness required voluntariness determination by trial judge). See also Meachum v. United States, 419 U.S. 1080 (1974). Even if LaFrance is adopted by the military, a mere failure to give article 31 or Miranda warnings would not be cognizable. See Comment, The Right of a Criminal Defendant to Object to Use of Testimony Coerced From a Witness, 57 Nw. U.L. Rev. 549 (1962); Note, 58 Geo. L.J. 621 (1970).

1208           ADMISSION AT TRIAL OF CONFESSIONS AND ADMISSIONS (Key Number 1116)

A.       General procedures

1.       Disclosure of statements to defense

a.       Mil.R.Evid. 304(d)(1) requires the prosecution to disclose to the defense, prior to arraignment, the contents of "all statements, oral or written, made by the accused that are relevant to the case, known to the trial counsel, and within the control of the armed forces." If disclosure is made after arraignment, timely notice must be given to the military judge and the defense. Failure to give the required notice will not automatically result in the government's loss of the use of the accused's statements. See United States v. Dancy, 38 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1993) (although trial counsel violated Mil.R. Evid. 304(d)(1) by not disclosing letter subsequently used to impeach to defense, the military judge fashioned appropriate remedy such that mistrial was not warranted); United States v. Williams, 20 M.J. 686 (A.C.M.R.), petition granted, 21 M.J. 103 (C.M.A. 1985) (statement admissible despite government's failure to disclose it prior to arraignment, where hearing was conducted to afford defense counsel opportunity to discover circumstances surrounding utterance of statement).

b.       The prosecution should also disclose any derivative evidence prior to arraignment.

2.       Raising confession and admission issues

a.       The burden rests on the defense to raise the question of admissibility through a motion to suppress prior to plea. Mil.R.Evid. 304 (d)(2)(A). United States v. Nakamura, 21 M.J. 741 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) (trial judge did not abuse his discretion in refusing to permit civilian counsel to raise confession issue after plea); United States v. Mortimer, 20 M.J. 964 (A.C.M.R. 1985) (accused who pled guilty and had notice of trial counsel's plan to introduce confession on sentencing phase, waived objection by not objecting prior to plea).

b.       Absent a pre-plea motion, the defense may not later raise the issue except as allowed by the military judge for good cause shown.

c. Failure to raise the issue waives it. Mil.R.Evid. 304(d)(2). See United States v. Miller, 31 M.J. 247 (C.M.A. 1990).

d. Specific objections may be required by the military judge in order to focus the litigation on specific points. Mil.R.Evid. 304(d)(3).

3. Litigating the issues. Mil.R.Evid. 304 contemplates a one-step procedure before the military judge alone who determines the issue of voluntariness. The question of admissibility will not be submitted to the court members. Mil.R.Evid. 304(d). See also Mil.R.Evid. 104(c). The defense may, however, present evidence to the court members to show that the statement should not be given great weight because it lacks credibility. Mil.R.Evid. 304(f). The accused may take the stand for the limited purpose of litigating the admissibility of his statements. Such testimony may not be used against the accused at trial, whether on the merits or for impeachment.

4. Burden of proof. Under Mil.R.Evid. 304(e), the prosecution has the burden of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that the statement is admissible. The burden extends only to the extent of the defense objection where a specific objection has been required under Mil.R.Evid. 304(d)(3). Derivative evidence is measured by the same standard. Mil.R.Evid. 304(e)(3).

5. Effect of a guilty plea. A guilty plea waives confession issues even if the matter has been litigated before plea. United States v. Dusenberry, 23 C.M.A. 287, 49 C.M.R. 536 (1975). See Mil.R.Evid. 304(d)(5) (guilty plea waives all self-incrimination issues and objections to statements); United States v. Mortimer, 20 M.J. 964 (A.C.M.R. 1985) (trial court did not abuse his discretion in denying defense motion to suppress confession where motion not made until confession offered during sentencing following accused's guilty plea).

6. Findings of fact. Where factual issues are involved, the military judge must state "essential findings of fact" on the record. Mil.R.Evid. 304(d)(4). See United States v. Postle, 20 M.J. 632 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985).

B. Proving voluntariness at trial. The prosecution has the burden of showing voluntariness. This generally means that the prosecution must show that the rights warnings were properly given (or were unnecessary), that a proper waiver was obtained, and that the statement was voluntary under the voluntariness doctrine.

1. Showing compliance with article 31 / Miranda

a. It is usually essential to call at least one witness to establish the rights warnings and waiver. The witness may testify purely by memory, or may utilize a rights warning card or a rights waiver certificate. If a document is used, the witness must

b. The prosecution will generally have its witness(es) testify concerning compliance with the warning requirements, obtaining a waiver from the accused or suspect, the method by which the statement was actually obtained and recorded, and other factors going to voluntariness. Cf. United States v. Annis, 5 M.J. 351 (C.M.A. 1978) (the only statement made by the interrogator at trial was that he read the accused his rights "off a card"; absent a contrary showing by defense challenge, regularity of exposition of article 31 warnings would be presumed). But see Tague v. Louisiana, 444 U.S. 469 (1980) (merely reading accused rights "off a card" will not establish accused understood and validly waived rights).

c. Rights warning cards may be used to refresh recollection and sometimes as a partial substitute for testimony similar to past recollection recorded. See United States v. Blake, 50 C.M.R. 603 (A.C.M.R. 1975) (allowing a witness' testimony that he had complied with rights warning "sheet" on his desk to substitute for affirmative testimony that the accused had been informed of the offense of which he was suspected). Is it enough for a prosecution witness to say, "I did everything the card said I had to do," or must he actually testify to what he did? Cf. United States v. Girard, 28 C.M.A. 152, 49 C.M.R. 438 (1975) (sufficient where interrogator testified he read the rights from a card); United States v. Annis, supra.

2. Complying with the voluntariness doctrine. Compliance with the voluntariness doctrine should necessitate counsel's showing the conditions of interrogation; length of detention; health and physical condition of the suspect at the time of interrogation; and the other factors discussed in § 1205, supra. Prosecutors should avoid leading questions, a particular problem in this area (i.e., make sure the witness knows what points you are trying to bring out).

C. Attacking voluntariness. The defense may, of course, call its own witnesses and present other affirmative evidence to establish involuntariness. However, in the usual case, the defense will choose to cross-examine prosecution witnesses. As the prosecution has the burden of proof, cross-examination can be highly effective. Cross-examination, however, can be incredibly damaging to the defense in this area. If the prosecution fails to establish an element of its proof (e.g., that the accused was informed of the offense of which he was suspected), cross-examination of the individual who took the statement may solicit the missing information. If the prosecution case appears perfect, there is no reason not to fish, and counsel may decide to try a few random probing questions.

1. In a joint trial of two or more defendants, an admission or confession by one is not admissible against the other defendants unless the co-defendants take the stand, absent other exceptions to the hearsay rule. To prevent prejudice to the other defendants named in the statement, all references to the co-accuseds must be removed from the statement before the court members see it. If this process (known as "redacting" a statement) is inadequate, trial of the co-accuseds must be severed. United States v. Bruton, 391 U.S. 123 (1968). See United States v. Pringle, 3 M.J. 308 (C.M.A. 1977) (speculation as to identity of redacted name was compulsively directed toward accused where other two co-defendants confessed and accused's name was "whited out" from redacted confessions). See also United States v. Green, 3 M.J. 320 (C.M.A. 1977) (direct, contextual, and even implied references should be eliminated).

2. Mil.R.Evid. 306 states that a statement of one of several co-accused may not be received into evidence "unless all references inculcating an accused against whom the statement is inadmissible are deleted effectively or the maker of the statement is subject to cross-examination." See also, United States v. Mayhugh, 44 M.J. 363 (C.A.A.F. 1996).

E. The silence of the accused

1. Pretrial silence. The prosecution may not show that the accused affirmatively exercised his rights against self-incrimination before trial. Mil.R.Evid. 301(f). See, e.g., United States v. Christian, 22 M.J. 519 (N.M.C.M.R. 1986) (error to allow government witness to testify accused invoked his right to silence and refused to sign chain of custody document). See also United States v. Velez, 22 M.J. 637 (A.C.M.R. 1986); United States v. Bridges, 499 F.2d 179 (7th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1010 (1974) (during a case for unlawfully possessing and using unregistered dynamite, a witness was improperly allowed to testify that upon surrender defendant refused to answer a question concerning his recent handling of explosives). The fact that the accused remained silent and failed to explain suspicious circumstances after receiving Miranda warnings cannot be shown in a court-martial. In United States v. Hale, 422 U.S. 171 (1975), the prosecutor, on cross-examination of the accused, was not permitted to impeach the credibility of an alibi by inquiring into the accused's silence at the police station. The court held that the trial court ruled correctly since silence is not inconsistent with a later claim of innocence. See also Doyle v. Ohio, 426 U.S. 610 (1976). In United States v. Noel, 3 M.J. 328 (C.M.A. 1977), the court held that, where the accused is entitled to rights warnings but does not receive them, his silence may not be used against him. However, in Jenkins v. Anderson, 447 U.S. 231 (1980), the Supreme Court held that Hale and Doyle do not prohibit the use of pre-arrest silence to impeach a defendant's credibility. See also Fletcher v. Weir, 455 U.S. 603 (1982), where the Supreme Court allowed the prosecution to use post-arrest, pre-warnings silence to impeach.

The existence of article 31 in the military will reduce the occasions where Jenkins and Fletcher might be applied. It is permissible to impeach an accused's credibility by showing that he gave evasive answers to questions after being given full warnings, as opposed to remaining silent. United States v. Philpot, 10 M.J. 230 (C.M.A. 1981). Impeachment by showing recent fabrication as opposed to invocation of the right to remain silent is also proper cross-examination. United States v. Garcia, 18 M.J. 716 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984). No comment may be made upon the accused's silence at trial. See, e.g., United States v.

Albrecht, 4 M.J. 573 (A.C.M.R. 1977), petition denied, 5 M.J. 300 (C.M.A. 1978) (trial counsel's comment upon accused's silence during sentencing argument was error, but harmless in this case); United States v. Howell, 18 M.J. 573 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984) (reversible error where government witness commented on accused's election to remain silent notwithstanding absence of defense objection). See also Mil.R. Evid. 304(h)(3), which provides that failure to deny an accusation may not be used to support an inference that the accused has admitted the accusation, where the accused is in confinement, arrest, or custody, or otherwise under official investigation. Silence when confronted with accusations by a private party, however, may constitute an admission by silence. See United States v. Cain, 5 M.J. 844 (A.C.M.R. 1978); United States v. Wynn, 23 M.J. 1726 (A.F.C.M.R. 1986) [base exchange store detective was a private party; therefore, testimony that accused remained silent when confronted with incident was not precluded by Mil.R.Evid. 304(h)(3)].

2. Request for counsel. It is also error to draw to the attention of the triers of fact that the accused, upon being questioned prior to trial, requested counsel. United States v. Ross, 7 M.J. 174 (C.M.A. 1979) (nonprejudicial error); United States v. Moore, 1 M.J. 390 (C.M.A. 1976) (no specific evidence of prejudice need be found for constitutional error to compel reversal; such error is not harmless unless the reviewing court can affirmatively find beyond a reasonable doubt that error might not have contributed to accused's conviction); United States v. Williamson, 2 M.J. 597 (N.C.M.R. 1976).

3. Silence at trial. If the accused chooses not to testify at trial, the defense may be entitled to an instruction directing the court members not to draw a negative inference from his silence (the actual effect of this instruction is unknown, and it may well be that it is more prejudicial than ignoring the point altogether). Cf. Lakeside v. Oregon, 435 U.S. 333 (1978) (judge may instruct jury not to hold accused's silence against him over defense objection). Mil.R.Evid. 301(g) allows the defense to request such an instruction, or that such an instruction not be given. The judge may nonetheless instruct the court on the accused's silence as "justice" requires.

F. Completing statements offered by the prosecution. If only part of an admission or confession is shown by the prosecution, the defense may by cross-examination or otherwise introduce the rest of the confession or statements explanatory of that part. Mil.R.Evid. 304(h)(2). See United States v. Speer, 2 M.J. 1244 (A.F.C.M.R. 1976).

G. Instructions. The military judge is required to instruct the members to give a confession or admission by the accused whatever weight they feel it deserves under all the circumstances of the case. Mil.R.Evid. 304(e)(2).

1209 CORROBORATION (Key Numbers 1115 - 1118)

A. Generally. Corroboration is needed before a pretrial confession or admission may be received in evidence at trial. United States v. Robinson, 21 M.J. 937 (A.F.C.M.R.

1986), aff'd, 26 M.J. 361 (C.M.A. 1988) (sufficient corroboration); United States v. Poduszcak, 20 M.J. 627 (A.C.M.R. 1985) (insufficient corroboration); see also United States v. Nakamura, 21 M.J. 741 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) (accused waived corroboration of the confession by raising the issue for the first time on a motion for a finding of not guilty after the confession had been admitted; but accused's guilt was not established beyond a reasonable doubt). Corroboration in the military is defined as independent evidence of the essential facts related within the corroborated statement. Mil.R.Evid. 304(g). This rule differs from that in use in many civilian jurisdictions inasmuch as it relates to admissions as well as to confessions and is concerned primarily with the truthfulness of the statement, rather than going to show, via independent evidence, that the offense in question took place (corpus delicti). Insofar as the latter is concerned, there is little practical difference in the proof used to show that an offense actually occurred and that normally offered to establish the accuracy of a statement. However, in United States v. Loewen, 14 M.J. 784 (A.C.M.R. 1982), the court indicated that the military corroboration requirement may place a greater burden on the prosecution than the corpus delicti rule because, in some cases the former requires corroboration of the identity of the accused as well as the essential facts. See also United States v. Yates, 24 M.J. 114 (C.M.A. 1987) (although corroboration is necessary for all elements of an offense established by admissions alone, it is sufficient for the independent evidence to bolster the confession itself to prove the offense through the statements of the accused).

1. Although corroboration is needed before a statement may finally be admitted, a statement may be admitted subject to a later showing of corroboration. See Mil.R.Evid. 304(g)(2). In practice, this frequently seems to take place without any formal acknowledgement except in cases resting purely on confession evidence. Defense counsel should normally object to an incriminating statement unless corroborating evidence is first introduced. If the statement is accepted with corroboration being postponed, defense counsel should be alert to a renewal of the objection if the prosecution fails to meet the requirement by the end of its case-in-chief. Inasmuch as the military requirement goes to admissions as well as confessions, the corroboration requirement could represent at least a tactical problem for the prosecution.

2. Corroboration is not required for a statement made prior to or in the course of an offense, nor for statements made in court (termed "judicial confessions"). Mil.R.Evid. 304(g). See United States v. Baker, 2 M.J. 360 (A.F.C.M.R.), aff'd, 4 M.J. 89 (C.M.A. 1977); United States v. Crayton, 17 M.J. 932 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 19 M.J. 57 (C.M.A. 1984). Further corroboration is not needed if the statement in question is admissible under a different hearsay exception. Mil.R.Evid. 304(g).

B. Quantum of proof needed (Key Number 1117). Mil.R.Evid. 304(g)(1) provides that independent evidence, whether direct or circumstantial, need not be sufficient to prove the truth of the essential facts beyond a reasonable doubt although, if the confession is the only other evidence, the evidence taken together with the confession must establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Only an "inference of truth" is needed. United States v. Maio, 34 M.J. 215 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 196 (1992). United States v. Melvin, 26 M.J.

145 (C.M.A. 1988). See also United States v. Rounds, 30 M.J. 76 (C.M.A. 1990).

C. Type of proof needed for corroboration (Key Number 1115)

1. Corroborating proof may include types of evidence normally inadmissible. See United States v. Stricklin, 23 C.M.A. 728, 44 C.M.R. 39 (1971) (evidence that B possessed and sold marijuana aboard ship is sufficient corroboration for accused's confession to possession and sale where accused confessed he sold the marijuana to B and the details of the possession matched). See also United States v. Wong Sun, 371 U.S. 471 (1963); United States v. Springer, 5 M.J. 590 (A.F.C.M.R. 1978) (stipulations of fact or expected testimony may serve as corroboration); United States v. Duvall, 44 M.J. 501 (A.F. Ct. Crim. App.), petition filed, 44 M.J. 269 (1996). (holding that corroborating evidence need not be admissible).

2. Under Mil.R.Evid. 304(g), either direct or circumstantial evidence may be used.

D. Procedure to determine existence of corroboration

The military judge alone decides whether the statement has been corroborated. Mil.R.Evid. 304(g)(2). This changes prior military practice which had required instructions to the court where the defense so requests and the evidence was substantially conflicting, self-contradictory, uncertain, or improbable and court members made an independent evaluation of whether there had been sufficient corroboration. Under current practice, the amount and type of corroboration is a factor to be considered in determining how much weight should be given to the statement.

SEARCH AND SEIZURE

FOURTH AMENDMENT

The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

U.S. Const. amend IV.

1301 INTRODUCTION

A. History

1. The Fourth Amendment was included in the Bill of Rights largely as a response to abuses that occurred under general warrants or writs of assistance in colonial times. Such writs were used in several ways, but most notable was their use by customs officials to enforce what the colonists felt were unjust importation laws. The writs were, in effect, a blank check authorizing officials to rummage through people's homes and belongings to secure any evidence they might find.

2. The Fourth Amendment received relatively little judicial attention or development until the 20th century. See generally Nelson B. Lasson, The History and Development of the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution (1937). The 20th century search and seizure law has mushroomed; this expansion has been driven largely by two factors:

a. The use of the exclusionary rule (an evidentiary rule) as the primary sanction with which to enforce the Fourth Amendment, which has rendered the amendment a critical rule in criminal procedure; and

b. the extension of, and heightened interest in, enforcement of laws against possession of contraband substances; e.g., liquor in the 1920's and 30's, and narcotics ever since, which has resulted in a high number of cases in which searches and seizures are involved.

B. Policy behind the Fourth Amendment

1. Originally, the Fourth Amendment's protections were linked directly to property interests. Thus, a violation occurred only where the government committed some type of trespass into a "protected area." See, e.g., Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438 (1928).

2. More recently, the focus of the amendment has shifted to protection of personal privacy.

a. In Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), the Supreme Court held that evidence of conversations overheard by FBI agents, who placed an electronic listening device on the outside of a telephone booth used by Katz, was inadmissible because seizure of the conversation was illegal. Specifically rejecting a "protected area" or trespass theory, the Court said that the Fourth Amendment may apply even where no such physical intrusion occurs. The following quotations illustrate the Court's analysis in Katz:

(1) "For the Fourth Amendment protects people, not places. What a person knowingly exposes to the public, even in his own home or office, is not a subject of Fourth Amendment protection. But what he seeks to preserve as private, even in an area accessible to the public, may be constitutionally protected." 389 U.S. at 354 (citations omitted); and

(2) "The Government's activities in electronically listening to and recording the petitioner's words violated the privacy upon which he justifiably relied while using the telephone booth and thus constituted a 'search and seizure' within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment." Id.

b. Justice Harlan, concurring in Katz, attempted to define the majority's test more precisely: "there is a two-fold requirement, first that a person have exhibited an actual (subjective) expectation of privacy, and, second, that the expectation be one that society is prepared to recognize as reasonable." 389 U.S. at 361. This formula has been reduced to the so-called "reasonable expectation of privacy" test. This template is commonly applied by courts to determine whether the Fourth Amendment applies to a given governmental activity. Also note that the test may dictate the extent of Fourth Amendment protections under some circumstances. See, e.g., United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1 (1977); Cady v. Dombrowski, 413 U.S. 433 (1973).

c. The reasonable expectation of privacy test is analytically incomplete, however, for several reasons.

(1) "Privacy" is an imprecise concept incapable of an exhaustive definition. Moreover, the Fourth Amendment protects only certain aspects of privacy. What those aspects are is not entirely clear, nor does the amendment protect only privacy. As the majority said in Katz:

[T]he Fourth Amendment cannot be translated into a general constitutional "right to privacy." That Amendment protects individual privacy against certain kinds of governmental intrusion, but its protections go further, and often have nothing to do with privacy at all. Other provisions of the Constitution protect personal privacy from other forms of governmental invasion. But the protection of a person's general right to privacy—his right to be let alone by other people—is, like the protection of his property and of his very life, left largely to the law of the individual states.

(2) Making the subjective expectations of a given individual a necessary condition for Fourth Amendment protections to arise is somewhat circular. The real question is not whether a given individual thought he / she was protected, but whether as a society we want to recognize a protection against given governmental activity. While traditional expectations may be a factor in this determination, to what extent should they be controlling? Justice Harlan, who originated the "reasonable expectation of privacy test," later recognized its shortcomings in his dissent in United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745 (1971):

The analysis must, in my view, transcend the search for subjective expectations or legal attributions of assumptions of risk. Our expectations, and the risks we assume, are in large part reflections of laws that translate into rules the customs and values of the past and present.

Since it is the task of the law to form and project, as well as to mirror and reflect, we should not, as judges, merely recite the expectations and risks without examining the desirability of saddling them upon society.

401 U.S. at 786. See also Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979).

d. Despite its analytical shortcomings, the reasonable expectation of privacy test continues as a thumbnail description of the analysis that courts use in determining whether the Fourth Amendment applies to a given governmental activity.

3. Thus, as a general proposition, the Fourth Amendment protects against a broad (and ill-defined) range of governmental actions that intrude upon our private lives.

C. Application to the military

1. Application of the Bill of Rights generally

a. "[I]t is apparent that protections in the Bill of Rights, except those which are expressly or by necessary implication inapplicable, are available to members of our armed forces." United States v. Jacoby, 11 C.M.A. 428, 29 C.M.R. 244, 246-47 (1960).

b. Supreme Court treatment

(1) See generally Middendorf v. Henry, 425 U.S. 25 (1976); Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733 (1974); O'Callahan v. Parker, 395 U.S. 258 (1969); Burns v. Wilson, 346 U.S. 137 (1953).

(2) Several Supreme Court decisions indicate that the Court recognizes that substantial historical, structural, and social differences in the military society permit the elimination or relaxation of significant constitutional protections. See Parker v. Levy, supra; Middendorf v. Henry, supra; Schlesinger v. Councilman, 420 U.S. 738 (1975).

c. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces continues to apply tacitly a presumption that constitutional protections apply in the military system just as they do in civilian society.

(1) "The burden of showing that military conditions require a different rule than that prevailing in the civilian community is upon the party arguing for a different rule." Courtney v. Williams, 1 M.J. 267, 270 (C.M.A. 1976).

(2) See also United States v. Rexroat, 38 M.J. 292, 295 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 1296 (1994); United States v. Graf, 35 M.J. 450, 460 (C.M.A. 1992), cert. denied, 114 S. Ct. 917 (1994).

2. Application of Fourth Amendment protections to members of the military

a. Mode of application

(1) The Uniform Code of Military Justice is silent as to searches and seizures or the admission of illegally seized evidence in courts-martial. But see articles 7-13, UCMJ, which deal with seizure and detention of the person before trial. These become relevant to the evidentiary considerations in the areas of stop and frisk and search incident to apprehension. See United States v. Hessler, 4 M.J. 303, 307 (C.M.A. 1978) (Fletcher, C.J., concurring in the result).

(2) Therefore, the law of search and seizure in the military has generally been drawn from decisions of the Supreme Court and other judicial interpretations of the Fourth Amendment.

(3) Direct sources of military law of search and seizure:

(a) Decisions of the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces and the Courts of Criminal Appeals;

(b) Military Rules of Evidence 311-317 [hereinafter Mil.R.Evid.];

(c) service and local regulations; and

(d) tradition. See United States v. Florence, 1 C.M.A. 620, 5 C.M.R. 48 (1952).

(4) See generally Fredric I. Lederer & Frederic L. Borch, Does the Fourth Amendment Apply to the Armed Forces?, 144 Mil. L. Rev. 110 (1994).

b. The exclusionary rule

(1) The exclusionary rule has been applied in courts-martial at least since 1922. See J. Munster and M. Larkin, Military Evidence 9.1a n.2 (2d ed. 1978).

(2) The Military Rules of Evidence apply the exclusionary rule today.

(a) As a rule of evidence, Mil.R.Evid. 311 prohibits the admission of illegally obtained evidence and appears to be within the President's authority under Article 36, UCMJ.

(b) Mil.R.Evid. 312-317 discuss various types of "lawful" searches and seizures. These provisions are generally descriptive as opposed to merely prescriptive. See United States v. Frederick, 3 M.J. 230 (C.M.A. 1977); United States v. Heard, 3 M.J. 14, 20 n.12 (C.M.A. 1977).

(3) Judicial decisions may also affect the scope of the exclusionary rule's application. See, e.g., United States v. Jordan, 1 M.J. 334 (C.M.A. 1976); United States v. Thomas, 1 M.J. 397, 402 (C.M.A. 1976) (Fletcher, C.J., concurring in the result).

(4) The violation of a military regulation by government agents may trigger application of the exclusionary rule where the underlying purpose of the regulation is the protection of personal liberties or interests. Compare United States v. Dillard, 8 M.J. 213 (C.M.A. 1980) with United States v. Caceres, 440 U.S. 741 (1979) and United States v. Holsworth, 7 M.J. 184 (C.M.A. 1979); United States v. McGraner, 13 M.J. 408 (C.M.A. 1982) and United States v. Foust, 17 M.J. 85 (C.M.A. 1983). See also United States v. Hilbert, 22 M.J. 526 (N.M.C.M.R. 1986) (OPNAVINST 5350.4 requirement for second-echelon approval of certain urine sample collections was not designed to protect individual rights, and its violation did not invoke exclusionary rule, citing Caceres); United States v. Moreno, 23 M.J. 622 (A.F.C.M.R. 1986) (under Right to Financial Privacy Act, base CO should not have authorized search of records at base credit union, but application of exclusionary rule not required especially since statute includes exclusive judicial remedy).

(5) The exclusionary rule is not a tool by which courts may exercise overall control over governmental search and seizure activities. In United States v. Payner, 447 U.S. 727 (1980), the Supreme Court refused to sanction the use of the rule as an adjunct to the supervisory power of the Federal courts. The trial court had applied the rule, although there was a lack of standing on the part of the defendant, where government agents had deliberately violated the constitutional rights of a third party in order to acquire evidence against the accused.

(6) Even where evidence is derived through a faulty search, the evidence may still be admissible under the good faith exception to the exclusionary rule. Mil.R.Evid. 311(b)(3). The good faith exception applies to searches authorized by neutral and detached commanding officers. United States v. Lopez, 35 M.J. 35 (C.M.A. 1992).

c. Substantive scope of Fourth Amendment protections of servicemembers

(1) Much of the remainder of this chapter is concerned with the applicability of the Fourth Amendment in the military context.

(2) The following general observations may be made.

(a) As a general rule, the principles applicable to the law of search and seizure in the civilian sphere also hold true in the military.

(b) The primary differences stem from the hierarchical, authoritarian structure in the military, the need for discipline in the military, and the need for combat readiness. See generally Murray v. Haldeman, 16 M.J. 74 (C.M.A. 1983); United States v. Hessler, 4 M.J. 303 (C.M.A. 1978), aff'd on reconsideration, 7 M.J. 9 (C.M.A. 1979).

-1- Thus, traditionally, the commanding officer of a military organization has had broad authority to examine persons and property within his / her organization for a variety of reasons.

-a- Such reasons may or may not include enforcement of the law in the normal sense.

-b- Whatever the reason, such examinations do involve intrusions into areas in which, in another setting, an individual would have a privacy interest of the type protected by the Fourth Amendment.

-2- Law enforcement responsibility extends to a broad portion of the military society, i.e., military police are not the only ones charged with enforcing the law. Officers, noncommissioned officers, and petty officers, as well as others, share such responsibilities. This brings the Fourth Amendment into issue in a wider range of activities.

1302      FRAMEWORK FOR ANALYSIS OF FOURTH AMENDMENT QUESTIONS

A.    Effect upon admissibility. A suggested methodology to follow in assessing the Fourth Amendment's effect upon the admissibility of a given piece of evidence is set forth below.

1.    Does the Fourth Amendment apply to the means by which the evidence was obtained? That is:

- a.    Was there a quest for evidence of a crime;
- b.    was the government involved in obtaining the evidence; and
- c.    was there an intrusion into an area in which an individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy.

2.    Even if the Fourth Amendment applies, and regardless of whether there was compliance with it, was the accused protected by it, or is there some reason why the exclusionary rule should not be invoked? That is:

a.    Did this accused have a personal, legally protected interest which was violated, i.e., did he or she have standing to contest the admissibility of the evidence;

b.    was there a waiver of the Fourth Amendment's protections by someone legitimately capable of doing so?

3.    Were the substantive requirements of the Fourth Amendment adhered to?

a.    Was the evidence lawfully seized pursuant to the execution of a lawfully issued search warrant or its military equivalent, the "search authorization";

b.    if not, can the search or seizure be justified under one of the "few and specifically limited exceptions," i.e., was the search or seizure "reasonable"?

c.    if not, does the good faith exception apply?

B.    Basic framework. The law of the Fourth Amendment is best understood by keeping in mind this basic framework. While the law of search and seizure is honeycombed with exceptions to these fundamental principles, one must maintain some structural overview to avoid falling into the chaos of a totally ad hoc analysis.

1303            APPLICABILITY OF THE FOURTH AMENDMENT TO THE ACTIVITY (Key Number 1047)

A.        *Quest for Evidence

1.        Because the purpose of the original writs of assistance and general warrants, against which the Fourth Amendment was primarily aimed, was the seizure of contraband and the prosecution of offenders, See Murray v. Hoboken Land Co., 59 U.S. (18 How.) 272 (1856), and because of the exclusionary rule's relation to criminal proceedings, the term "search" has frequently been limited to describing quests for evidence for use in a prosecution. Thus, in this narrow sense, a distinction may be drawn between an "inspection" (i.e., an intrusion for administrative purposes) and a "search" (i.e., an intrusion for the purposes of finding evidence for a prosecution).

2.        Nevertheless, the Fourth Amendment also prohibits unreasonable intrusions by government agencies that do not directly involve or contemplate criminal prosecutions. See Camara v. Municipal Court, 387 U.S. 523 (1967). Therefore, under this broader definition, any intrusion into an individual's privacy may be a search, regardless of whether its purpose is prosecutorial or not (i.e., an inspection may be a form of search, which must be reasonable under the Fourth Amendment).

B.        *Government agents

1.        Generally. As a restraint on governmental authority, the Fourth Amendment protects individuals from unreasonable searches and seizures by government agents. The Fourth Amendment does not apply to searches by private parties or foreign officials. Sometimes, however, the line between who is a government agent, or who is acting in behalf of the government, is difficult to determine.

2.        *Foreign searches

a.        Mil.R.Evid. 311(c) governs the admissibility of evidence seized during a search conducted by foreign officials. Under Mil.R.Evid. 311(c):

(1)       Mere presence of U.S. officials will not alter the foreign character of the search;

(2)       compliance with local (foreign) law is not mandated for the fruits of a foreign search to be admissible; but

(3)       the foreign authorities must not have subjected the accused to gross and brutal maltreatment.

b. Consequently, absent proof that U.S. government officials initiated or actively participated in the foreign search, U.S. constitutional standards are irrelevant to the issue of the admissibility of any seized items. See, e.g., United States v. Holland, 18 M.J. 566 (A.C.M.R. 1984) (characterization of search as "foreign" inappropriate where military personnel initiated the action by German police).

3. Searches by private individuals. "Private capacity" searches are not covered by the Fourth Amendment as long as the individual conducting the search was acting in a purely private capacity. See Mil.R.Evid. 311(a). See the cases listed below for illustrations.

a. Burdeau v. McDowell, 256 U.S. 465 (1921) (Fourth Amendment not violated by seizures of private papers by a private corporation from the defendant, a director of the corporation).

b. United States v. Carter, 15 C.M.A. 495, 35 C.M.R. 467 (1969) (search of accused's wall locker and person by fellow soldier ("Slammer Dorsey") who lived in same barracks upheld, even where soldier employed threats and physical violence prior to and during search).

c. United States v. Hodges, 27 M.J. 754 (A.F.C.M.R. 1988), petition denied, 28 M.J. 235 (C.M.A. 1989) (opening of package addressed to accused by private freight carrier employee who then notified state law enforcement authorities that package contained suspected controlled substance did not violate accused's Fourth Amendment rights).

d. United States v. Clow, 26 M.J. 176 (C.M.A. 1988) (estranged husband's entry into the accused's apartment and his seizure of stolen videotapes was not a government search covered by the Fourth Amendment. When the husband gave CID access to the apartment for a subsequent search, however, the Fourth Amendment did apply).

e. United States v. Jacobs, 31 M.J. 138 (C.M.A. 1990), cert. denied, 498 U.S. 1088 (1991) (accused's flight chief was acting as a government agent when he entered the accused's apartment at invitation of the landlord in order to inspect damage).

C. Area in which an individual has a reasonable expectation of privacy.

1. See generally Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967). See also United States v. Bailey, 3 M.J. 799 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 4 M.J. 149 (C.M.A. 1977) (accused had no reasonable expectation of freedom from governmental intrusion in a latrine of a barracks); United States v. Olmstead, 17 M.J. 247 (C.M.A. 1984) (accused retained no reasonable expectation of privacy in vehicle demolished in accident).

2. Not all such intrusions are in an area where a suspect has a reasonable expectation of privacy. The following cases illustrate the point.

a. Hoffa v. United States, 385 U.S. 293 (1966) (act of friend, who was also government agent, entering Hoffa's apartment at Hoffa's invitation and overhearing incriminating conversations in his presence, held not to be a search). See also United States v. White, 401 U.S. 745 (1971); United States v. Turck, 49 C.M.R. 49 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974).

b. United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973); United States v. Mara, 410 U.S. 19 (1973) (grand jury subpoena for purpose of taking voice and handwriting exemplars not covered by Fourth Amendment).

c. United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976) (individual depositor has no protected Fourth Amendment interest in records of his banking transactions maintained by bank). But see Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978, 12 U.S.C. § 3401 (1994).

d. Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979) (use of pen register did not violate Fourth Amendment).

e. See United States v. Holmes, 537 F.2d 227 (5th Cir. 1976) (en banc, equally divided court) (attaching beeper to car for purpose of surveillance did not violate Fourth Amendment).

f. In United States v. Lewis, 11 M.J. 188 (C.M.A. 1981) and United States v. Cunningham, 11 M.J. 242 (C.M.A. 1981), the court held that local command regulations forbidding the locking of doors of individuals' rooms were based on legitimate grounds and thus reduced any reasonable expectation of privacy therein.

g. United States v. Maxwell, 45 M.J. 406 (1996) (Sender of an E-mail message has a reasonable expectation of privacy against the message being intercepted.) Analogize E-mail to telephone conversations, the court also cited other provisions of federal law requiring a search warrant).

3. Open fields doctrine. Mil.R.Evid. 314(j). By its terms, the Fourth Amendment protects persons, houses, papers, and effects. It does not include open fields. See Hester v. United States, 265 U.S. 57 (1924). This is true even in light of the more modern reasonable expectation of privacy doctrine. See Air Pollution Variance Board v. Western Alfalfa Corp. 416 U.S. 861 (1974). The open fields doctrine was reaffirmed in Oliver v. United States, 466 U.S. 170 (1984), where the Court held that the Constitution does not generally protect against an invasion of one's privacy in fields, except in the area immediately surrounding the home, even though the government intrusion may be a common law violation. A no-trespass sign and a fence do not create a reasonable expectation of privacy within the meaning of the Fourth Amendment.

4. Curtilage concept. A barn, used as a drug manufacturing laboratory, was not within the curtilage (regardless, authorities shined a flashlight into the barn from an open field). United States v. Dunn, 480 U.S. 294 (1987), also discussed the curtilage concept. See also United States v. Burnside, 15 C.M.A. 326, 35 C.M.R. 298 (1965); California v. Ciraolo, 476 U.S. 207 (1986) (no reasonable expectation of privacy from aerial surveillance of curtilage). United States v. Dufour, 43 M.J. 772 (N.M.C.M.R. 1995) ("creeping" to within two feet of a window in a Government Quarters residence was an unreasonable intrusion).

1304 PROBABLE CAUSE (Key Numbers 1069, 1072, 1073)

A. Definition of Probable Cause: A reasonable belief that a crime has been committed and that evidence of that crime will be found on the person or place to be searched. Mil.R.Evid. 315(f).

B. Factual Basis and Reliability: Generally probable cause must have a factual basis plus reliability. Until 1984, Mil.R.Evid. 315(f)(2) followed the prevailing Federal rule that required the magistrate to inquire into the informant's basis of knowledge and believability. This "two-prong" test was taken from Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964) and Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969). Most appellate courts felt that each prong of the test had to be satisfied before a magistrate could conclude that probable cause to search existed. In Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983), however, the Supreme Court rejected the notion that rigid compliance with both parts of the Aguilar-Spinelli test is required. Instead, the court fashioned a totality of circumstances test to determine the existence of probable cause. The question for the authorizing official is simply whether there is a "fair probability" that the evidence sought will be found in the place to be searched. Although the informant's basis of knowledge and believability are still extremely important factors, reviewing courts need not strictly rely on the Aguilar-Spinelli test so long as the authorizing official had a "substantial basis" for determining that probable cause existed.

The totality of the circumstances test enunciated in Illinois v. Gates was endorsed by the Court of Military Appeals in United States v. Tipton, 16 M.J. 283 (C.M.A.

1983) and formed the basis for a 1984 amendment to Mil.R.Evid 315 (f)(2) deleting the Aguilar-Spinelli standard. Although the two prongs of this standard are no longer independent requirements, they continue to provide a useful structure for determining whether probable cause exists.

1. Factual Basis How does the source know? How did the source come by the information? The authorizing official must have a primary source of information and not just rumor or speculation. In addition, the basis of knowledge test requires that facts observed, not simply conclusions drawn, be related to the authorizing official. See United States v. Lidle, 21 C.M.A. 455, 45 C.M.R. 229 (1972); United States v. Garcia, 3 M.J. 927 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 4 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1977). There are several ways to satisfy the basis of knowledge test (e.g., direct observation, self-verifying detail, and informant's receipt of reliable information).

a. Direct observation. The informant has personally observed the facts reported. Note that the conclusions reported by the informant must be supported (at least by inference) by the facts the informant observed. Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969); United States v. Scarborough, 23 C.M.A. 51, 48 C.M.R. 522 (1974). See United States v. Karathanos, 531 F.2d 26 (2d Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 428 U.S. 910 (1976) (statement by informant that illegal aliens were being harbored on accused's premises was insufficient to establish probable cause where there was no showing how the informant knew that the foreigners he had observed there were illegally in the country). But cf. United States v. Weekley, 3 M.J. 1065 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977) (reasonable to infer that demonstrably reliable informant could recognize marijuana).

b. Self-verifying detail. It may be that a tip by an informant is so detailed that a magistrate can conclude that the informant must have first-hand information in order to provide such detail. Detail alone is to be distinguished from corroboration; with corroboration, some details provided by the informant are known to be true. While detail alone is a poor method of establishing an informant's basis of knowledge, it may be enough in some circumstances to establish a valid basis of knowledge. See Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969), Draper v. United States, 358 U.S. 307, 79 S.Ct. 329 (1959), United States v. Marihart, 472 F.2d 809, 813 (8th Cir. 1972), and United States v. Gamboa, 23 C.M.A. 83, 48 C.M.R. 591 (1974) (indicates detailed information must be independently verified).

2. Reliability (believability): Where the authorizing official receives the information from someone else, the official must assess the person's credibility and source of information. This is especially important in the military setting in which a commander receives information not from a law enforcement official (as is typically the case where a civilian magistrate receives information from a police officer), but directly from an informant. Why should the source be believed? Is the source a credible person, or are there other reasons why the information should be deemed reliable? See United States v. Llano, 23

C.M.A. 129, 48 C.M.R. 690 (1974); United States v. Davenport, 14 C.M.A. 152, 33 C.M.R. 364 (1963); United States v. Burden, 5 M.J. 704 (A.F.C.M.R. 1978), aff'd in summary disposition, 11 M.J. 151 (C.M.A. 1981).

a. "Track record." Has the informant provided accurate information on previous occasions?

(1) It may be sufficient to say that the informant has given information that proved reliable on a number of occasions in the past. See United States v. Guerette, 23 C.M.A. 281, 49 C.M.R. 530 (1975). See also United States v. Williams, 2 M.J. 81, 83 (C.M.A. 1976) (Cook, J., dissenting). See United States v. Scarborough, 23 C.M.A. 51, 48 C.M.R. 522 (1974).

(2) The preferable practice would be to identify the specific character and frequency of the information. Where possible, the commander should also know whether the informant's information has resulted in convictions, why the informant agreed to assist the government, whether the informant is being paid for the assistance, etc.

b. Declaration against interest. A statement against the informant's interest may indicate that the information is reliable. Such statements should be carefully scrutinized. Consider the following illustrative cases.

(1) United States v. Harris, 403 U.S. 573 (1971). The informant made a statement against his own penal interest when he admitted his illicit liquor purchases from a particular residence which was the subject of a search authorization request.

(2) United States v. Clifford, 19 C.M.A. 391, 41 C.M.R. 391 (1970). Although the informants revealed their prior illegal activities with the accused, there was insufficient information given by them to link the accused with criminal activity at the scene of the search.

(3) United States v. Goldman, 18 C.M.A. 389, 40 C.M.R. 101 (1969). One informant admitted being engaged in counterfeit activities as a criminal associate of the accused.

c. Person not from criminal milieu. Often the informant's background renders him or her credible, so that the information can be relied upon. Note that the information about the informant must be known to the authorizing official.

d. Victim-bystander. A victim or a bystander may be presumed reliable in the absence of other facts. (The definition of a bystander must be construed rather narrowly.)

(1) United States v. Land, 10 M.J. 103 (C.M.A. 1980), provides strong dicta to the effect that a "citizen informant" is presumptively reliable. It is not clear under the facts of the case whether the appellant's roommate came within the umbrella of this characterization, although for varying reasons the judges of the court found him to provide reliable information.

(2) United States v. Hood, 7 M.J. 128, 129 n.1 (C.M.A. 1979) (affirmative showing is necessary to support the proposition that informant is acting as concerned citizen and not involved in criminality).

(3) United States v. Gutierrez, 3 M.J. 796 (A.C.M.R. 1977) (good citizen eyewitness report to crime in progress is reliable).

(4) United States v. Watford, 14 M.J. 719 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 15 M.J. 171 (C.M.A. 1983) (OSI agent's affidavit sufficient to establish probable cause where based upon information from an eyewitness but no information given as to eyewitness' reliability).

(5) United States v. Tipton, 16 M.J. 283 (C.M.A. 1983) (identified servicemember's "accountability" was sufficient to overcome his lack of proven reliability).

e. Law enforcement officials

(1) United States v. Ventresca, 380 U.S. 102 (1965) (law enforcement official presumed reliable).

(2) Military courts generally have avoided saying that law enforcement officials may be presumed reliable. But see United States v. Gutierrez, 3 M.J. 796 (A.C.M.R. 1977) (police need not independently verify probable cause prior to acting on the direction of or as a result of communication with another police official).

(3) Information transmitted through law enforcement channels is presumed to be reliably transmitted. See Whitley v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560 (1971) and United States v. Herberg, 15 C.M.A. 247, 35 C.M.R. 219 (1965).

f. Officers and noncommissioned officers. United States v. Smallwood, 22 C.M.A. 40, 46 C.M.R. 40 (1972) (under the circumstances, an officer was properly deemed to be reliable).

g. Anonymous informant. Generally speaking, a "tip" from an anonymous informant will not be adequate to establish probable cause. Even after Illinois v.

Gates, it appears that an effort must be made to corroborate all or part of the tip before the commander may conclude that probable cause to search has been established. See Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983) and Draper v. United States, 358 U.S. 307 (1959).

h. Informant known to authorizing official. Where the authorizing official has personal knowledge about the informant, the official may use that information in assessing the reliability of the informant's information. See Mil.R.Evid. 315(f)(2). See United States v. Miller, 21 C.M.A. 92, 44 C.M.R. 146 (1971), United States v. Weekley, 3 M.J. 1065 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977), and United States v. Hernandez-Florez, 50 C.M.R. 243 (A.C.M.R. 1975).

i. Military record. The authorizing official may consider the informant's military record in assessing credibility. A good military record may suffice to establish the informant's reliability. See United States v. Salatino, 22 C.M.A. 530, 48 C.M.R. 15 (1973) and United States v. Morales, 49 C.M.R. 458 (A.C.M.R. 1974), rev'd on other grounds, 1 M.J. 647 (C.M.A. 1975).

j. Presence before CO. The informant's presence at the scene may tend to bolster credibility. United States v. Buchanan, 49 C.M.R. 620 (A.C.M.R. 1974). Where the informant's credibility is shaky or unknown, the informant's personal appearance, under oath, before the authorizing official may sufficiently establish the informant's credibility. See United States v. Stuckey, 10 M.J. 347 (C.M.A. 1981).

k. Interlocking Details. Where information provided by two informants would have been individually insufficient to establish probable cause, the interlocking of details in the two accounts may reduce the likelihood that each was simply surveying unreliable gossip and may establish probable cause. United States v. Barton, 11 M.J. 230 (C.M.A. 1981).

3. Corroboration. If the informant's reliability has not been established by more direct means, it may be established through independent verification. If enough of the information provided by the informant is independently corroborated, then it may reasonably be inferred that the informant is telling the truth (i.e., is reliable). As to what information is "enough" to corroborate an informant's tip, consider the nature and quantity of the corroborated facts.

a. Spinelli v. United States, 393 U.S. 410 (1969). An FBI surveillance investigation detailing the defendant's "innocent-seeming conduct" was insufficient to corroborate an informant's tip.

b. United States v. Miller, 21 C.M.A. 92, 44 C.M.R. 146 (1971). Informants advised a commanding officer that a "Chief Miller" had LSD in his room. The informants described his physical characteristics and further stated that "Chief Miller" was a cook living on the third floor of Bravo Company. This information was sufficiently verified by independently ascertaining the identity of the accused, his occupation, and the location of his room.

c. United States v. McFarland, 19 C.M.A. 356, 41 C.M.R. 356 (1970). A hearsay report that accused was going to meet an individual and then fly to Hawaii to purchase marijuana was independently and sufficiently verified by observing the accused meet the individual in an airport where they had requested transportation to Hawaii.

d. United States v. Martin, 3 M.J. 744 (N.C.M.R. 1977), aff'd, 7 M.J. 47 (C.M.A. 1979). Information derived from a surveillance of the accused's activities was sufficient to corroborate the informant's reports.

e. Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983) (corroboration of details contained in anonymous letter established probable cause under a totality of the circumstances standard).

4. Probable cause may be based on any and all of the following:

- a. Written Statements
- b. Oral Statements
- c. Personal Knowledge of Authorizing Official.

d. Probable cause may be based upon hearsay evidence in whole or in part. Mil.R.Evid. 315(f)(2).

5. "Stale information." The information establishing probable cause must lead to the conclusion that the items sought are, or will be, in the place to be searched at the time of the search. The question whether information as to the location of evidence sought to be seized is stale has to be determined on a case-by-case basis, with the length of time but one factor to be considered.

a. United States v. Poole, 30 M.J. 271 (C.M.A. 1990).

b. United States v. Queen, 26 M.J. 136 (C.M.A. 1988).

c. Staleness determinations are influenced by the nature of the evidence being sought. If the evidence sought is easily consumed or likely to be moved, courts will not tolerate much staleness. United States v. Poole, 30 M.J. 271, 274-75 (C.M.A. 1990). Courts will permit greater staleness where the evidence sought is difficult to move.

See, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 23 M.J. 209, 212 (C.M.A. 1987) (staleness not fatal where object of search was a bulky stereo receiver not quickly marketable).

d. United States v. Lovell, 8 M.J. 613 (A.F.C.M.R. 1979), petition denied, 9 M.J. 17 (1980) (information about stolen property was not stale when property was not readily saleable and accused had no reason to suspect the whereabouts of stolen goods would be divulged).

e. United States v. Johnson, 23 M.J. 209 (C.M.A. 1987) (several weeks timely where suspect likely to retain stolen property in his quarters).

f. United States v. Agosto, 43 M.J. 745 (A.F.Ct.Crim App. 1995) (Whether the information supporting probable cause in state depends on at least four factors: (1) the nature of the article sought; (2) the location involved; (3) the type of crime; and (4) the length of time the crime has continued.)

C. The information tending to establish probable cause: quantum and nature

1. The information establishing probable cause (as well as the information establishing that it has been reliably transmitted) must actually be given to the authorizing official. It is not enough for the authorizing official to approve the conclusions of another that probable cause exists; the official must personally weigh and pass upon that information. The authorizing official must be more than a "rubber stamp." The authorizing official should consider such facts as: whether the place to be searched is identified with particularity; whether the items sought are described with particularity; and whether the items sought are located in the place identified. See Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964); United States v. Lidle, 21 C.M.A. 445, 45 C.M.R. 229 (1972).

2. Specific items. The information must establish that particular items are in a given place. Authorization to search a place for unspecified materials is impermissible.

a. Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979).

b. United States v. Hartsook, 15 C.M.A. 291, 35 C.M.R. 263 (1965).

c. Authorizing officials must reasonably believe that the information provided to them supports a conclusion that the items sought are evidence of a crime, contraband, or fruits or instrumentalities of a crime.

3. Specific location

a. Mil.R.Evid. 315(f)(2).

b. In deciding whether it is fairly probable that the evidence sought is at the place to be searched, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has allowed authorizing officials to rely upon logical inferences. See, e.g., United States v. Figueroa, 35 M.J. 54 (C.M.A. 1992).

c. Smell alone may provide probable cause. United States v. Duncan, 46 C.M.R. 1096 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 46 C.M.R. 1323 (C.M.A. 1973). See United States v. Hessler, 4 M.J. 303 (C.M.A. 1978), aff'd on reconsideration, 7 M.J. 9 (C.M.A. 1979). See also United States v. Acosta, 11 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1981). In Acosta, a first sergeant who detected the odor of marijuana smoke emanating from the accused's room did not inform his commander of how he concluded that the odor he detected was burning marijuana. The court held that this omission did not preclude a finding by the authorizing official of probable cause to order a search of the accused's room. See also United States v. Cunningham, 11 M.J. 242 (C.M.A. 1981) (where experienced noncommissioned officer makes statement to commander that he has smelled marijuana, statement constitutes implicit assurance of familiarity with odor).

d. If an individual is found in possession of drugs in one place, this by itself does not necessarily provide probable cause to search the individual's belongings in another place.

(1) United States v. Racz, 21 C.M.A. 24, 44 C.M.R. 78 (1971) (incriminating evidence found on accused in a defense bunker did not justify search of accused's barracks room).

(2) United States v. Troy, 22 C.M.A. 195, 46 C.M.R. 195 (1973) (presence of drugs in accused's shaving kit in common area did not justify subsequent search of his room).

(3) United States v. Peters, 11 M.J. 901 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981) (discovery of drugs in the accused's car during random gate inspection did not provide probable cause for a search of the accused's on-base quarters).

(4) Compare United States v. Elwood, 19 C.M.A. 376, 41 C.M.R. 376 (1970) (information that accused was arrested for possession of marijuana in town insufficient to authorize search of accused's locker in barracks four or five miles away) with United States v. Smallwood, 22 C.M.A. 40, 46 C.M.R. 40 (1972) (probable cause existed to search accused's room after accused found in possession of marijuana and informant reported accused had marijuana in his room) and United States v. Miller, 21 C.M.A. 92, 44 C.M.R. 146 (1971).

(5) Note that the inference which the Court of Military

Appeals refused to draw in these cases is not so much one of location, but rather one of quantity. The court refused to conclude that there were probably more drugs at another location, just because a servicemember was caught with drugs at a given place.

(6) See also United States v. Gramlich, 551 F.2d 1359 (5th Cir. 1977), cert. denied, 434 U.S. 866 (1977).

(7) The Court of Military Appeals has held, however, that the possession of marijuana on a suspect's person can be the basis of a probable cause urinalysis test. United States v. Wood, 25 M.J. 46 (C.M.A. 1987). See also United States v. Jones, 20 M.J. 594 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985), aff'd, 24 M.J. 294 (C.M.A. 1987).

e. Searches of an individual's living area as the place most likely to contain evidence or fruits of a crime. Generally, if the item sought is one of intrinsic value which would probably be retained by the suspect in a secure place, there may be probable cause to search his / her living area. On the other hand, if the item is of little inherent value, or is one not likely to be retained, then probable cause is less likely. Courts will also look to other factors, such as the temporal relationship of the search and other information, the exact nature of the item, and the availability of other "hiding" places, etc.

(1) United States v. Figueroa, 35 M.J. 54 (C.M.A. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1257 (1993) (holding that the authorizing official could reasonably conclude that missing weapons were probably stored at the accused's quarters).

(2) United States v. Johnson, 23 M.J. 209 (C.M.A. 1987) (information, identifying Johnson as suspect regarding theft of stereo component several weeks earlier at military base in Japan, was probable cause to search Johnson's quarters because someone of his age who would steal such equipment would likely retain it).

4. Specificity of probable cause. This issue goes to the focus of the information and also to the specificity of the authorization. Generally, military case law has permitted probable cause searches of a far broader area than is normally sanctioned in civilian jurisdictions. Compare United States v. Drew, 15 C.M.A. 449, 35 C.M.R. 421 (1964) with United States v. Votteller, 544 F.2d 1355 (6th Cir. 1976). Thus, searches of entire barracks (where probable cause exists to believe that evidence is in the barracks) have been sanctioned.

a. United States v. Drew, 15 C.M.A. 449, 35 C.M.R. 421 (1964) (search of entire barracks for stolen property upheld). See also United States v. Harman, 12 C.M.A. 180, 30 C.M.R. 180 (1961); United States v. Gebhart, 10 C.M.A. 606, 28 C.M.R. 172 (1959).

b. United States v. Owens, 48 C.M.R. 636 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974), aff'd, 50 C.M.R. 906 (C.M.A. 1975) (equally divided court) (search of one floor of barracks for marijuana upheld).

c. United States v. Schafer, 13 C.M.A. 83, 32 C.M.R. 83 (1962) (search of area of post containing some 20 barracks, shortly after stabbing murder in the vicinity, upheld).

d. United States v. Webb, 4 M.J. 613 (N.C.M.R. 1977) (search of NCO portion of barracks for marijuana upheld).

e. Location of stolen property in barracks stairwell was not probable cause to search all rooms in the barracks for additional stolen property. United States v. Moore, 23 M.J. 295 (C.M.A. 1987).

1305 SEARCH AUTHORIZATIONS (Key Numbers 1068, 1070, 1071, 1075, 1080)

A. General. As indicated above, probable cause normally must be determined by a neutral and detached magistrate. See Walter v. United States, 447 U.S. 649 (1980) (FBI agents exceeded private individual's actions by showing films without a search warrant when, previously, private citizens had only observed container markings). In the civilian community, this neutral and detached magistrate usually means a judge, magistrate, or justice of the peace. In the Navy and Marine Corps, the commanding officer normally fills this role. In evaluating probable cause searches, one must ascertain whether a proper person authorized the search and whether the authorizing official followed proper procedures.

B. Command authorization

1. General. Only "competent military authority" can authorize searches in the military. Mil.R.Evid. 315(b)(1). Commanders are included in this concept. Historically, by virtue of their responsibility, commanders had virtual plenary power to search persons and places within their organizations. See United States v. Florence, 1 C.M.A. 620, 5 C.M.R. 48 (1952); United States v. Doyle, 1 C.M.A. 545, 4 C.M.R. 137 (1952). Yet, limitations on the commander's power have been recognized. See, e.g., United States v. Brown, 10 C.M.A. 482, 28 C.M.R. 48 (1959) (compliance with the law is required; the commander cannot issue a search authorization based upon mere suspicion). More recently, the commander has been equated to a civilian magistrate in making probable cause determinations. See United States v. Lopez, 35 M.J. 35 (C.M.A. 1992); United States v. Ezell, 6 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1979). Thus, despite procedural differences in the commander's authorization, the commander's probable cause determination is subject to at least the same sort of review as is a civilian magistrate's. This review should not be in the form of a de novo determination by the military judge. Instead, great deference should be paid to the decision of the issuing magistrate and, so long as there was a "substantial basis" for concluding that probable cause existed, the search should be upheld. Illinois v. Gates, 462 U.S. 213 (1983);

United States v. Postle, 20 M.J. 632 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985).

2. Jurisdiction. Mil.R.Evid. 315 describes the extent of a commander's power to search as follows:

a. Scope of authorization. A search authorization may be issued under this rule for a search of:

(1) Persons. The person of anyone subject to military law or the law of war wherever found;

(2) Military property. Military property of the United States or of nonappropriated fund activities of an armed force of the United States wherever located;

(3) Persons and property within military control. Persons or property situated on or in a military installation, encampment, vessel, aircraft, vehicle, or any other location under military control, wherever located; or

(4) Nonmilitary property within a foreign country

(A) Property owned, used, occupied by, or in the possession of an agency of the United States other than the Department of Defense when situated in a foreign country. A search of such property may not be conducted without the concurrence of an appropriate representative of the agency concerned. Failure to obtain such concurrence, however, does not render a search unlawful within the meaning of Mil.R.Evid. 311.

(B) Other property situated in a foreign country. If the United States is a party to a treaty or agreement that governs a search in a foreign country, the search shall be conducted in accordance with the treaty or agreement. If there is no treaty or agreement, concurrence should be obtained from an appropriate representative of the foreign country with respect to a search under paragraph (4)(B) of this subdivision. Failure to obtain such concurrence or noncompliance with a treaty or agreement, however, does not render a search unlawful within the meaning of Mil.R.Evid. 311.

b. In essence, the commander's power to search extends to persons and places under the organizational control of the commander. Interesting issues exist as to whether a commander has control over the person or place to be searched. Mil.R.Evid. 315(d)(1).

(1) Can the CO of a ship authorize an inspection

(Mil.R.Evid. 313) or a search (Mil.R.Evid. 315) of quarters provided for crewmembers by a civilian contractor while the ship is uninhabitable during an overhaul in a shipyard? Although case law has not addressed this issue, a JAG opinion has stated that the Holiday Inn where the crew members were billeted was not such a location as to justify the conclusion that it was under military control for purposes of inspections and searches. JAG ltr JAG:202.2:HSP:ch Ser: 202/37028 of 8 Apr 1981 to CO, USS CLARK. But see JAG ltr JAG:202.2:HSP:hsp Ser: 202/37081 of 9 Nov 1981 to COMNAVSURFLANT, a JAG opinion which addresses the concept of "control" and recommends certain action that can be taken to improve the likelihood of courts deciding in favor of the existence of military control. For similar "control" issues, the following two Navy JAG opinions may provide assistance: JAG ltr JAG:202:MDR:dm Ser: 202/37027 of 26 Nov 1976 to Commandant, Fifth Naval District (CO's cannot authorize searches of off-base, government-leased civilian apartments housing their personnel); and JAG ltr JAG:131.6:WDB:ivh Ser: 13/5036 of 10 Feb 1981 to CO, Naval Station, Long Beach, CA (CO of Naval Station can authorize searches in a Navy housing area which is provided gas, water, electricity, trash pickup, and primary police and fire protection by the City of Long Beach). Because the opinions of the Judge Advocate General of the Navy are subject to reconsideration and possible modification in light of any future developments or court decisions bearing on these issues, the reader should contact Code 20 of the Office of the Judge Advocate General for the most recent JAG opinions when researching this issue.

(2) Case law concerning the good faith exception suggests that military courts might uphold the admissibility of evidence derived from a search authorization granted under such nebulous conditions provided that the authorizing official and the agents executing the authorization reasonably believed that the authorizing official was empowered to issue the search authorization. See United States v. Chapple, 36 M.J. 410 (C.M.A. 1993); United States v. Max, 35 M.J. 283 (C.M.A. 1992), cert. denied, 113 S. Ct. 1383 (1993).

c. The commander's authority may be limited or removed. United States v. Dillard, 8 M.J. 213 (C.M.A. 1980); United States v. Reagan, 7 M.J. 490 (C.M.A. 1979). But, note the last sentences of Mil.R.Evid. 315(c) (4)(A) and (B) (failure to obtain concurrence of nonmilitary agency or failure to comply with treaty or agreement does not render search in foreign country unlawful).

3. Officer in charge

a. "Officer in charge" is a term of art used in the Navy, Marine Corps, and Coast Guard for describing one who occupies a certain position. See Articles 1(4), 15, and 24(a)(4), UCMJ, and R.C.M. 103, discussion.

b. Mil.R.Evid. 315(d)(1) permits the Secretary concerned to designate positions analogous to an officer in charge or a position of command and thereby allow such persons to authorize searches.

4. Neutral and detached magistrate

a. The Supreme Court has held that probable cause must be determined by a "neutral and detached magistrate" for a valid warrant to issue.

b. The commander's involvement in law enforcement or the information-gathering process may give rise to questions concerning neutrality and detachment. United States v. Ezell, 6 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1979); United States v. Rivera, 10 M.J. 55 (C.M.A. 1980).

(1) There is no per se rule disqualifying the commanding officer from authorizing probable cause searches. See United States v. Ezell, 6 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1979).

(2) The neutrality and detachment of a given commander may be challenged, however, depending upon the specific facts in a case. In United States v. Ezell, 6 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1979), the court set forth some of the various factors that will enter the analysis surrounding the validity of a command authorization. These factors are listed below.

(a) Personal involvement by the commander as an active participant in the gathering of evidence to be used as a basis for requesting the authorization as demonstrated by, e.g., approving or directing the use of: informants; drug detection dogs except for gate searches; or controlled buys, surveillance operations, and similar activities. See United States v. Murray, 12 M.J. 139 (C.M.A. 1981). United States v. Freeman, 42 M.J. 239 (CAAF 1995). But see Mil.R.Evid. 315(d), which suggests that these activities can be authorized impartially by the commander without being equated to improper personal involvement, and paragraph 5-2.c of enclosure (1) of OPNAVINST 5585.2A which requires the commander of a facility to authorize use of a drug detection dog in that facility.

(b) Personal involvement in the prosecution of the case.

(c) Other personal bias or involvement in the investigative or prosecutorial process against the accused. United States v. Stuckey, 10 M.J. 347 (C.M.A. 1981).

(d) Presence at the site of a search while it is in progress. See Lo-Ji Sales, Inc. v. New York, 442 U.S. 319 (1979). But see United States v. Powell, 8 M.J. 260 (C.M.A. 1980) (presence by the authorizing official does not automatically result in command disqualification). Each case is considered on an ad hoc basis. Mil.R.Evid. 315(d).

(e) Failure of the commander to refer the matter to a military judge or magistrate, where available. United States v. Ezell, 6 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1979). (Fletcher, C.J., concurring). This factor will be of little interest in the Navy and Marine Corps, inasmuch as the Secretary of the Navy has not authorized military judges or magistrates to authorize searches.

(3) Examples

(a) United States v. Carlisle, 46 C.M.R. 1250 (A.C.M.R.), aff'd, 48 C.M.R. 71 (C.M.A. 1973) (commander who took tough public stand on drug offenses not disqualified as magistrate).

(b) United States v. Guerette, 23 C.M.A. 281, 49 C.M.R. 530 (1975) (commander who ordered general drug investigation of numerous individuals including accused not disqualified as magistrate).

(c) United States v. Bradley, 50 C.M.R. 603 (N.C.M.R. 1975) (executive officer as acting commander not disqualified by prior knowledge of controlled purchase of drugs from accused).

5. Devolution of command. If the commander of a unit or organization is absent and unavailable, command devolves upon the next individual in the chain of command, and that individual, as acting commander, may, upon probable cause, authorize searches within the command. No formal assumption of command orders are necessary, although, without them, courts will examine the nature and duration of the commander's absence to determine whether command actually devolved upon the next individual in line. Service regulations may also affect this determination.

a. United States v. Murray, 12 C.M.A. 434, 31 C.M.R. 20 (1964) (CO absent on TAD and XO absent on one-day pass; warrant officer was properly acting as commander for search authorization purposes).

b. United States v. Gionet, 41 C.M.R. 519 (A.C.M.R. 1969) (temporary absence of CO attending meeting at battalion HQ, a short distance from unit, not sufficient for authority to devolve upon XO).

c. United States v. Azelton, 49 C.M.R. 163 (A.C.M.R. 1974) (functional absence of CO, who was participating in field exercise nearby, held sufficient for authority to devolve).

d. United States v. Bradley, 50 C.M.R. 608 (N.C.M.R. 1975) (regularly assigned CO ashore, exact whereabouts unknown; therefore, the next senior person, in accordance with Article 0857, U.S. Navy Regulations, 1973, succeeded to command and had authority to authorize a search).

e. United States v. Carter, 1 M.J. 318, 320 (C.M.A. 1976). "It is constitutionally impermissible to saddle noncommissioned officers not only with determining the necessity for inspections or searches but also with the responsibility for implementing appropriate inspection or search procedures" (citations omitted). Query whether authority to order searches can ever devolve upon an NCO. But see drafters' analysis, MCM, 1984, app. 22-27.

f. United States v. Martin, 3 M.J. 744 (N.C.M.R. 1977), aff'd in summary disposition, 7 M.J. 47 (C.M.A. 1979) (upholding search authorization by officer who was acting chief of staff in the absence of commanding general and chief of staff).

6. Delegation of authority. A commanding officer or officer-in-charge cannot delegate the power to authorize a search. See Mil.R.Evid. 315(d) (drafters' analysis); United States v. Law, 17 M.J. 229 (C.M.A. 1984).

7. Authorizing Search does not Disqualify CO from Further Action. When competent military authority authorizes a search, he or she is not necessarily precluded from future official participation in the case. See, e.g., United States v. Wilson, 1 M.J. 694 (A.F.C.M.R. 1975) (reviewing and taking action on record of trial); United States v. Cansdale, 7 M.J. 143 (C.M.A. 1979) (reviewing and taking action on record of trial). But see United States v. Cardwell, 46 C.M.R. 1301 (A.C.M.R. 1973) (military judge deciding legality of search which he, acting as magistrate, authorized, held to be error).

8. The commander's authorization

a. Procedures

(1) Unlike the authorization by civilian judges, the commander's authorization to search had traditionally been issued in a relatively informal procedure. Thus, the commander's authorization had generally been oral, based on oral, unsworn statements to him or her in support of probable cause. See Mil.R.Evid. 315(b)(1), 315(f)(2).

(2) Oath not Required. In 1980, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces held that an authorization to search must be predicated upon information supported by oath or affirmation. United States v. Fimmano, 8 M.J. 197 (C.M.A. 1980). Regulatory authority supported this decision. However, in 1981, the court reversed itself, ruling that the Fourth Amendment does not require that military commanders' authorization for search and seizure be "supported by oath or affirmation," since the commander is not a true "magistrate." Thus, a military commander's search authorization is not a warrant within the contemplation of the Fourth Amendment. United States v. Stuckey, 10 M.J. 347 (C.M.A. 1981). Although the court concluded that compliance with the oath requirement is not absolutely required, it went on to note:

A military commander who fails to obtain evidence under oath when it is feasible for him to do so has neglected a simple means for enhancing the reliability of his probable cause determination. In a marginal case this lack of concern for obtaining the most reliable evidence available may prove fatal when the commander's finding of probable cause is being attacked before a court-martial.

(3) The commander may consider a combination of oral and written information. United States v. Fleener, 21 C.M.A. 174, 44 C.M.R. 228 (1972) (Quinn, J., concurring in the result).

b. The authorization must be reasonably specific as to place and items sought.

(1) Andresen v. Maryland, 427 U.S. 463 (1976).

(2) United States v. Hartsook, 15 C.M.A. 291, 35 C.M.R. 263 (1965).

(3) But see United States v. Drew, 15 C.M.A. 449, 35 C.M.R. 421 (1964); United States v. Schafer, 13 C.M.A. 83, 32 C.M.R. 83 (1962) (search of area, including 256 buildings, upheld when authorization directed seizure of items "pertinent to investigation of murder").

(4) Authorization to search barracks room and off-base residence was permissible where there was probable cause that property sought would be located in one of two identified areas under suspect's control. United States v. Johnson, 23 M.J. 209 (C.M.A. 1987).

c. Authorization may be conditional: United States v. Staggs, 23 C.M.A. 111, 48 C.M.R. 672 (1974) (implied conditional authorization is permissible), United States v. Kennard, 49 C.M.R. 138 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974) (upholding search authorization which was contingent upon the accused leaving a hospital; and it was not executed until he left the hospital and put bags in his car), and United States v. Ness, 13 C.M.A. 18, 32 C.M.R. 18 (1962).

C. Search pursuant to authorization. A search based on a search warrant (or its equivalent, the commander's authorization) is limited to the specific place, and to looking for the specific items, authorized by the issuing official. If, in the course of a properly authorized search, agents discover items not contained in the authorization, these may be seized if the requirements of the plain view rule have been met.

1. Execution. Mil.R.Evid. 315(h) sets forth the following basic procedures which should be adhered to during the actual execution of the search authorization:

a. Notice. If the person whose property is to be searched is present during a search conducted pursuant to a search authorization granted under this rule, the person conducting the search should when possible notify him or her of the act of authorization and the general substance of the authorization. Such notice may be made prior to or contemporaneously with the search. Failure to provide such notice does not make a search unlawful within the meaning of Mil.R.Evid. 311.

b. Inventory. Under regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned, and with such exceptions as may be authorized by the Secretary, an inventory of the property seized shall be made at the time of a seizure under this rule or as soon as practicable thereafter. At an appropriate time, a copy of the inventory shall be given to a person from whose possession or premises the property was taken. Failure to make an inventory, furnish a copy thereof, or otherwise comply with this paragraph does not render a search or seizure unlawful within the meaning of Mil.R.Evid. 311.

c. Foreign searches. Execution of a search authorization outside the United States and within the jurisdiction of a foreign nation should be in conformity with existing agreements between the United States and the foreign nation. Noncompliance with such an agreement does not make an otherwise lawful search unlawful.

2. Knock and announce. In Wilson v. Arkansas, 115 S. Ct. 1914 (1995), the Supreme Court held that officials executing a search warrant generally must knock and announce their presence before entering. The Court suggested that exceptions to this knock and announce rule might include hot pursuit, where a threat of physical violence exists, and where evidence will likely be destroyed if advance notice is given.

D. Attacking probable cause determinations at trial. A search authorization and supporting information may be attacked as being legally insufficient on its face. Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964). Can a judge "go behind" a search warrant and affidavits to evaluate their legal sufficiency? In other words, when may a judge at trial consider evidence not presented to or considered by the official who authorized the search?

1. Examples

a. Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108 (1964) (the reviewing court may consider only information brought to the magistrate's attention).

b. Whitely v. Warden, 401 U.S. 560 (1971) (an otherwise insufficient affidavit for an arrest warrant cannot be rehabilitated by testimony concerning information possessed by the affiant when he sought the warrant, but which he did not disclose to the issuing magistrate).

c. United States v. Cobb, 432 F.2d 716 (4th Cir. 1970).

2. The government is normally limited to supporting the authorization solely with information presented to the authorizing official. Whether the government can bolster written affidavits with information orally transmitted to the authorizing official, but not recorded, depends upon the procedural rules of the jurisdiction. Most civilian jurisdictions adhere to a "four corners" rule, under which the government is limited to written information supplied to the magistrate and the search warrant itself. The military rule is broader.

a. Gramaglia v. Gray, 395 F. Supp. 606 (S.D. Ohio 1975) (Rule 41(c) of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure precludes supplementing the affidavit with evidence orally transmitted to magistrate, but this rule is not of constitutional dimensions, so the Ohio procedure which permitted this was proper).

b. United States v. Fleener, 21 C.M.A. 174, 44 C.M.R. 228, 236 (1972) (Quinn, J., concurring in the result) (affidavit presented to the commander can be bolstered by oral information also provided to him).

c. United States v. Garcia, 3 M.J. 927 (A.C.M.R. 1977).

3. The defense may challenge as false the information in an affidavit relied upon by the authorizing official to support a search warrant even though the information and authorization appear facially sufficient. Mil.R.Evid. 311(g)(2). See Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978).

a. Misrepresentations. Although it was once axiomatic that both sides at trial were bound by the "four corners" of the affidavit, Federal courts have permitted the defense to challenge a facially sufficient warrant and affidavit when the defense can show any misrepresentation of a material fact or intentional misrepresentation of facts by a government agent. See, e.g., United States v. Marihart, 492 F.2d 897 (8th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 827 (1974); United States v. Carmichael, 489 F.2d 983 (7th Cir. 1973); United States v. Thomas, 489 F.2d 664 (5th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 844 (1975).

b. Requirements. Once the defense is permitted to "go behind" the information presented to the authorizing official and challenge its accuracy, by what standards are we to judge the authorization and, ultimately, the admissibility of the evidence? What sort of misstatements or incorrect information will give rise to the sanction of the exclusionary rule? Although courts have handled this problem in a variety of ways, Mil.R.Evid. 311(g)(2) and Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978), set the standards to be followed. Essentially, three questions must be asked: Who made the misstatement (i.e., government agent, informant, witness); what was the nature of the misstatement (i.e., intentional, reckless, negligent, or reasonable mistake); and was the misstatement material (i.e., without the misstated facts, did probable cause still exist)?

(1) Who made the misstatement?

(i) Only a misstatement by a government agent will give rise to any relief. Note that, in the military, the lines between "government agent" and "private citizen" are blurred. See Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978), United States v. Carmichael, 489 F.2d 983 (7th Cir. 1973), United States v. Marihart, 492 F.2d 897 (8th Cir. 1974), United States v. Turck, 49 C.M.R. 49 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974) (Air Force OSI agent), United States v. Corkill, 2 M.J. 1118 (C.G.C.M.R. 1976) (base military security officer),

(ii) Some courts have implied that misstatements by anyone in the chain of information might give rise to the exclusionary rule. See United States v. Thomas, 489 F.2d 664 (5th Cir. 1973), United States v. Salatino, 22 C.M.A. 530, 48 C.M.R. 15 (1973). Contra, United States v. Corkill, supra.

(2) Nature of the misstatement

(i) The defense will be entitled to a hearing concerning the alleged misstatement only upon a showing that a false statement was knowingly and intentionally made or was proffered with reckless disregard for the truth. Mil.R.Evid. 311(g)(2). Allegations of negligence or innocent mistake are insufficient. See Franks v. Delaware, 438 U.S. 154 (1978), United States v. Carmichael, 489 F.2d 983 (7th Cir. 1973), and United States v. Turck, 49 C.M.R. 49 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974) (involving OSI agent who make only negligent misrepresentations; thus, search warrant not invalid).

(ii) As to other misstatements, there is disagreement regarding their effect. Some courts will excise grossly negligent misstatements, but not other misstatements. Other courts appear willing to excise even misstatements made through simple carelessness. Compare United States v. Marihart, 492 F.2d 897 (8th Cir. 1974), with United States v. Thomas, 489 F.2d 664 (5th Cir. 1973).

(3) Materiality of the misstatement

(i) The remedy is to excise the misstatement and test the residual information to determine whether it still provides probable cause. Mil.R.Evid. 311(g)(2). In other words, was the misstatement material to a finding of probable cause? United States v. Marihart, 492 F.2d 397 (8th Cir. 1974), United States v. Turck, 49 C.M.R. 49 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974), and United States v. Thomas, 489 F.2d 664 (5th Cir. 1973).

4. May the defense challenge the affidavit / information by showing that additional information was not presented to the authorizing official, which might have affected the probable cause determination? See United States v. Kelly, 15 M.J. 1024 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 17 M.J. 22 (C.M.A. 1983) (special agent's omission of fact that he suspected confidential informant had lied to him about a previous incident was not material).

5. Misunderstanding by authorizing official. An erroneous understanding is not always sufficient to weaken the correctly understood information to such an extent that probable cause could not be found. United States v. Sam, 22 C.M.A. 124, 46 C.M.R. 124 (1973).

6. Disclosure of informant's identity. Mil.R.Evid. 507. In challenging probable cause at trial, the defense often wants to discover the identity of the informant who purportedly supplied the information. As a general rule, the defense is not entitled to discover the identity of an informant—merely to challenge the validity of a search.

a. United States v. Coleman, 14 M.J. 1014 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (relying on Mil.R.Evid. 507 to hold that government not required to disclose confidential identity).

b. United States v. Adolph, 13 M.J. 775 (A.C.M.R. 1982) (holding that the government was not required to divulge identity of confidential informant who made a report to the accused's executive officer).

c. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 61 (1957) (government must disclose identity of informant unless sufficient evidence apart from his confidential communication was used to establish probable cause).

d. McCray v. Illinois, 386 U.S. 300 (1967) (failure to produce informant to testify against defendant at preliminary hearing held to determine probable cause for arrest and search does not unconstitutionally deprive defendant of right to confrontation and cross-examination; disclosure is not required unless identity is relevant and helpful to the defense or is essential to fair determination of probable cause).

e. United States v. Watkins, 32 M.J. 1054 (A.C.M.R. 1991), aff'd, 34 M.J. 344 (C.M.A. 1992) (accused's burden to establish that the informant's identity is necessary to his defense is not satisfied by mere speculation).

E. Authorization and consent. Probable cause alone without authorization will not cure an involuntary consent.

1. In United States v. White, 27 M.J. 264 (C.M.A. 1988), the accused's commander had received information from an informant that she had been using drugs. The commander offered her the opportunity to prove her innocence by "consenting" to a urinalysis, but told her that, if she didn't "consent," he would order her to give a sample. Judge Cox, writing for the court, found the "consent" involuntary and set aside the findings of guilty, analogizing to the situation where a civilian official obtains "consent" only after asserting that he has a warrant. In the warrant / consent situation, it is the warrant and not the involuntary consent that validates the search and, the court reasoned, since the commander's ability to order a urinalysis is equivalent to a civilian policeman's possession of a warrant, the consent was invalid. Id. at 266. In this case, since there was no probable cause to order the urinalysis, there was no valid theory of admissibility to which the government could justify the seizure.

2. In United States v. Simmons, 29 M.J. 70 (C.M.A. 1989) (Cox, J.), the court was faced with a situation where the consent was invalid, but probable cause existed because of the accused's presence in a car with cocaine and drug paraphernalia in a heavy drug-trafficking area. The court held that, in those circumstances, the allegedly involuntary nature of the accused's "consent" to urinalysis did not invalidate the test, even though the accused was not told that results of a "consent" test could be used against him and that the results of a command-directed test were inadmissible. Although the consent was invalid, the order that the commander could have given concerning the urinalysis (given the probable cause) was the functional equivalent of a civilian warrant and, thus, the results were admissible. Id. at 71.

3. In the case of United States v. McClain, 31 M.J. 130 (C.M.A. 1990), the accused gave an involuntary consent to a urinalysis. Although the commanding officer possessed information that would have constituted probable cause for a urinalysis, he was never asked for authorization. Instead, involuntary consent was obtained. At trial the military judge suppressed McClain's urinalysis because it was obtained involuntarily. But the Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals reversed, based on Simmons, 29 M.J. 70 (C.M.A. 1989), which seemed to hold that involuntary consent is cured when probable cause already exists. 30 M.J. 615, 618-19 (N.M.C.M.R. 1990). Nevertheless, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces "retreated from any suggestion in Simmons that 'involuntary consent' can be ignored if there is probable cause to obtain a search authorization." McClain, 31 M.J. at 134. The court reaffirmed the need to obtain authorization prior to conducting a probable cause search; however, the Court left open the possibility first suggested in White that involuntary consent may be cured by probable cause when the accused is dealing directly with the commander who has authority to search since the commander could have issued an oral authorization anyway.

1306 WIRETAPPING AND ELECTRONIC EAVESDROPPING

A. Generally. Mil.R.Evid. 317 generally excludes evidence obtained as a result of interceptions of wire or oral communications when such exclusion is required by the Fourth Amendment or by a statute applicable to members of the armed forces.

1. Criteria for electronic eavesdropping are established in 18 U.S.C. § 2510 et seq and in SECNAVINST 5520.2A of 1 Sep 1978, which implements DOD Dir. 5200.24 of 3 Apr 1978. Consensual telephone tracing on a military facility may be approved locally. Consensual interceptions (at least one party to the communication consents) require approval by the General Counsel of the Navy. Nonconsensual interceptions require a civilian court order except overseas. ALNAV 063/78 (SECNAV Washington DC 201618Z Oct 78) designated the Circuit Military Judge, Atlantic Judicial Circuit, to consider applications for nonconsensual interceptions directed against persons abroad who are subject to the UCMJ, and for pen register operations on any military installations and directed against persons subject to the UCMJ. Pen register operations and consensual or nonconsensual interceptions may only be conducted by the NCIS. Other requirements are identified in instructions cited above.

2. Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979) held that use of a pen register did not violate the accused's reasonable expectation of privacy; however, it appears that judicial approval of military pen register operations continues to be required legally though not constitutionally.

3. Police listening to the accused's voice coming over the phone receiver during a phone conversation between the accused and a government informant did not come within the activity regulated by Mil.R.Evid. 327. United States v. Parrillo, 34 M.J. 112 (C.M.A. 1992). "Pretext" phone calls to an accused by his abused step daughter, monitored by AFOSI, were permissible" United States v. Rios, 45 M.J. 558 (A.F.Ct.Crim.App. 1997).

4. The Army Court of Criminal Appeals has held that interception of a cordless telephone conversation does not violate the Electronic Communications Privacy Act because such conversations do not qualify as wire or electronic communication. United States v. Sullivan, 38 M.J. 746 (A.C.M.R. 1993).

1307 FINANCIAL INSTITUTION RECORDS OF INDIVIDUALS.

A. Financial institution records of individual. The Right to Financial Privacy Act, 12 U.S.C. §§ 3401-3422, applies to the military, and military commanders should not authorize seizure of an individual's records from a financial institution in the United States; a civilian search warrant should be sought. DOD Directive 5400.12 implemented by SECNAVINST 5500.33. (Note that the information also might be obtainable with a DOD IG administrative subpoena. See section 1312.C.3, infra.). Nevertheless, violation of the act does not support suppression, United States v. Wooten, 34 M.J. 141 (C.M.A. 1992) and an accused does not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in his / her bank record against a government search. United States v. Miller, 425 U.S. 435 (1976).

1308 PROBABLE CAUSE AND EXIGENCY (Key Number 1074)

A. General.

1. Even though probable cause exists to obtain a search authorization, some circumstances may arise when there is not time to get a search authorization without substantial risk of loss of evidence, escape of individuals, or harm to innocent people. When such circumstances exist, the warrant (or command authorization) requirement may be excused; however, probable cause must still exist and the same considerations discussed in section 1304, supra, still apply.

2. Mil.R.Evid. 315(g) expressly authorizes searches without command authorization where there is probable cause and: (1) a reasonable belief that the delay needed to obtain a warrant will result in the removal, destruction, or concealment of the evidence; or (2) a reasonable belief that reasonable military operational necessity prevents communication with a person authorized to grant authorization and delay will result in loss of the evidence.

1. Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967), established several criteria to evaluate whether "hot pursuit" circumstances exist such that a search without a warrant is justifiable:

- a. Probable cause to believe a violent crime had been committed;
- b. probable cause to believe the individual who committed the crime is in the house;
- c. pursuit a short time after the occurrence of the crime; or
- d. a need for immediate apprehension and identification before a warrant could be obtained.

2. Scope of search. In Hayden, the Supreme Court upheld not only a search of the entire house for Hayden, but also an examination of areas (such as a washing machine) where a weapon might have been hidden. Once the subject has been apprehended, the general rules of search incident to apprehension would govern. See also United States v. Santana, 427 U.S. 38 (1976).

C. Automobile "exception." Mil.R.Evid. 315(g)(3).

1. Generally, searches of automobiles and other means of transportation, although still requiring probable cause, have been subject to much less stringent warrant requirements than those of persons or structures. This has resulted from two factors: the mobility of vehicles and a lesser expectation of privacy.

a. The mobility of vehicles. Under some circumstances, if police officers waited to get a warrant, a real possibility exists that the vehicle would be gone by the time they secured the warrant. See Carroll v. United States, 267 U.S. 132 (1925), Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. 42 (1970), and Texas v. White, 423 U.S. 67 (1975).

b. As a rule, people have a lesser expectation of privacy in their car (or other conveyance) than in their person or house. United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1 (1977). See also Arkansas v. Sanders, 442 U.S. 753 (1979); United States v. Olmstead, 17 M.J. 247 (C.M.A. 1984) (accused had no reasonable expectation of privacy in vehicle involved in fatal accident).

c. But see Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971), where the Court excluded evidence derived from a car located on private property where the police had ample time to secure a warrant. United States v. Mills, 46 C.M.R. 630 (A.C.M.R. 1972), reaches a similar result. See also United States v. Garlich, 15 C.M.A. 362, 35 C.M.R. 334 (1965), holding the automobile exception inapplicable to a car that was immobile, "its engine having been completely dismantled for repairs."

d. Under Mil.R.Evid. 315(g), a vehicle is "operable" unless a reasonable person would have known at the time of the search that the vehicle was not functional for purposes of transportation. Cf. Michigan v. Thomas, 458 U.S. 259 (1982) (justification to conduct warrantless search of automobile does not "vanish" merely because vehicle has been immobilized by fact that accused has been taken into custody) and Florida v. Meyers, 466 U.S. 380 (1984).

2. Containers. Under United States v. Ross, 456 U.S. 798 (1982), if there is probable cause to believe that evidence will be found within an operable vehicle, then law enforcement officers may search the vehicle and any containers found therein in which there is probable cause to believe the evidence might be found. The fact that the officers could reasonably have seized the container and then secured a warrant or authorization for its search will not invalidate a search. Thus, in Ross, the police officers, having probable cause to believe that heroin would be found somewhere in the vehicle, were allowed to search the vehicle and a closed paper bag and zippered pouch in the trunk of the car without obtaining a warrant. What if probable cause is focused on a particular container and not on the car in general? May police search the container when they stop the car, or must they hold the container until a search authorization can be obtained? In California v. Acevedo, 500 U.S. 565 (1991), the Court held that when there is probable cause to believe a container in an automobile contains evidence, law enforcement agents may open the container without a warrant even if they do not have probable cause to search anywhere else in the vehicle.

3. Mobile Homes. A search of a mobile home based on probable cause, but without a warrant, was upheld by California v. Carney, 471 U.S. 386 (1985). The mobile home was parked on a lot, and the Court stated that the vehicle was readily mobile and that there was a reduced expectation of privacy stemming from its use as a licensed vehicle subject to regulation. In a footnote, the Court added that it was not deciding on a vehicle exception for a mobile home used as a residence, as evidenced by being elevated on blocks, not licensed as a vehicle, connected to utilities, and without access to public roads.

D. Other Searches. The probable cause plus exigent circumstances doctrine also permits warrantless searches of places or things other than vehicles.

1. See, e.g., United States v. Johnson, 561 F.2d 832 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977) (warrantless search of house upheld after police observed, through a window, occupants "cutting" large quantity of heroin; to have secured a warrant might have taken too long and permitted occupants to depart with contraband; surveillance deemed too risky).

2. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has indicated that the probable cause plus exigent circumstances exception is not limited to automobile searches.

a. In United States v. Hessler, 4 M.J. 303 (C.M.A. 1978), two judges upheld a warrantless entry into a room in a barracks by a duty officer who smelled burning marijuana in the hallway. Judge Perry dissented, asserting that there were insufficient exigent circumstances to justify the warrantless intrusion.

b. In United States v. Acosta, 11 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1981), the exigent circumstances doctrine was relied upon to uphold an entry of an officer into the accused's room. The officer, standing in a hall near the accused's door, recognized the odor of marijuana and, when the accused voluntarily opened the door of his room, the officer had probable cause to apprehend and he did not have to delay to seek a warrant to enter the room.

c. See also United States v. Dillon, 17 M.J. 501 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983) (investigators legitimately in accused's apartment, who smelled the odor of marijuana coming from the accused's bedroom, could conduct an exigency search), rev'd in part on other grounds in summary disposition, 19 M.J. 48 (C.M.A. 1984).

d. In United States v. Hendrickson, 10 M.J. 746 (N.C.M.R. 1981), petition denied, 11 M.J. 408 (C.M.A. 1981), a car owner noticed his television set was missing from his car after dropping a passenger off at the barracks. The duty NCO recalled seeing someone carrying a television set into one wing of the barracks. On these facts, the court found that the search of a barracks wing without authorization was a valid exigency search.

e. In United States v. Baker, 14 M.J. 602 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982), the court held that, if the search is performed after the exigency dissipates, the search is unlawful without authorization.

1309 SEARCHES WITHOUT PROBABLE CAUSE OR SEARCH AUTHORIZATION: CONSENT SEARCHES (Key Number 1062)

A. General. A search conducted with the voluntary consent of a person with control (who may consent will be examined below) of the place to be searched is legal, and evidence seized thereunder is admissible. Some view consent searches as a waiver rendering the Fourth Amendment inapplicable, while others treat consent searches as reasonable under the Fourth Amendment. In either case, they are legitimate.

B. Burden of proof. The government must prove voluntary consent by "clear and convincing evidence." Mil.R.Evid. 314(e)(5). This is a higher standard than the normal preponderance standard. Even when an individual is in custody and consents, the burden remains the same. But see United States v. Decker, 16 C.M.A. 397, 401, 37 C.M.R. 17, 21 (1966), wherein the court stated: "Special caution is required when the consent is obtained from a person in police custody." Under these circumstances, attention should be focused upon whether there is actual consent or merely acquiescence to the apparent authority of a law enforcement officer. See also United States v. Childress, 2 M.J. 1292 (N.C.M.R. 1975). Mil.R.Evid. 314(e)(5) provides that custody is a factor to be considered in determining the voluntariness of the consent.

C. Voluntariness of Consent. Mil.R.Evid. 314(e)(4).

1. Consent must be voluntary. This does not mean that consent must be volunteered, nor that it must be made with complete knowledge of the right to withhold consent and of the possible consequences of giving consent. All that is necessary is that consent be an act of free will, unfettered by governmental coercion, pressure, or restraint. Consent is evaluated under a "totality of the circumstances" test. See Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973).

2. Factors to look for to determine whether consent was voluntarily

a. Totality of Circumstances. An excellent example of the balancing test employed to determine if the "totality of the circumstances" reflected a voluntary consent may be found in United States v. Middleton, 10 M.J. 123 (C.M.A. 1981). In that case, the court balanced:

- (1) Advice of article 31 rights;
- (2) advice of right to refuse to consent;
- (3) action by the accused himself;
- (4) length of service of the accused;
- (5) request for counsel by the accused after the search; and
- (6) the fact that the accused:
  - (i) was under apprehension;
  - (ii) was surrounded by a number of officials;
  - (iii) had a limited education and GT score; and
  - (iv) might have acquiesced to a claim of lawful authority.

b. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces discusses this "balancing test" under the consent theory in United States v. Wallace, 11 M.J. 445 (C.M.A. 1981). See also, United States v. Kitts, 43 M.J. 23 (CAAF 1995).

c. Claim of search warrant. A permission to search, given after authority to search under a warrant is claimed, is not consent because "[w]hen a law enforcement officer claims authority to search a home under a warrant, he announces in effect that the occupant has no right to resist the search." Bumper v. North Carolina, 391 U.S. 543, 550 (1968). See also section 1308 G, supra.

d. Statement of intent to secure warrant

(1) In United States v. Rushing, 17 C.M.A. 298, 38 C.M.R. 96 (1967), the court indicated that it is not coercive or a threat for a police officer to indicate to a suspect in custody that, if the suspect refuses to consent to a search, the officer will apply for a warrant. But a different result might be reached where the officer is not reasonably certain that a warrant can be obtained.

(2) In United States v. Nicholson, 1 M.J. 616 (A.C.M.R. 1975), an accused's consent to the search of his car was valid although the consent was given while he was in custody and after he had been told that the police were going to obtain a search warrant if he did not consent. See also United States v. Simmons, 26 M.J. 666 (A.F.C.M.R. 1988).

e. Other factors bearing on finding of consent

(1) Actions of the accused in assisting in search. Robinson v. United States, 325 F.2d 880 (5th Cir. 1964); United States v. Decker, 16 C.M.A. 397, 37 C.M.R. 17 (1966). When the accused assists in the search by providing a key or directing the officers to the contraband, consent is more likely to be found.

(2) Of course, the precise wording of the request (especially where it is made by one superior in rank to the suspect) and the response are of critical importance, as are the physical surroundings and presence of others. From the government's standpoint, it is usually preferable to get consent in writing.

D. No warnings are necessary. The subject need not be apprised of his / her rights under article 31 and Miranda / Tempia, nor be told that there is a right not to consent. See Mil.R.Evid. 314(e)(4).

1. Schneckloth v. Bustamonte, 412 U.S. 218 (1973).
2. United States v. Bowie, 21 M.J. 453, 456 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 479 U.S. 820 (1986).
3. No warning of rights is required even when the subject is in custody. United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411 (1976). But note that, under United States v. Decker, 16 C.M.A. 397, 37 C.M.R. 17 (1966) and Mil.R.Evid. 314(e)(5), the government bears an especially heavy burden to prove consent where the subject was in custody.
4. The request for a consent search need not specifically indicate the items sought. United States v. Kennedy, 50 C.M.R. 892 (A.F.C.M.R. 1975).
5. The acknowledgment of ownership, possession, or control of a thing or place, implicit in consenting to a search of it, does not in itself require article 31 warnings. United States v. Britton, 33 M.J. 238 (C.M.A. 1991). But once suspects invoke their right to remain silent, they may not be asked to identify the property. United States v. Burns, 33 M.J.

316 (C.M.A. 1991).

6. Although warnings are not a legal requirement for a finding of consent, if the individual was warned, consent will more likely be found. The JAC Manual contains a sample consent to search form. (Appendix-1-o).

E. Mere submission to authority is not consent. See United States v. White, 27 M.J. 264, 266 (C.M.A. 1988).

F. Extent of consent. Consent may limit the time, place, or property to be searched. For example, a suspect can legitimately limit a government agent's search by stating, "You may search my car, but don't look in the glove compartment." In Florida v. Jimeno, 500 U.S. 248 (1991), the Supreme Court found that consent to search a trunk implied consent to search a paper bag in the trunk, but not a locked briefcase.

G. Withdrawal of consent. The suspect is free to withdraw consent at any time. For the withdrawal to be effective, however, the investigators are entitled to clear notice that consent has been withdrawn or limited. See United States v. Stoecker, 17 M.J. 158 (C.M.A. 1984) (accused did not withdraw consent by attempting to conceal object from the eyes of the investigator); United States v. Castro, 23 C.M.A. 166, 48 C.M.R. 782 (C.M.A. 1974) (when Castro saw investigator reading names in notebook—while conducting consent search for marked money—his asking for return of notebook constituted withdrawal of consent).

H. Who may consent: third parties. Mil.R.Evid. 314(e)(2).

1. General. Whether a third party may consent to a search appears to rest upon one or more of three theories.

a. First, if there is no reasonable expectation of privacy between the accused and the third party, the accused assumes a risk of the third party's consent. See United States v. Novello, 519 F.2d 1078 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1060 (1976). See also, United States v. Salazar, 44 M.J. 464 (CAAF 1996).

b. Second, the third party may consent to a search of his / her own property or that which is jointly owned, used, or possessed (except items within the exclusive control of the accused). See United States v. Turbyfill, 525 F.2d 57 (8th Cir. 1975); United States v. Fish, 25 M.J. 732 (A.F.C.M.R. 1987).

c. Third, a search is valid if the police reasonably thought that the person who consented had authority to give such consent. In Illinois v. Rodriguez, 497 U.S. 177 (1990), when a girlfriend with a key let police into her boyfriend's apartment, police officers could enter and search without a warrant if they were relying on the consent of a third party whom they reasonably, but mistakenly, believed had common authority over the apartment. United States v. Clow, 26 M.J. 176 (C.M.A. 1988) contains broad dictum approving the theory of "apparent authority." (The case also contains a good review of all Supreme Court decisions dealing with third party consent scenarios.)

2. Landlord or landlord's agent

a. Stoner v. California, 376 U.S. 483 (1964) (clerk at hotel could not consent to search of accused's hotel room).

b. Chapman v. United States, 365 U.S. 610 (1961) (even though landlord was authorized to enter leased premises to view waste, he could not consent to search of leased premises).

c. United States v. Cook, 530 F.2d 145 (5th Cir.), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 909 (1976) (owner of shed could validly consent to search of shed used by tenant where owner retained right of entry for storage).

d. United States v. Jacobs, 31 M.J. 138 (C.M.A. 1990), cert. denied, 111 S.Ct. 966 (1991) (in an emergency, a landlord, acting pursuant to state law, could authorize entry into the accused's apartment).

3. Co-tenants

a. United States v. Mathis, 16 C.M.A. 522, 37 C.M.R. 142 (1967). The court held the accused's mistress could consent to the search of an apartment rented by her, and the police, once in the apartment, could seize contraband in plain view. However, the mistress could not allow access to any place personal to the accused, such as a closet or chest for his clothing and effects.

b. Frazier v. Cupp, 394 U.S. 731 (1969). The seizure of clothing from a duffel bag was legal where the bag was being used jointly by the accused and his cousin, and the bag had been left in his cousin's home. Upon arresting the cousin for the same offense as the accused, the police received consent from him and his mother to search the bag. The Court held that the cousin, as a joint user of the duffel bag, had authority to consent to such search even though he was authorized only to use one compartment of the duffel bag.

c. United States v. Dillon, 17 M.J. 501 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983) (co-tenant's consent permitted entry into apartment, while smell of burning marijuana permitted exigent search of accused's room), rev'd in part on other grounds in summary disposition, 19 M.J. 48 (C.M.A. 1984).

4. Host. United States v. Yarbrough, 48 C.M.R. 449 (N.C.M.R. 1974)

(host's consent upheld in situation where guest was staying in room of host's apartment).

5. Bailor-bailee

- a. United States v. Garlich, 15 C.M.A. 362, 35 C.M.R. 334 (1965).

The court held that neither the legal owner (versus the equitable owner) nor the mechanic who had the car on his property could authorize a search of the accused's car.

- b. United States v. Novello, 519 F.2d 1078 (5th Cir. 1975), cert. denied, 423 U.S. 1060 (1976) (consent of warehouse employee who had access to the accused's storage area upheld; accused took risk) (note that court upheld consent although it was secured by ruse).

- c. United States v. Boyce, 3 M.J. 711 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977) (owner of garage could consent to search of garage where accused had stored items).

- d. United States v. Childress, 2 M.J. 1292 (N.C.M.R. 1975) (person who had borrowed vehicle and was driving it with permission of owner was empowered to freely consent to search of vehicle).

- e. United States v. Miller, 13 M.J. 75 (C.M.A. 1982) (owner of car could validly consent to search of accused's jacket which he had left therein).

6. Husband-wife

- a. See Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971).

- b. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has ruled on the issue in a few cases. See United States v. Clow, 26 M.J. 176 (C.M.A. 1988) (accused's estranged husband had sufficient control over apartment to consent to a search of a cabinet and accused's bedrooms. United States v. Mathis, 16 C.M.A. 522, 37 C.M.R. 142 (1967) (woman living with accused could consent to search of areas over which she had joint control); United States v. Smith, 13 C.M.A. 553, 33 C.M.R. 85 (1963) (wife's consent not voluntary, and search of accused's apartment not upheld); United States v. Sellers, 12 C.M.A. 262, 30 C.M.R. 262 (1961) (wife consented to search of husband's car for government records; search upheld).

- c. United States v. Curry, 15 M.J. 701 (A.C.M.R. 1983) (wife could consent to a search of husband's unlocked desk and cabinet absent specific indication by husband denying her access), rev'd in part on other grounds in summary disposition, 18 M.J. 103 (C.M.A. 1984).

- d. United States v. Matlock, 415 U.S. 164 (1974). The court held that the defendant's mistress could consent to the search of the bedroom and closet which they shared even though the defendant was arrested in the yard and in the patrol car at the time his mistress consented. The court indicated that the government "may show that permission to search was obtained from a third party who possessed common authority over or other sufficient relationship to the premises or effects sought to be inspected." Id. at 171. In elaborating on this test, the court indicated that the "common authority" rationale is not related to property law concepts. It rests rather on mutual use of the property by persons generally having joint access or control for most purposes. It is therefore reasonable to recognize that any of the co-inhabitants has the right to permit the inspection in his or her own right, and that each co-inhabitant has assumed the risk that another might permit the common area to be searched.

1310      APPREHENSION: SEIZURE OF PERSON (Key Numbers 1063, 1064)

A.      General. Any time an agent of the government restricts the freedom of an individual to move about, a seizure of the individual's person under the Fourth Amendment may have taken place. See United States v. Kinane, 1 M.J. 309, 313 n.12 (C.M.A. 1976); United States v. Rozier, 1 M.J. 469 (C.M.A. 1976). The permissible nature, duration, and intrusiveness of the restraint depends upon the factors at hand. Generally, the more information available pointing to criminal activity, the greater the degree of restraint allowed.

Two bench mark standards appear on this spectrum of information. On the lower end of the scale, "reasonable suspicion" or information leading to a conclusion that criminal activity may be afoot justifies a brief investigatory stop and frisk. On the upper end of the scale, probable cause based on a reasonable, fact-based belief that a crime has been committed by the one to be restrained justifies apprehension. There are also permissible law enforcement activities below the threshold for a stop and between a simple stop and frisk and an apprehension and search. Note, too, the peculiar situation in the military wherein a servicemember is always in some sense subject to the control of government agents in the form of his / her superiors. This tends to blur some of the distinctions drawn by civilian courts in this area of the law. See Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721 (1969); United States v. Scott, 22 M.J. 297 (C.M.A. 1986); United States v. Sanford, 12 M.J. 170 (C.M.A. 1981); United States v. Davis, 2 M.J. 1005 (A.C.M.R. 1976).

B.      Legality of Apprehension.

1.      First, one must ascertain whether an apprehension occurred at all. See United States v. Fisher, 5 M.J. 873 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 5 M.J. 400 (C.M.A. 1978).

a.      Article 7(a), UCMJ, and R.C.M. 302 define apprehension as "the taking of a person into custody."

b.      "Apprehension" in military parlance describes what civilians call "arrest."

c. In civilian practice, an arrest is normally the formal taking of a person into custody for the purpose of detaining him / her to answer for a criminal charge. In the military, such formalized procedures are not always followed; yet, an apprehension may occur. Again, given the fact that a servicemember in the military is always under some degree of control by the government, the fact of an apprehension is sometimes difficult to ascertain. Nonetheless, for an apprehension to occur, it appears that, at a minimum, the official exercising control must believe he or she is apprehending, and must manifest a degree of control over the individual such that the detainee should recognize that he or she is not free to go. See United States v. Kinane, 1 M.J. 309 (C.M.A. 1976).

2. Notification of apprehension

a. Article 9(a), UCMJ, indicates that the person to be restrained will be directed by an order to remain within specified limits.

b. An apprehension may occur without any formal announcement as long as it appears from the circumstances that the individual has been apprehended. United States v. Kinane, 1 M.J. 309, 314 (C.M.A. 1976).

c. See also Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979); United States v. Schneider, 14 M.J. 189 (C.M.A. 1982).

3. Who may apprehend?

a. Generally, officers, NCO's and petty officers, military police and CID personnel, and civilian agents of the military (such as NCIS agents) have authority to apprehend persons subject to the UCMJ, either under the UCMJ or by regulation. Others may be given the authority by regulation. Art. 7(b), 7(c), UCMJ; R.C.M. 302.

b. No "arrest" or "apprehension" warrant exists in the military, but R.C.M. 302(e) provides that apprehension of a suspect in a private dwelling may require an "apprehension authorization," which appears to be the functional equivalent of an arrest warrant.

4. Where may an apprehension take place?

a. Under the Constitution, no arrest warrant is necessary to arrest an individual in a public place. United States v. Watson, 423 U.S. 411, 96 (1976). See R.C.M. 302(e)(1).

b. Entry into private dwellings to make arrest. As a general proposition, the Fourth Amendment prohibits civilian government officials from entering a private dwelling without a warrant to make an arrest, see Payton v. New York, 445 U.S. 573 (1980), except when in "hot pursuit." Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967).

c. Normally, military officials may not enter a private dwelling to make an apprehension without prior command or judicial approval. United States v. Davis, 8 M.J. 79 (C.M.A. 1979); R.C.M. 302(e)(2)(C). However, they may make an entry without such prior approval where there exists probable cause to apprehend and:

(1) Exigencies preclude obtaining authorization, see United States v. Phinizy, 12 M.J. 40 (C.M.A. 1981); United States v. Davis, 13 M.J. 671 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982); R.C.M. 302(e)(2)(B);

(2) When the occupant consents, see United States v. Ward, 12 M.J. 846 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 13 M.J. 227 (C.M.A. 1982); R.C.M. 302(e)(2)(A);

(3) When entry is necessary for life-saving or related purposes. See Mil.R.Evid. 314(i). See also United States v. Rodriguez, 8 M.J. 648 (A.F.C.M.R. 1979), petition denied, 9 M.J. 48 (C.M.A. 1980).

d. In the military, the term "private dwelling" does not include barracks rooms, vessels, aircraft, vehicles, tents, bunkers, field encampments, etc. R.C.M. 302(e)(2). United States v. McCarthy, 38 M.J. 398 (C.M.A. 1993) (holding that no authorization was required to apprehend the accused in his dormitory-style barracks room).

(1) A military guest house (apparently equivalent to a Navy Lodge) was a "private dwelling" in United States v. Ayala, 26 M.J. 190 (C.M.A. 1988). The court, however, found the accused was apprehended lawfully, since exigent circumstances existed.

(2) In New York v. Harris, 495 U.S. 14 (1990), police had probable cause but no warrant when they arrested Harris at his home. Harris made statements at his house and later at the police station. The court found that the taint of the illegal arrest affected the statement at Harris' home, but did not render inadmissible the later station house statement.

e. The apprehension must be based on pre-existing probable cause. Art. 7(b), UCMJ; R.C.M. 302(c). See section 1307, supra, for a discussion of probable cause. See United States v. Pope, 3 M.J. 1037 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977), aff'd on reconsideration, 3 M.J. 1056 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977), wherein the court stated that an apprehension without probable cause cannot be validated by evidence obtained in a subsequent search.

(1) United States v. Tolliver, 6 M.J. 868 (N.C.M.R. 1979) (where apprehension of accused was not based upon probable cause, items found in a search incident to that apprehension and a subsequent confession were inadmissible).

(2) In United States v. Robinson, 6 M.J. 109 (C.M.A. 1979), a military policeman testified that he believed that the accused ran out of the gate because he possessed some kind of prohibited drug. The officer implied that his pursuit of the accused was not to investigate further the possibility of possession of contraband, but rather to apprehend the accused and search his person for such matter. The court held that the accused's discarding of a package of heroin was not a proper factor in determining whether probable cause existed to apprehend the accused, as that decision had already been made.

(3) Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979).

(4) United States v. Kinane, 1 M.J. 309 (C.M.A. 1976) (where the accused had not been apprehended at time detective ordered him to empty his pockets, resulting search was not justified as being incident to apprehension or custodial arrest). But see United States v. Schlauch, 20 M.J. 803 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985) (holding that an actual apprehension need not precede the search incident to apprehension as long as the probable cause to apprehend precedes the search, relying on a similar holding in United States v. Acosta, 11 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1981); United States v. Ward, 19 M.J. 505 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984) (holding a search of Ward invalid, even though there was probable cause to apprehend Ward; the court stated that Ward was not apprehended before or after the search, so the search could not be justified as being incident to an apprehension that never occurred). See also Smith v. Ohio, 494 U.S. 541 (1990).

C. Consequences on an illegal "seizure" of the person. As discussed above, even a brief detention of a person may be, in effect, a "seizure" which, if held to be unlawful, will require that any evidence derived from the unlawful seizure be suppressed.

1. Subsequent confession of the accused

a. In Brown v. Illinois, 422 U.S. 590 (1975), the defendant was "arrested" after authorities had illegally searched his apartment and found nothing of an incriminating nature. At the police station, he was given Miranda warnings and he subsequently confessed. The Supreme Court held that the Miranda warnings alone were insufficient to cleanse the Fourth Amendment violation, as the Miranda warnings were designed primarily to protect Fifth Amendment rights.

b. In Dunaway v. New York, 442 U.S. 200 (1979), the police lacked probable cause to arrest, but nonetheless brought Dunaway to the police station for questioning, where he confessed after receiving his Miranda warnings. The Supreme Court found that an illegal seizure of the person had taken place, notwithstanding the fact that there had been no formal "arrest."

c. Military courts have generally followed the Brown / Dunaway analysis while keeping in mind the specialized needs of the military.

d. If the accused was in custody within the meaning of Article 7, UCMJ, the court will test for probable cause for the apprehension. If the accused was held in custody without probable cause, the court must examine the causal connection between the illegality and the confession. Should there be insufficient attenuation between the illegal custody and the confession, the confession may not be admitted. Note, however, while even a brief detention of a suspect may be a seizure, such detention may not necessarily be an apprehension. Thus, something less than probable cause, such as "reasonable suspicion," may be sufficient to justify the detention.

e. Mil.R.Evid. 311(e)(2) provides that where an apprehension in a dwelling violates Rule for Courts-Martial 302(d)(2), any otherwise admissible statement obtained outside the dwelling is nevertheless admissible if the apprehension was supported by probable cause. This rule is based on the Supreme Court's holding in New York v. Harris, 495 U.S. 14 (1990).

2. Subsequent eyewitness identification of the accused. Although eyewitness identification is covered in a separate chapter, infra, it should be noted that, where the witness' identity was discovered solely as a result of the unlawful detention or apprehension of the accused, any subsequent identification will be suppressed. See Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963). The witness' in-court identification of the accused may still be permitted, however, if the prosecution shows that the apprehension did not produce the witness' presence at trial and did not taint the witness' ability to make an accurate in-court identification. See United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463 (1980).

3. Subsequent searches

a. In Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983), it was permissible to detain Royer temporarily because he fit a drug courier profile, but retaining his airplane ticket and his driver's license and requesting him to go to a small police room constituted an arrest without probable cause. Consequently, the subsequent consent to search was invalid. Royer was distinguished in United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675 (1985), where there were valid arrests and vehicle searches after a twenty-minute delay. The court stated that law enforcement agents must consider whether authorities diligently pursued means of investigation likely to confirm or dispel suspicions quickly.

b. Hayes v. Florida, 470 U.S. 811 (1985), held that police could not lawfully take Hayes to the police station for fingerprinting based on mere reasonable suspicion. But see United States v. Fagan, 28 M.J. 64 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 110 S. Ct. 83 (1989). Any military person can be ordered to give fingerprints for identification purposes. Such an order does not amount to a seizure of the person.

D. Custody. In the military, it is often unclear whether an individual is in custody. United States v. Thomas, 21 M.J. 928 (A.C.M.R. 1986), includes a good discussion of this issue and asks whether an individual's freedom of movement was restrained significantly beyond the point where any servicemember's freedom of movement may be circumscribed without constitutional infringement. United States v. Scott, 22 M.J. 297 (C.M.A. 1986), also addresses the issue and outlines an approach for analyzing admissibility of a subsequent confession. See also United States v. Schneider, 14 M.J. 189 (C.M.A. 1982) (where accused was brought to investigator's office under guard and circumstances clearly indicated that he was a suspect, such seizure required probable cause); United States v. Escobedo, 11 M.J. 51 (C.M.A. 1981); United States v. Texidor-Perez, 7 M.J. 356 (C.M.A. 1979).

E. Stop and frisk

1. Limited investigatory stop. Mil.R.Evid. 314(f)(1).

a. It is reasonable for a law enforcement agent to stop an individual when the law enforcement agent "observes unusual conduct which leads him reasonably to conclude in light of his experience that criminal activity may be afoot." Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1, 30 (1968). Additionally, a law enforcement agent may frisk the individual if the law enforcement agent reasonably believes the individual may be armed and is presently dangerous to him / herself or others. If, while conducting the frisk of the outer clothing, the officer feels a weapon, the officer may reach in and seize it. Note that the stop and the frisk must be justified; a proper stop does not necessarily justify a frisk. The Supreme Court has emphasized the ability of trained law officers to infer criminal activity from facts that might appear meaningless to the less experienced. The essence of the stop theory is that the totality of the circumstances must be taken into account. Based upon that "whole picture," the detaining officers must have a particularized and objective basis for inspecting that particular person stopped for criminal activity. United States v. Cortez, 449 U.S. 411 (1981). The Supreme Court has found that reasonable suspicion may be based on: information read off police bulletin board, United States v. Hensley, 469 U.S. 221 (1985), flight of an individual when police officer approaches, California v. Hodari D., 111 S.Ct. 1547 (1991), a detailed anonymous tip, Alabama v. White, 496 U.S. 325 (1990), and even noncriminal activity which fits a "drug courier" profile, United States v. Sokolow, 490 U.S. 1 (1989).

b. Military cases

(1) United States v. Phillips, 30 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1990) (no reasonable suspicion for MP to stop and detain a soldier leaving in a taxi who had just exited a warehouse with a 27-inch television).

(2) United States v. Garrett, 15 M.J. 601 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982) (suppressing evidence found during stop and frisk because there was no reason to believe the individuals stopped were armed and dangerous).

(3) United States v. Yandell, 13 M.J. 616 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 16 M.J. 158 (C.M.A. 1983) (search of box accused was carrying was part of a legitimate stop and frisk).

c. A stop and frisk may also be justified when the criminal activity has already occurred and the individual stopped is a suspect. United States v. Cepulonis, 530 F.2d 238 (1st Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 426 U.S. 908 (1976).

d. The stop (and frisk) may be based on hearsay. Adams v. Williams, 407 U.S. 143 (1972); United States v. Edwards, 3 M.J. 921 (A.C.M.R. 1977) (investigative stop in response to informant's tip was appropriate).

e. Motor vehicles. Delaware v. Prouse, 440 U.S. 648 (1979); United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976); United States v. Brignoni-Ponce, 422 U.S. 873 (1975); United States v. Swinson, 48 C.M.R. 197 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974). See Michigan v. Long, 463 U.S. 1032 (1983) (after valid Terry stop of driver of automobile along roadside, police may perform limited examination of passenger compartment for weapons); Mil.R.Evid. 314(f)(3). See also, United States v. Rodriguez, 44 M.J. 766 (NMCCA 1996).

f. Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977). The court in Mimms held that it is lawful for a police officer who has stopped a car for a traffic violation to order the driver out of the car. Articulable suspicion, upon the driver's exit from car, that the driver was armed justified the frisk.

(1) Mimms does not hold that all drivers stopped for traffic violations may be frisked. They may be compelled to exit their car, but a frisk is justified only if independent grounds exist to suspect the individual is armed.

(2) The initial stop of the car must, of course, be justified.

(3) Mimms tacitly recognizes a distinction between a traffic arrest, where only a citation will be issued, and a lawful custodial arrest, wherein a full search is justified. See United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973); Gustafson v. Florida, 414 U.S. 260 (1973).

2. Detention during a search. If the evidence that a citizen's residence is harboring contraband is sufficient to persuade a judicial officer that an invasion of the citizen's privacy is justified, then it is constitutionally reasonable to detain citizens at their residence while police officers execute a valid search warrant. Michigan v. Summers, 452

3. The frisk. Mil.R.Evid. 314(f)(2).

a. In addition to the stop, there must be a basis for the frisk; that is, there must be reason to believe that the suspect is armed. See Terry v. Ohio, 392 U.S. 1 (1968), Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40 (1968), Pennsylvania v. Mimms, 434 U.S. 106 (1977), and United States v. Mireles, 583 F.2d 1115 (10th Cir.), cert. denied, 439 U.S. 936 (1978).

b. The frisk is limited to looking for weapons. Sibron v. New York, 392 U.S. 40 (1968).

4. Plain feel. If, during the course of a stop and frisk, the law enforcement officer discovers something that the agent recognizes to be contraband, then the law enforcement agent can seize the object. However, the law enforcement agent may not manipulate an item in order to discover its contraband nature. Minnesota v. Dickerson, 113 S. Ct. 2130 (1993).

5. After the initial stop. It is unclear what can be done when, after the stop (and frisk, if any), the law enforcement official is still suspicious but does not have probable cause to make an apprehension. Probably, the law enforcement official must simply let the subject go.

a. Continued detention. See United States v. Montoya De Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531 (1985); Florida v. Royer, 460 U.S. 491 (1983); United States v. Place, 462 U.S. 696 (1983). See also United States v. Zeigler, 20 C.M.A. 523, 43 C.M.R. 363 (1971). Although thought to be an unauthorized civilian who had twice given false information as to his true identity, it was lawful to detain the accused until his true identity could be obtained. To determine his identity, it was appropriate to examine his wallet. This examination resulted in seizing an unauthorized identification card.

(1) Police diligence test: "In assessing whether a detention is too long in duration to be justified as an investigative stop, we consider it appropriate to examine whether the police diligently pursued a means of investigation that was likely to confirm or dispel the suspicions quickly during which time it was necessary to detain the defendant." United States v. Sharpe, 470 U.S. 675, 686 (1985).

b. Questioning. There is little agreement on what questions can be asked of the detainee, at least beyond requesting identification. Note that the right to question does not necessarily include the right to compel answers. See Mil.R.Evid. 314(f) drafters' analysis, MCM (1995 ed.), app. 22-26. Note, too, that if a military member who is stopped is suspected of committing an offense, warnings regarding the right against self-incrimination should be given.

c. The "Deceptive Stop". Even though police may have "ulterior motives" (suspicion consent of drug trafficking) the stop of a vehicle is permitted as long as the police have probable cause that an offenses has been committed (even a minor traffic offenses). Whren v. United States, 517 U.S. 806 (1996)

1311 SEARCH INCIDENT TO APPREHENSION. (Key

A. Generally. Mil.R.Evid. 314(g). For evidentiary purposes, we are seldom concerned at trial with the legitimacy of an apprehension unless evidence was derived therefrom (e.g., seizure of items subsequent to a search incident to apprehension; a statement taken from the suspect). If such evidence is offered, we are concerned with two things:

a. Was the apprehension lawful? If not, is the evidence seized admissible?

b. Was the evidence otherwise obtained in a lawful fashion?

B. Legality of Apprehension. See Section 1310 B.

C. Scope of search incident to apprehension. Once a lawful apprehension has occurred, what may be searched incident thereto?

1. Search of the person. Mil.R.Evid. 314(g)(1).

a. A full search of the person apprehended is proper in any lawful custodial arrest, regardless of the likelihood (or lack thereof) of the presence of weapons or evidence. The scope of the search in such situations is not limited by the nature of the crime for which the person is apprehended, nor by the likelihood that the individual is armed. United States v. Robinson, 414 U.S. 218 (1973); Gustafson v. Florida, 414 U.S. 260 (1973).

b. Mil.R.Evid. 312(b)(2) (visual examination of unclothed body permissible pursuant to valid apprehension).

c. Extraction of bodily fluids may not be justified as a search incident to apprehension. Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966).

2. Search beyond the person

a. It is proper to search an area within the arrestee's immediate control for weapons and destructible evidence. The "area within immediate control" generally describes that area into which the apprehendee could reach with a sudden movement in order to secure a weapon or destructible evidence. This has been described as "wingspan" or as "lunging distance." Chimel v. California, 395 U.S. 752 (1969). Other circumstances surrounding the apprehension may give rise to a need to search beyond the Chimel limits. See generally Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30 (1970). Some of the possible justifications for such an additional intrusion are discussed below.

(1) Seeking other offenders. Mil.R.Evid. 314(g) provides that, where other persons might be present who would interfere with the apprehension or endanger those apprehending, a reasonable examination may be made of the general area in which such persons might be located. A person's mere presence near those suspected of an offense does not, however, without more, give rise to apprehend or search that person. Ybarra v. Illinois, 444 U.S. 85 (1979).

(2) Obtaining wearing apparel. If the apprehendee wishes to secure clothing or toilet articles for use while detained, police may examine those places from which the articles are to be obtained in order to check for weapons or destructible evidence. See United States v. Manarite, 314 F. Supp. 607 (S.D.N.Y. 1970), aff'd, 448 F.2d 583 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 404 U.S. 947 (1971) and Giacalone v. Lucas, 445 F.2d 1238 (6th Cir. 1971), cert. denied, 405 U.S. 922 (1972).

(3) The courts have demonstrated a preference for the arresting officers maintaining the status quo and securing a search warrant, rather than immediately searching beyond the person, when it is believed evidence may be on the premises. Thus, surveillance or impoundment, rather than an immediate search, may be necessary. See Vale v. Louisiana, 399 U.S. 30 (1970). But see United States v. Johnson, 561 F.2d 832 (D.C. Cir. 1977). Officers saw what appeared to be the packaging of narcotics through a basement window and, as a result, conducted a warrantless search. The court upheld the search on the belief that exigent circumstances existed due to the possibility that the narcotics could have been removed if time (approximately two hours) had been taken to get a search warrant.

b. The majority of courts adopt an ad hoc test to evaluate whether law enforcement agents could reasonably and honestly believe that the suspect could reach a given place when they searched more than the suspect's person.

(1) The Supreme Court apparently adopted this view in United States v. Chadwick, 433 U.S. 1 (1977). The Court held that a search of a locked footlocker weighing some 200 pounds, seized when Chadwick was arrested and searched an hour-and-a-half later, was illegal. While conceding that probable cause to search the footlocker apparently existed, Chief Justice Burger, writing for the seven-member majority, held that where, as here, the police had custody of the footlocker, and there was no danger of its contents being lost or destroyed, the failure to secure a search warrant was fatal. The search was not incident to arrest because "[o]nce law enforcement officers have reduced luggage or other personal property not immediately associated with the person of the arrestee to their exclusive control, and there is no longer any danger that the arrestee might gain access to the property to seize a weapon or destroy evidence, a search of that property is no longer an incident of the arrest." Id. at 5. Chadwick therefore reaffirms the historical emphasis the Supreme Court has placed upon the warrant requirement.

(2) Automobiles. New York v. Belton, 453 U.S. 454 (1981).

In this far-reaching decision, all the occupants of an automobile were removed from the car and arrested. A police officer re-entered the automobile and retrieved a jacket from the rear seat of the passenger compartment. Cocaine was discovered in a jacket pocket.

(a) The Court upheld the seizure as a search incident to a lawful arrest. The Court stated that when a policeman has made a lawful custodial arrest of the occupant of an automobile, he may, as a contemporaneous incident of that arrest, search the passenger compartment of that automobile.

(b) Containers. It follows from this conclusion that the police may also examine the contents of any containers found within the passenger compartment, for if the passenger compartment is within reach of the arrestee, so also will containers in it be within his reach. Id. at 460. The term "container" was defined by the Court in Belton, 453 U.S. at 460 n.4, as follows: "Container" here denotes any object capable of holding another object. It thus includes closed or open glove compartments, consoles, or other receptacles located anywhere within the passenger compartment, as well as luggage, boxes, bags, clothing, and the like. Our holding encompasses only the interior of the passenger compartment of an automobile and does not encompass the trunk.

(c) Mil.R.Evid. 314(g) adopts the Belton rule in searches incident to the apprehension of an occupant of an automobile.

(d) United States v. Cordero, 11 M.J. 210 (C.M.A. 1981) (under theory of search incident to lawful apprehension, the court upheld the seizure of a plastic bag containing hashish, found under the front seat of a car).

(e) It may also be possible to impound the car and inventory it, depending on the nature of the apprehension and the standard procedures of the apprehending agency. Again, an inventory may not be used as a subterfuge for a search. See section 1312 B., infra.

c. Mil.R.Evid. 314(g)(3) provides that if the individual making an apprehension has a "reasonable suspicion based on specific and articulable facts" that someone may be in the general area who might pose a threat, the apprehending official may make a "reasonable examination" of the general area. Even without articulable suspicion, the apprehending official can look into closets and other spaces immediately surrounding the location of the apprehension. This provision is based on Maryland v. Buie, 494 U.S. 325 (1990).

3. Time limits. Generally, a search incident to apprehension must be conducted within a short time after apprehension. For example, in Preston v. United States, 376 U.S. 364 (1964), the search of the suspect's car was not conducted until the persons who had occupied it had been arrested and taken in custody to the police station and the car towed to a garage. The Court found the search too remote in time or place to have been incidental to the arrest and, therefore, the evidence seized was inadmissible. In Chambers v. Maroney, 399 U.S. 42 (1970), a search of an automobile that produced incriminating evidence was made at a police station some time after the arrest of the car's occupants. The Court held that the search could not be justified as a search incident to an arrest. Where circumstances make conducting the search within a short time infeasible, however, the search of the person may be delayed until it is more reasonable to conduct it. See United States v. Edwards, 415 U.S. 800 (1974) (valid search of person at place of detention ten hours after arrest). See also United States v. Zeigler, 14 M.J. 860 (A.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 15 M.J. 461 (C.M.A. 1983) (seizure of rape suspect's undershirts six hours after apprehension was still a search incident to arrest); United States v. Pechefsky, 13 M.J. 814 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 14 M.J. 293 (C.M.A. 1983) (accused apprehended at bowling alley and strip-searched 120 minutes later, still searched incident to apprehension).

1312 THE LEGALITY OF THE SEIZURE (Key Numbers 1076, 1077)

A. Separate question. The legality of a seizure is a separate question from the legality of any search that may have taken place. Thus, one must examine not only how a government official got to a given place, but why, once there, he seized a given piece of evidence. United States v. Burnside, 15 C.M.A. 326, 35 C.M.R. 298 (1965).

1. In order for an item to be properly seized, the official seizing it must have a reasonable belief, at the time he or she seizes the item, that the item is connected with a crime (i.e., contraband), the fruit of a crime, or (in some circumstances) a weapon, or an aid in linking the party to the crime. See Warden v. Hayden, 387 U.S. 294 (1967). There is no rule that prohibits searches for and seizures of "mere evidence" in the military.

2. The validity of the seizure is a question that cuts across all other categories of Fourth Amendment law. Therefore, whatever the legal theory under which the prosecution seeks to justify a search, it must also establish that the seizure was legal. Various categories of legitimate seizures are listed in Mil.R.Evid. 316(d), including seizure of abandoned property or government property, seizure with the owner's consent or commander authorization based on probable cause, seizure due to exigent circumstances (and probable cause), temporary detention, and seizure based on the plain view doctrine. There may be circumstances in which a search is lawful, but a consequent seizure does not satisfy the criteria of any of the permissible Mil.R.Evid. 316(d) categories. Conversely, it may occur that evidence is inadmissible at trial because its legitimate seizure (e.g., of government property) was the result of an illegal search.

B. The plain view doctrine. Mil.R.Evid. 316(d)(4)(C).

1. The plain view doctrine is concerned with the legality of seizures. The plain view doctrine posits that, if the government official was legitimately situated where he or she saw an item, and if the government official reasonably believed that the item seen was connected with criminal activity, then the item can be seized.

a. This doctrine was described in the leading plain view case of Coolidge v. New Hampshire, 403 U.S. 443 (1971): "What the 'plain view' cases have in common is that (1) the police officer in each of them had a prior justification for an intrusion, (2) in the course of which he came inadvertently across a piece of evidence, and (3) incriminating the accused." Id. at 466 (Stewart, J., for plurality) (emphasis added). Thus, Coolidge identified a three-factor test.

b. Note that, if an official sees an item in plain view, he or she may not be able to seize it if to do so would entail a physical intrusion not already made. For example, a policeman walking down the street sees contraband through a picture window in a house. He may not, absent exigent circumstances, enter the house without a warrant in order to seize the item, although he may use his observations to secure a warrant. In United States v. Whaley, 781 F.2d 417 (5th Cir. 1986), marijuana was seen growing in the curtilage. There was probable cause but no exigent circumstance, and a warrant should have been sought. The plain view doctrine could have justified seizure of the marijuana if the officer legitimately had gained access to the curtilage, but it could not justify entrance into the curtilage.

c. Note also that, if an item is found under circumstances which indicate that it is abandoned, then generally a search or seizure need not be justified because no one has retained a privacy interest in the item.

2. The three factors for evaluating the applicability of the plain view doctrine are discussed below.

a. Prior justification for the intrusion

(1) Wherever the government official was when the item was first observed, the official must have been there legitimately.

(2) Under some circumstances, this may not involve any physical intrusion (e.g., climbing a tree in order to look into a second-story window). There is still a question whether the official was legitimately situated when he or she saw or heard or smelled the item, such that he or she could properly act upon this information.

(3) The question to be addressed when there is no physical intrusion is whether the government agent's acts were an intrusion upon a reasonable expectation of privacy; if so, they must be justified under the Fourth Amendment. Consider these illustrative authorities.

(a) United States v. Knotts, 460 U.S. 276 (1983) (use of beeper in five-gallon can of chloroform, precursor ingredient of amphetamines, did not alter plain view character of surveillance of accused's actions in his automobile).

(b) United States v. Young, 35 C.M.R. 852 (A.F.B.R. 1965) (court implied that use of ultraviolet light to reveal stains on defendant's hand did not violate his Fourth Amendment rights).

(c) The use of natural senses or artificial illumination does not by itself violate an individual's expectation of privacy. See, e.g., Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730 (1983) (shining flashlight to illuminate the interior of the accused's car did not constitute a search).

(d) Using a concealed beeper to follow a container is permissible. Presumably, it would be impermissible to obtain information from such a beeper once it was in a private residence, which information would not be obtainable otherwise without search authorization. United States v. Knotts, 460 U.S. 276 (1983); United States v. Karo, 468 U.S. 705 (1984).

(e) Harris v. United States, 390 U.S. 234 (1968) (evidence sighted during check for valuables in the interior of impounded car was properly seized).

(f) Compare United States v. Hersh, 464 F.2d 228 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 409 U.S. 1008 (1972) (observations made by police through window of house not illegal; officers approached house openly, in broad daylight, merely looked through windows located immediately to left of front door and did not have to move bushes or other objects out of the way to do so) with United States v. Johnson, 561 F.2d 832 (D.C. Cir.), cert. denied, 432 U.S. 907 (1977).

(g) Compare Texas v. Gonzales, 388 F.2d 145 (5th Cir. 1968) (observations made at night by police officer through window located in rear of defendant's house violated defendant's right to privacy) and United States v. Kaliski, 37 M.J. 105 (C.M.A. 1993) with Nordskog v. Wainwright, 546 F.2d 69 (5th Cir. 1977).

(h) United States v. Cruz, 3 M.J. 707 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977) (agent opened car door to lock it; items viewed when he did so were properly seized as in plain view), rev'd on other grounds, 5 M.J. 286 (C.M.A. 1978).

(i) In United States v. Hessler, 4 M.J. 303 (C.M.A. 1978), aff'd on reconsideration, 7 M.J. 9 (C.M.A. 1979), Judge Cook addressed the question of the legitimacy of a duty officer's presence in the barracks. Finding him properly present, Judge Cook applied a "plain smell" theory to the officer's actions upon smelling marijuana.

(j) United States v. Escobedo, 11 M.J. 51 (C.M.A. 1981) (once properly on premises to search, agents entitled to seize paraphernalia as items in plain view, without regard to whether they were specified in search authorization).

(k) United States v. Lawless, 18 M.J. 255 (C.M.A. 1984) (the smelling of burning marijuana by military policemen while on foot patrol in the enlisted housing area justified their going to an open window of the house and looking inside).

(4) United States v. Wisniewski, 21 M.J. 370 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 476 U.S. 1160 (1986) is a very interesting case which was ultimately decided on the basis of the plain view doctrine. The court held that no reasonable expectation of privacy was violated by looking through a 1/8" by 3/8" slot in the venetian blinds into a locked barracks room (plain view of any passerby). In addition, once in the room, the NCO could seize contraband from a locked locker under the plain view doctrine because he had earlier observed (through a slot in the blinds) the contraband being put in the locker. Compare this outcome with United States v. Kaliski, 37 M.J. 105 (C.M.A. 1993), where the court excluded evidence developed as a result of military police investigators entering the accused's rear patio to look through a gap in the curtains. The court held, "Looking into the window of a private residence is a search." Id. at 108. The court continued, "A plain view observation does not constitute an unreasonable search if made from a place where the observer has a right to be." In this case, investigators had no right to be on the accused's patio. Id.

b. Inadvertence. The inadvertence requirement was eliminated by the Supreme Court in Horton v. California, 496 U.S. 128 (1990).

c. Nexus to criminal prosecution. The plain view observation of an item does not by itself justify the seizure. Before such a seizure is justifiable, the prosecution must show that the officer who seized the item had a reasonable belief that the item had a nexus to criminal prosecution. Texas v. Brown, 460 U.S. 730 (1983). This is merely another way of stating that there must be a basis for the seizure as well as for the activity which led up to it. Mil.R.Evid. 316(d)(4)(C) establishes a probable cause standard. In Arizona v. Hicks, 480 U.S. 321 (1987), police officers legitimately entered an apartment (bullet fired through floor had injured someone on floor below), but moving stereo equipment to locate serial numbers was an unlawful search. The equipment could have been seized under the plain view doctrine if the police had probable cause that it was stolen, but they did not. See United States v. Gladdis, 11 M.J. 845 (A.C.M.R. 1981), remanded, 12 M.J. 102 (C.M.A. 1982), wherein seizure of a spoon was upheld based upon knowledge that spoons are commonly used to prepare heroin for injection. See also United States v. Sanchez, 10 M.J. 273 (C.M.A. 1981) (a pipe was properly seized because it was a type of pipe normally used to smoke marijuana). But see United States v. Van Hoose, 11 M.J. 878 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 12 M.J. 301 (C.M.A. 1981) (command authorization to search room for marijuana did not give probable cause to seize homosexual magazines and literature as these items were not, on their face, "evidence of crime").

1313            EXCLUSIONARY RULE (Key Number 1045)

A.        General

1.        The Fourth Amendment is an important subject in the law of criminal procedure because its primary mode of enforcement is an evidentiary rule, the exclusionary rule, which forbids the admission of evidence secured in violation of the Fourth Amendment. See Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (1961); Weeks v. United States, 232 U.S. 383 (1914). In addition to evidence which is itself obtained illegally, evidence which is derived from illegal government activities may be subject to the exclusion sanction. Nardone v. United States, 308 U.S. 338 (1939); Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920).

2.        The rationale for the exclusionary rule is deterrence of official misconduct. The rule is designed to discourage violations of the Fourth Amendment by denying law enforcement officials the use of the fruits of such violations in subsequent prosecutions. Mere violation of a statute providing civil remedies for noncompliance does not automatically trigger the exclusionary rule. United States v. Jackson, 25 M.J. 711 (A.C.M.R. 1987) (government failed to comply with Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978, 12 U.S.C. § 3401 et seq., in that it failed to provide notice to the accused before obtaining bank record).

3. Good faith exception

a. In 1984, the Supreme Court embraced a "good faith" exception which severely restricts the scope of this suppression remedy. In essence, judges should conduct a case-by-case analysis to ascertain whether application of the exclusionary rule would further its deterrence justification. When the police conduct is objectively reasonable, the rule should not be applied. When the police were dishonest or reckless, however, suppression of the fruits of this illegal search would deter such misconduct. See United States v. Leon, 468 U.S. 897 (1984) (warrant unsupported by probable cause did not require suppression); Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984) (warrant which did not specifically describe the items seized did not warrant suppression); Illinois v. Krull, 480 U.S. 340 (1987) (good faith exception applied to authorities relying on statute later held unconstitutional).

b. Mil.R.Evid. 311(b)(3) expressly adopts the good faith exception. It provides that the exclusionary rule will not be applied if the person authorizing the search was competent to do so, he / she had a substantial basis for deciding probable cause existed (even though a court now disagrees with that decision), and those seeking his / her authorization and those executing it acted in good faith. An objective standard is used (i.e., a reasonably well-trained law enforcement officer would have known. . . .). Examples of bad faith might include seeking search authorization with information known to be false or to have been obtained from an earlier illegal search, "magistrate shopping," or executing a search authorization which was patently deficient (e.g., place to be searched not specified) or was purpose of good faith exception to cover inadvertent omissions? Massachusetts v. Sheppard, 468 U.S. 981 (1984).

c. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has recognized that the good faith exception applies to command-authorized searches where the authorizing official acted in a neutral and detached manner. United States v. Lopez, 35 M.J. 35 (C.M.A. 1992).

d. In one of the first cases ever decided by CAAF concerning the search of computers and electronic mail, the Court held that in order for the good faith exception to apply, "it must be clear that the [law enforcement] agents doing the search were relying on a defective warrant." United States v. Maxwell, 45 M.J. 406 (1996).

B. Fruit of the Poisonous Tree: Prerequisite of causal connection. Showing that the initial search is illegal does not per se make any evidence obtained thereafter inadmissible. Such inadmissibility must rest on the existence of a causal connection between the illegal activity and the derivative evidence. Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963); United States v. Decker, 16 C.M.A. 397, 402, 37 C.M.R. 17, 22 (1967); Mil.R.Evid. 311(e). The test is not a "but for" test, but rather one that looks to the actual causal link between the illegal act and the evidence. Evidence obtained after the initial illegality is inadmissible unless the government can establish that the causal connection between its illegal act and the subsequently obtained evidence was insubstantial. There are three basic means by which the government may do this: (1) Independent Source," see Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920); (2) Attenuation, see Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963); or (3) Inevitable Discovery, see Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984); United States v. Kozak, 12 M.J. 389 (C.M.A. 1982).

1. Independent source and attenuation

a. Courts examine how a given piece of evidence was obtained to determine:

(1) Whether it was procured through means totally unrelated to (independent of) the illegal governmental activity, see United States v. Waller, 3 M.J. 32 (C.M.A. 1977); or

(2) whether the causal relationship of the illegality and the obtaining of the evidence was so remote (attenuated) as to be of minimal effect, although a cause and effect relationship between the illegality and the proffered evidence may exist. See Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963).

b. If either of these conditions are proved by the government, the evidence will be admissible.

c. Several illustrative cases are set forth below.

(1) United States v. Lee, 274 U.S. 559 (1927) (Coast Guard cutter illegally halted and boarded another ship on the high seas. During this operation, Federal agents saw several cases of contraband whiskey on the deck. The agents testified that, before halting the "rum runner," they observed and recognized the cargo in full view on the deck. This observation was held not to be the result of the illegal search).

(2) United States v. Boisvert, 1 M.J. 817 (A.F.C.M.R. 1976) (the accused's car was located without aid of the information illegally obtained from the accused as to its whereabouts).

(3) United States v. Sowards, 5 M.J. 864 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 6 M.J. 127 (C.M.A. 1978) (testimony of witness against accused was not tainted by allegedly illegal search of accused's quarters where witness' identity became known through totally independent source).

(4) United States v. Corley, 6 M.J. 526 (A.C.M.R. 1978), petition denied, 6 M.J. 192 (C.M.A. 1979) (consent to second search was tainted by illegality of first warrantless search since illegal first search served as coercive influence on consent to second search).

(5) United States v. Kesteloot, 8 M.J. 209 (C.M.A. 1980) (testimony by a woman with whom the accused was living was not derived from evidence tainted by an illegal search, but was derived from an independent investigation dealing with the woman).

2. Inevitable discovery

a. In Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984), the Court expressly adopted the inevitable discovery doctrine.

b. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces had adopted the rule in United States v. Kozak, 12 M.J. 389 (C.M.A. 1982). The court in Kozak held that the seizure of drugs from a train station locker was justified since their discovery would have been inevitable through exercise of proper police procedures authorized by proper authority despite the prior illegal search of the locker.

In applying this exception to the exclusionary rule in the future, we will require that after an accused challenges the legality of a search, the prosecution must, by a preponderance of the evidence, establish . . . that when the illegality occurred, the government agents possessed or were actively pursuing evidence or leads which would have inevitably led to the discovery of the evidence and that the evidence would have been inevitably discovered in a lawful manner had not the illegality occurred.

Id. at 394. It further appears that absolute inevitability of discovery is not required; rather, all that is required is "simply a reasonable probability that the evidence in question would have been discovered from other than a tainted source." United States v. Lewis, 15 M.J. 656, 657 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983), petition denied, 21 M.J. 284 (C.M.A. 1985). United States v. Maxwell 45 M.J. 406 (1996). See also United States v. Lawless, 18 M.J. 255 (C.M.A. 1984). But see Nix v. Williams, 467 U.S. 431 (1984) (government must establish inevitability by preponderance of evidence). Mil.R.Evid. 304(b) and 311(b)(2) were amended in 1986 to incorporate the inevitable discovery exception.

c. In United States v. Carrubba, 19 M.J. 896 (A.C.M.R. 1985), although accused's consent to search the trunk of his car was invalid because of his intoxication, the evidence discovered in the vehicle was nonetheless admissible under the inevitable discovery doctrine. A military policeman was on his way to obtain command authorization to conduct the challenged search when he was recalled because the accused consented. The court said he had probable cause but, even if he did not, there was other information, unknown to him, which clearly established probable cause. Therefore, command authorization would have been obtained ultimately.

C. Witness' testimony subject to exclusion

1. In United States v. Ceccolini, 435 U.S. 268 (1978), the Supreme Court reaffirmed the principle that a live witness may be subject to exclusion under the fruit of the poisonous tree rule, but the Court stated that the analysis of the effect of the initial illegal act is somewhat different with a witness than when the concern is the admissibility of physical or documentary evidence. Among the factors discussed by the Supreme Court as tending to attenuate the taint in this case were:

- a. The free will (i.e., absence of coercion or inducement, of the witness in testifying);
- b. the absence of collateral exploitation of the initial illegality;
- c. the passage of time between the illegality and contact of the witness, and between the latter and the trial;
- d. the lack of egregiousness of the initial illegality; and
- e. the possibility of discovery "in due course."

2. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has adopted the Ceccolini approach. United States v. Kaliski, 37 M.J. 105 (C.M.A. 1993).

3. Counsel must distinguish motions to suppress testimony about the illegal search from motions seeking to suppress testimony which is itself the product of the illegal search. See United States v. Hale, 1 M.J. 323 (C.M.A. 1976).

D. Impeachment

1. Evidence that was obtained as a result of an unlawful search or seizure may be used to impeach by contradiction the in-court testimony of the accused. Mil.R.Evid. 311(b)(1). See also United States v. Havens, 446 U.S. 620 (1980) (proper to use illegally seized evidence to impeach an accused's testimony).

1314 ADEQUATE INTEREST (STANDING) (Key Number 1082)

A. Generally

1. Whether an accused has an adequate interest or standing (the terms are hereinafter used interchangeably) to contest the search or seizure depends upon property and privacy concepts. For an accused to have standing to object to a search or seizure, not only must a search or seizure under the Fourth Amendment have occurred, but the accused must have had a protectable interest in the place searched or the item seized. In other words, it is not necessary for an accused to have had a property interest in the place searched or item seized. A reasonable expectation of privacy in the place searched or item seized suffices.

2. The concept of "adequate interest" or "standing" is often blurred by the courts. Thus, it is not uncommon for a court to reject a motion to suppress on grounds that the accused lacks standing when, in fact, what the court is really saying is that a search and seizure occurred, that it affected the accused, but that it was, in the final analysis, reasonable. Standing should be viewed not as involving a question of the legitimacy of governmental actions under the Fourth Amendment, but rather as raising the questions of whether a Fourth Amendment interest is involved at all and, if so, whether this accused had sufficient personal interest affected in order to be permitted to litigate it. See generally United States v. Bowles, 7 M.J. 735 (A.F.C.M.R. 1979), petition denied, 8 M.J. 42 (C.M.A. 1980) (passenger in automobile who failed to show legitimate personal expectation of privacy within car did not have standing to contest search). Additionally, an accused cannot vicariously assert violations of another person's Fourth Amendment rights. United States v. Escobedo, 11 M.J. 51 (C.M.A. 1981).

1. Mil.R.Evid. 311(a)(2) covers three concepts.

a. The first is the concept of standing to contest the legality of a search, which attack, if successful, could lead to the suppression of the seized items as fruits of the search.

b. The second concept is that of standing to contest the legality of the seizure of the evidence, regardless of whether the accused has standing to challenge the search.

c. Finally, by recognizing other constitutional grounds that may apply to members of the armed forces, the rule would incorporate other court-recognized rules that may evolve.

B. Standing to contest the search. While, in earlier cases, the Supreme Court had talked about governmental intrusion into "constitutionally protected areas," in Katz v. United States, 389 U.S. 347 (1967), the court rejected this notion and announced that the Fourth Amendment protects "people not places." Thus, while Katz had no property interest in the public phone booth to which government agents had attached an electronic listening device, he was found to have a "reasonable expectation of privacy" under the two-prong test announced by the Court. The "prongs" are: (1) Has the individual's conduct exhibited an actual (subjective) expectation of privacy? and (2) Is this subjective expectation of privacy one that society is prepared to accept as reasonable? See also Smith v. Maryland, 442 U.S. 735 (1979) (no reasonable expectation of privacy where pen registers installed without a warrant).

1. Presence at site. In Rakas v. Illinois, 439 U.S. 128 (1978) the Court held that presence at the site of the search was merely one factor to which the courts would look in determining whether the accused had a legitimate expectation of privacy in the area searched. In Rakas, the Court held that the accused, as a passenger in a car, had no reasonable expectation of privacy under the seat and in the glove compartment of the automobile. See also Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980) (accused, who was present within house at same time as associate, had no legitimate expectation of privacy in associate's purse where evidence was discovered); United States v. Kesteloot, 8 M.J. 209 (C.M.A. 1980) (inasmuch as accused was living in apartment with a woman at time of search, he had standing to contest search which occurred in his absence).

2. Presence of items seized. Mere ownership of the items seized during a search will not necessarily provide the accused with standing to object to the search. See Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1980) (mere ownership of drugs in associate's purse did not cover standing to object to search); United States v. McCullough, 14 M.J. 409 (C.M.A. 1983); United States v. Miller, 13 M.J. 75 (C.M.A. 1982); United States v. Sanford, 12 M.J. 170 (C.M.A. 1981) (accused retained no legitimate expectation of privacy in leather drug-filled pouch, hastily handed to soldier in full view of unit first sergeant); United States v. Foust, 17 M.J. 85 (C.M.A. 1983).

3. The doctrine of automatic standing is not followed by military courts. See United States v. Miller, 13 M.J. 75, 70 n.5 (C.M.A. 1982).

C. Standing to contest the seizure. Civilian case law does not now distinguish between the standing required to contest a search and that required to contest a seizure, requiring that the defendant demonstrate a legitimate expectation of privacy in the place where the seized article was located. See Rawlings v. Kentucky, 448 U.S. 98 (1990) and Salvucci, supra. Thus, a bona fide possessory or proprietary interest in the thing seized would not, of itself, establish standing to contest either the search or the seizure. Mil.R. Evid. 311(a)(2) expressly conveys standing upon an accused to contest the validity of a seizure, however, if the accused had "a legitimate interest" in the property or evidence seized. The analysis to the rule makes it clear that the drafters intended to differentiate between the test to be applied when contesting a search (reasonable expectation of privacy) and the test for contesting a seizure where the only invasion of one's rights is the removal of the property in question. However, contesting a seizure will usually be of little value if one may not contest the search (as occurs when the accused had a legitimate interest in the property seized but no reasonable expectation of privacy in the place searched). Consider United States v.

Perguson, 13 M.J. 955 (A.F.C.M.R.), petition denied, 14 M.J. 441 (C.M.A. 1982); United States v. Miller, 13 M.J. 75 (C.M.A. 1982); and United States v. Lawless, 18 M.J. 255 (C.M.A. 1984). The exception may exist if the property seized was not obviously evidence of a crime, and the seizure was unlawful regardless of the legality of the search.

D. Standing to Litigate the issue. Mil.R.Evid. 311(e)(1) provides: "When an appropriate motion or objection has been made by the defense under subdivision (d), the prosecution has the burden of proving by a preponderance of the evidence that evidence was not obtained as a result of an unlawful search or seizure."

1. While the government bears the burden of proving the search's or seizure's lawfulness, the defense has the burden of proving standing to challenge the search or seizure. United States v. Phillips, 38 M.J. 593, 596 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993). United States v. Sullivan, 38 M.J. 746, 749 (A.C.M.R. 1993), petition granted, 41 M.J. 99 (C.M.A. 1994).

E. Expectation of privacy. Because of the relative relationship of the accused and the government to the property searched, the Fourth Amendment simply may not apply to some property in which no one has a privacy interest.

1. Government property. Mil.R.Evid. 314(d) and 316(d)(3).

a. United States v. Muniz, 23 M.J. 201 (C.M.A. 1987) held that one may have a reasonable expectation of privacy in government property in a government office, but not vis-a-vis one's supervisor (leaving the expectation of privacy in one's office desk as to a law enforcement officer acting without the concurrence of one's supervisor). (This was only J. Cox's opinion; C.J. Everett concurred in result on other grounds.) Note that O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709 (1987) subsequently held that there is no probable cause requirement for a government employer's search of a subordinate's desk and files for a noninvestigatory work-related purpose or work-related misconduct. Instead, these intrusions are judged by a "standard of reasonableness." The Army Court has suggested that commands publish regulations "discouraging storage of personal papers and effects" in government desks. United States v. Craig, 32 M.J. 614, 615 n.3 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 33 M.J. 498 (C.M.A. 1991).

b. United States v. Taylor, 5 M.J. 669 (A.C.M.R. 1978), aff'd in summary disposition, 8 M.J. 98 (C.M.A. 1979) (accused had no standing to challenge postal inspector's warrantless search of unit mailroom); United States v. Bailey, 3 M.J. 799 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 4 M.J. 149 (C.M.A. 1977) (accused had no standing to contest search of latrine). But see United States v. Miller, 50 C.M.R. 303 (A.C.M.R. 1975), aff'd, 1 M.J. 367 (C.M.A. 1976) (standing existed to contest legality of search of an air duct in accused's barracks room, where duct was accessible only from within the room).

c. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has suggested that a servicemember may not have a reasonable expectation of privacy in a dormitory-style military barracks room. United States v. McCarthy, 38 M.J. 398 (C.M.A. 1993). McCarthy may implicitly overrule United States v. Thatcher, 28 M.J. 20 (C.M.A. 1989). See also, United States v. Lewis, 11 M.J. 188 (C.M.A. 1981) (battalion policy preventing the locking of doors lowered expectation of privacy); United States v. Cunningham, 11 M.J. 242 (C.M.A. 1981); United States v. Webb, 4 M.J. 613 (N.C.M.R. 1977) (no reasonable expectation of privacy in open-bay berthing compartment); United States v. Moore, 23 M.J. 295 (C.M.A. 1987) (Cox, J., concurring) (questioning whether there is a reasonable expectation of privacy in a barracks room). United States v. Battles, 25 M.J. 58 (C.M.A. 1987), implies that the only area in which an accused will have a reasonable expectation of privacy in a berthing area aboard ship is his or her own locker and storage area.

d. In United States v. Ayala, 26 M.J. 190 (C.M.A. 1988), Ayala still retained some interest in his government family quarters because he had not checked out yet (he was retiring). However, he had moved out and given a key to cleaning persons, and his reasonable expectation of privacy had diminished to an extent that he no longer had an adequate interest to challenge a search.

e. United States v. Portt, 21 M.J. 333 (C.M.A. 1986) (no reasonable expectation of privacy in small, unlocked locker assigned to individual in work area, when other similar lockers were locked and this locker had no valuables in it and appeared abandoned).

f. United States v. Salazar, 44 M.J. 464 (CAAF 1996). (Even though the accused was ordered to stay away from his spouse, and out of his government quarters, he still retained an expectation of privacy in the residence.

2. Business property. A civilian accused has standing to challenge the search of his or her "private office" by law enforcement personnel. Standing may not exist, however, for a government employee to challenge a supervisor's search of his or her office for work-related purposes. O'Connor v. Ortega, 480 U.S. 709, 717-18 (1987).

3. Private property

a. In United States v. Jacobsen, 466 U.S. 109 (1984), Federal Express damaged a package with a forklift. The package was opened for insurance purposes and only contained white powder under several wrappings. The Court held that it was permissible for a DEA agent to reopen the package because that created no additional intrusion beyond that already committed by a private individual. In addition, the agent's test for cocaine did not violate any reasonable expectation of privacy.

b. New York v. Class, 475 U.S. 106 (1986) (no reasonable expectation of privacy in manufacturer's vehicle identification number on car dashboard).

c. California v. Greenwood, 486 U.S. 35 (1988) (no reasonable expectation of privacy in curbside garbage. Note: Court was careful to point out that, if garbage remains on an accused's private property, it would be within the curtilage and force a different result).

d. United States v. Visser, 40 M.J. 86 (C.M.A. 1994) (no reasonable expectation of privacy in household goods while they were in a moving company's possession for shipment).

F. Abandonment. Mil.R.Evid. 316(d)(1). Individuals who abandon property give up any interest in it and, thus, lack standing under the Fourth Amendment as to that property.

1. Abel v. United States, 362 U.S. 217 (1960). After Colonel Abel was arrested by officers of the Immigration and Naturalization Service, a search of his room resulted in the seizure of a birth certificate. After the defendant was told to assemble the items he wished to take with him, Abel, with the help of two INS agents, packed nearly everything in his bags. Some items, however, he "deliberately" left on the windowsill, and other items that "he chose not to pack" he threw into a wastepaper basket. The defendant then checked out of the hotel and was taken to INS headquarters. FBI agents then searched the room and found microfilm in the wastebasket. The Supreme Court held that, since the defendant had vacated the room, it was lawful for the agents to seize the "entire contents" of the wastebaskets. "So far as [Abel] was concerned [the articles seized] were bona vacanti." 362 U.S. at 241. Bona vacanti in civil law meant "goods without an owner, or in which no one claims a property." Black's Law Dictionary (5th ed. 1979).

2. United States v. Perkins, 47 C.M.R. 259 (A.F.C.M.R. 1973). The court held that taking a crumpled note from the wastebasket near the defendant's desk was not a search.

3. United States v. Weckner, 3 M.J. 546 (A.C.M.R. 1977). Private Weckner threw a bag of heroin out a window when a sergeant, who reasonably suspected him of possessing drugs, ordered Weckner to accompany him to the commander's office. The court held the sergeant's order legal, and the subsequent seizure of the heroin under the window proper since the heroin had been abandoned by the accused.

4. If an individual abandons property as the result of illegal governmental activity, the accused may not lose standing because of the fruit of the poisonous tree theory.

a. United States v. Robinson, 6 M.J. 109 (C.M.A. 1979) (the fact that the accused fled when the military policeman asked him to stop did not provide probable cause for his arrest and thus package abandoned during chase was inadmissible).

b. Fletcher v. Wainwright, 399 F.2d 62 (5th Cir. 1968). The misconduct of police officials may be so grievous that the courts will not find there is a voluntary abandonment of specific property. Where property is discarded as a result of illegal conduct, such as breaking a door down in a hotel room, the seized property may be inadmissible.

c. United States v. Swinson, 48 C.M.R. 197, 201 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974) ("When an arrest is unlawful . . . and an accused's disposition of an item was a response to that unlawful pressure, the accused retains a possessory right in the item entitling him to have it suppressed as evidence.").

d. United States v. Edwards, 3 M.J. 921 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 4 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1977) (where accused dropped bag containing drugs onto street as he was being legitimately stopped, drugs were properly seized as abandoned property).

e. An accused has no reasonable expectation of privacy in a gym locker assigned to another servicemember, even when the accused put his own lock on the locker. United States v. Britton, 33 M.J. 238 (C.M.A. 1991).

G. Testimony of accused given to assert standing is privileged. Mil.R.Evid. 311(f) provides: "Nothing said by the accused on either direct or cross-examination may be used against the accused for any purpose other than in a prosecution for perjury, false swearing, or the making of a false official statement."

1315 REASONABLE ADMINISTRATIVE SEARCHES

(Key Numbers 1055, 1056, 1057, 1059, 1060, 1066)

A. General. Inspections and inventories are not a quest for evidence; therefore, they do not fall under the traditional Fourth Amendment analysis. One must look at the purpose of an administrative search in order to distinguish it from a Fourth Amendment search.

B. Inventories. Mil.R.Evid. 313(c).

1. If, during the course of a bona fide inventory, items connected with criminal activity are discovered, they may be seized and are admissible.

a. United States v. Hines, 5 M.J. 916 (A.C.M.R. 1978) (inventory of property within BOQ that uncovered marijuana was admissible because purpose was to ensure property accountability), aff'd in summary disposition, 11 M.J. 88 (C.M.A. 1981).

b. United States v. Talbert, 10 M.J. 539 (A.C.M.R. 1980) (detailed search of impounded vehicle—which included trunk, hood, ashtrays and glove compartment—over objection of owner, was pretext for illegal search and not valid inventory).

c. United States v. Law, 17 M.J. 229 (C.M.A. 1984) (otherwise valid administrative inventory is lawful even though less intrusive means are available for accomplishing same objective, and even where some suspicion exists that evidence of a crime will be found).

d. United States v. Jasper, 20 M.J. 112 (C.M.A. 1985) (legitimate inventory of deserter's personal effects in off-base residence in Germany). See also United States v. Curtis, 44 M.J. 106 (CAAF 1996).

2. Confinement. Inventory of person's belongings upon confinement. United States v. Kazmierczak, 16 C.M.A. 594, 37 C.M.R. 214 (1967) (Air Force regulation requiring inventory of apprehended serviceman's property is not per se unconstitutional). Even if the basis for confinement is not valid, evidence discovered by officials conducting an inventory will not be excluded if the officials had a good faith belief that the confinement was valid. United States v. Sharrock, 32 M.J. 326 (C.M.A. 1991).

3. Subterfuge inventory. In United States v. Mossbauer, 20 C.M.A. 584, 44 C.M.R. 14 (1971), the accused's wall locker was opened after the accused was reported jailed by civilian police for criminal offenses. The court held that, while an inventory of an AWOL soldier's possessions would normally be reasonable and the resulting evidence admissible, the facts of this case, where the usual company waiting period of 24 hours was ignored, established that the inventory was a subterfuge for a search and lacked the requisite purpose of safeguarding the missing soldier's property. This case should be compared to United States v. Barnett, 18 M.J. 166 (C.M.A. 1984), where the fact that the commander ordering the inventory search may have suspected that stolen goods would be found among the accused's effects did not mean that the search was a pretext. Indeed, even the presence of law enforcement agents did not invalidate this "inventory" of the accused's locker.

4. Inventories of automobiles

a. South Dakota v. Opperman, 428 U.S. 364 (1976). In Opperman, the Court upheld the constitutionality of inventorying an impounded car and the admissibility of the marijuana discovered in the unlocked glove compartment. Such inventories are permissible for the following reasons:

- (1) They protect the owner from loss;
- (2) they protect the government against claims; and

(3) they protect the police from possible dangerous contents.

(4) Opperman did not deal with entry into locked portions of the car (e.g., trunk or locked glove compartment). However, an inventory of property in a van (conducted on the way to the impound lot after a stop for DWI), which revealed drugs in a container that was in a second container, was valid where police were following standard procedure and were not acting in bad faith or solely for investigation purpose. Colorado v. Bertine, 479 U.S. 367 (1987).

(5) See also United States v. Dulus, 16 M.J. 324 (C.M.A. 1983) (automobile inventory after confinement of accused held reasonable under Opperman rationale).

b. In Illinois v. Lafayette, 462 U.S. 640 (1983), the Supreme Court extended the Opperman rationale to an inventory search of an accused's shoulder bag while the accused was being "booked" prior to confinement.

c. Factors to examine

(1) Basis for impoundment. Was the car impounded for a valid reason?

(a) United States v. Watkins, 22 C.M.A. 270, 46 C.M.R. 270 (1973) (improper car registration was a valid reason).

(b) United States v. Purite, 3 M.J. 978, 981 n.5 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977) (accused abandoned his car at scene of crime with doors locked, headlights on, and wallet lying on seat; court found proper circumstances for impoundment), aff'd on other grounds in summary disposition, 7 M.J. 369 (C.M.A. 1979).

(2) Procedure used to conduct inventory. Were the procedures used consistent with the purpose of the inventory? United States v. Hines, 5 M.J. 916 (A.C.M.R. 1978) (notice to and presence of the occupant of a BOQ room not required in conducting inventory of government property throughout BOQ), aff'd in summary disposition, 11 M.J. 88 (C.M.A. 1981).

(3) Scope of inventory. See United States v. Watkins, 26 C.M.A. 199, 46 C.M.R. 270 (1973) (inventory, which included looking under dash and rear seat of car, was justified after discovering pistol clip in glove compartment); United States v. Eland, 17 M.J. 596 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983) (master chief exceeded scope of lawful inventory when he read notebook of unauthorized absentee).

(4) Time when inventory is conducted. See United States v.

Hines, 5 M.J. 916 (A.C.M.R. 1978), aff'd in summary disposition, 11 M.J. 88 (C.M.A. 1981) (inventory held reasonable when conducted at mid-morning of a duty day).

(5) Who conducts inventory. See United States v. Barnett, 18 M.J. 166 (C.M.A. 1984) (law enforcement officials permitted to be present during inventory of confined accused's effects).

C. Inspections

1. Inspections are generally not a quest for evidence; therefore they do not fall within the traditional Fourth Amendment analysis.

2. Department of Defense Inspector General Administrative Subpoena. Authority for this administrative subpoena was established by § 6(a)(4) of the Inspector General Act of 1978, 5 U.S.C. App. 3, §§ 1-12 (1994). It can be used to obtain nonprivileged documents from any source other than a Federal agency (i.e., businesses, financial institutions, individuals, state and local government agencies). There is no probable cause requirement but, in the case of the DOD IG, the information sought must be relevant to a legitimate operational concern of the Defense Department. The subpoena is granted at the discretion of the DOD IG and usually, though not necessarily, involves a fraud investigation.

3. Military inspections generally. Mil.R.Evid. 313(b).

a. On a military installation, most property, except for some personal property, is government property. Depending on the nature and use of such property, the government may retain an absolute or limited right to examine the property when it desires to do so. See Mil.R.Evid. 314(c).

b. Government property not issued for personal use

(1) See generally United States v. Simmons, 25 C.M.A. 987, 46 C.M.R. 288 (1973) (three separate opinions) (proper for MP's to examine contents of gas can on military jeep in which accused was a passenger since accused had no reasonable expectation of privacy in gas can).

(2) United States v. Weshenfelder, 23 C.M.A. 593, 43 C.M.R. 256 (1971) (supervisor's authorized search of government desk for government property (ration cards) held proper even without probable cause).

(3) United States v. McClelland, 49 C.M.R. 557 (A.C.M.R. 1974) (court reporter working in SJA office did not have reasonable expectation of privacy in briefcase which was issued to him by the government for use in connection with his duties) (alternate basis for holding).

(4) See also United States v. Miller, 1 M.J. 367 (C.M.A. 1976) (Cook, J., dissenting). In United States v. Sturdivant, 13 M.J. 323 (C.M.A. 1982) (findings set aside on other grounds), the court held that a first sergeant's listening to a telephone conversation was not a violation of 18 U.S.C. § 2511. It was found that this was done in the ordinary course of business in ensuring that the orderly room was running properly (i.e., that phones were being used only for official business). Moreover, hearing information that would adversely affect the unit, the first sergeant could continue to listen to maintain the welfare and discipline of the members of the unit.

c. Once an area is set aside for a servicemember's personal use, however, he or she may have a reasonable expectation of privacy that generates a Fourth Amendment protection against unreasonable searches and seizures. See generally United States v. Roberts, 2 M.J. 31 (C.M.A. 1976) (Perry, J.) (reasonable expectation of privacy in barracks room); but see United States v. Webb, 4 M.J. 613 (N.C.M.R. 1977) (accused had no reasonable expectation of privacy in his cubicle in NCO quarters which were divided from others by lockers, and not walls); United States v. McCarthy, 38 M.J. 390 (C.M.A. 1993).

4. Unit inspections

a. Authority. Commanders have traditionally had broad authority to conduct inspections of their unit or organization.

(1) United States v. Gebhart, 10 C.M.A. 606, 28 C.M.R. 172, 176 n.2 (1959). Both the generalized and particularized types of searches are not to be confused with inspections of military personnel entering or leaving certain areas, or those, for example, conducted by a commander in furtherance of the security of his command. These are wholly administrative or preventive in nature and are within the commander's inherent powers.

(2) This power to inspect has included not only work areas, but also living areas in the barracks. In other words, although a servicemember is assigned a rack, wall locker, desk, and perhaps a cubicle or room for personal use, the government, in the person of the commander, retains the right to examine such areas under at least some circumstances. United States v. Middleton, 10 M.J. 123 (C.M.A. 1981). The court in Middleton also noted that, during the inspection, the area inspected becomes a "non-private" area, notwithstanding the accused's expectations.

(3) Health and Welfare. Inspections, sometimes called "health and welfare" inspections, generally are designed to ascertain the health, welfare, morale, state of readiness, and living conditions of unit members, and to check the state of physical repair or disrepair of buildings and equipment of the unit. Commanders sometimes inspect for more specific problems; such inspections have sometimes been called "shakedown inspections." See United States v. Roberts, 2 M.J. 31 (C.M.A. 1976) (shakedown inspection of accused's barracks was a "search" subject to Fourth Amendment scrutiny).

(4) Given such broad authority in the commander, inspections carry with them the potential for abuse. Indeed, even though most commanders act in good faith in conducting inspections, it must be recognized that among the goals of many health and welfare inspections are objects which are also evidence of crime (i.e., drugs, weapons, etc.). Thus, although an inspection may be administrative in purpose, it may also lead directly to prosecution. In a sense, then, the commander's purposes are dual. This leads to problems in the factual and legal analysis of these activities when courts try to assess their legitimacy. As a consequence, judicial treatment of inspections has varied and is presently somewhat unsettled. See United States v. Taylor, 41 M.J. 168 (C.M.A. 1994).

5. Contraband and Non-Contraband Inspections. Mil.R.Evid. 313 divides inspections into two groups. (1) those not involving an inspection for contraband and (2) those which include such an examination for contraband.

a. Generally, contraband inspections will not be lawful unless they have been "previously scheduled" (although there is no need to "previously announce" the inspection).

(1) "Previously scheduled." The drafters have displayed a clear preference for contraband inspections that are previously scheduled. Prior scheduling provides some guarantee that the inspection is not merely a ploy to search specific individuals, but rather a routine part of the unit's operating procedures. The "schedule" may be tied to specific dates or specific events (i.e., return from field exercises).

b. The rule also recognizes the danger that contraband inspections will be used as subterfuges to conduct general exploratory searches upon less than probable cause.

(1) Singling Out. Where a contraband inspector "singles out" specific individuals, as opposed to examining a random sample or a recognized part of a unit (e.g., a squad, a division, etc)

(a) United States v. Thatcher, 28 M.J. 20 (C.M.A. 1989) involved the theft of government property. Thatcher was in a working party whose members had the best access to the missing property and was scheduled to be discharged the following day. The court found that the inspection was a subterfuge search because the accused was the prime suspect and others in the unit were not inspected until later in the day.

(2) Varying Degrees. If an inspection subjects individuals to varying types of inspections (e.g., inspecting "suspects" more thoroughly than other members), the inspection may be a subterfuge for a search.

(3) Following Report of Offense. The same possibility arises where the inspection was not previously scheduled and immediately follows a report of a specific offense in the unit.

(a) In United States v. Moore, 23 M.J. 295 (C.M.A. 1987), a shakedown search of a barracks (because of stolen items found in an outside open-air stairwell) was not a valid inspection; there was no probable cause and the findings were set aside. In a concurring opinion, Judge Cox questioned whether there should be a reasonable expectation of privacy in a barracks and invited litigation of the issue in an appropriate case.

(4) Burden of Proof. In these cases, the government bears the heavy burden of proving by clear and convincing evidence that the inspection was valid. See United States v. Vincent, 15 M.J. 613 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982). In United States v. Moore, 41 M.J. 812 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. 1995), the Navy-Marine Corps Court found that the government satisfied this heightened scrutiny where certain platoons including a platoon of Marines awaiting administrative discharge or disciplinary action were subjected to frequent urinalysis testing. This frequent testing regimen was imposed because these platoons had a high rate of positives in previous urinalyses. Nevertheless, the court upheld the urinalysis program because "the primary purpose of the urinalysis program was to maintain good order and discipline, fitness, and deterrence." Id. at 816. In United States v. Brown, 12 M.J. 420 (C.M.A. 1982), the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces addressed the issue of contraband inspections and indicated it would: (1) Look to the stated purpose of the inspection; (2) ascertain if it was previously scheduled; (3) determine if it was conducted in a manner consistent with the stated purpose; and (4) examine it to see if, under all the facts, it was reasonable.

6. Urinalysis. See chapter XVI.

7. Reasonable Technological Aides: Narcotic and marijuana detection dogs.

a. Narcotic and marijuana detection dogs are often used in the military.

(1) United States v. Middleton, 10 M.J. 123 (C.M.A. 1981) sanctions the use of drug detection dogs providing they are justified being in an area when they "alert", any evidence found as the result of the use of such an alert may be admissible in evidence.

(2) Mil.R.Evid. 313(b) implicitly permits the use of these animals ("Inspections may utilize any reasonable natural or technological aid . . .").

b. Query whether a marijuana dog is more like the human nose or more like the electronic bug in Katz? Is using a marijuana dog a search in and of itself?

(1) In United States v. Grosskreutz, 5 M.J. 344 (C.M.A. 1978), the court held that the use of a drug dog in a public area to monitor the air space around an automobile, for the presence of drugs in the automobile, did not constitute a "search" for purposes of the Fourth Amendment.

(2) See also Horton v. Goose Creek Independent School District, 690 F.2d 470 (5th Cir. 1982) (sniffing, by trained dogs, of student lockers in public hallways and automobiles in parking lot did not constitute a search; however, sniffing of students' persons by large dogs was a "search" within the purview of the Fourth Amendment).

c. In order to establish probable cause to search, the one authorizing the use of the dog should be informed of two things:

(1) The reaction of the animal should be detailed. United States v. Paulson, 2 M.J. 326 (A.F.C.M.R. 1976), rev'd in part on other grounds in summary disposition, 7 M.J. 43 (C.M.A. 1979).

(2) The animal's reliability should be established. In other words, a proper official must be apprised of the dog's background and "track record." See United States v. Thomas, 1 M.J. 397 (C.M.A. 1976); United States v. Boisvert, 1 M.J. 817 (A.F.C.M.R. 1976). Paragraph 5-2c(2) of enclosure (1) of OPNAVINST 5585.2A specifies that the officer authorizing the search should have assurances of the dog's reliability. This might consist of a review of the dog's record or a demonstration of the dog's capabilities.

d. The fact that a commanding officer has directed or approved the use of a drug-detection dog will not necessarily disqualify that officer from authorizing a search based on the dog's alert. Mil.R.Evid. 315(d). In fact, paragraph 7-3.a of enclosure (1) of OPNAVINST 5585.2 (Military Working Dog Manual) requires it (though this may be a management rule not affecting admissibility of evidence). Note that United States v. Ezell, 6 M.J. 307 (C.M.A. 1979) suggested that authorizing the use of a dog might involve the commander in the evidence-gathering process to the extent that that officer was no longer a neutral and detached magistrate. (See section 1308 B., supra.) See also United States v. Porter, 7 M.J. 32 (C.M.A. 1979).

D. Inspections at entry and exit points (gate searches)

1. General. Mil.R.Evid. 313(b).

a. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has upheld random searches of vehicles entering military bases. United States v. Harris, 5 M.J. 44 (C.M.A. 1978). The court has held that two factors will determine the validity of a gate search: (1) "Was the gate search or inspection in furtherance of command policies and directives?" and (2) "Was the objective of the search to focus-in on this particular vehicle and [accused] or was it to safeguard the security of the installation?" United States v. Jones, 24 M.J. 294 (C.M.A. 1987). If these conditions are satisfied, the search will be upheld even if the law enforcement agents conducting the gate search exercised some discretion in choosing whom to stop.

b. Consent. Military courts have not held that the mere fact that an individual proceeds through a gate to an installation is consent to a search. See United States v. Mayton, 1 M.J. 171 (C.M.A. 1975). See also United States v. Chase, 1 M.J. 275 (C.M.A. 1976), United States v. Harris, 5 M.J. 44, 61 (C.M.A. 1978), and United States v. Alleyne, 13 M.J. 331 (C.M.A. 1982).

2. Who may authorize a gate search? The weight of authority is that only an installation commander (or higher) may implement a gate search. United States v. Neloms, 48 C.M.R. 702 (A.C.M.R. 1974), United States v. Umlauf, 47 C.M.R. 812 (N.C.M.R. 1973).

3. Overseas. Mil.R.Evid. 314(c).

a. The commander has extensive power to search at the gate to a U.S. installation or the brow of a U.S. ship in a foreign country. United States v. Holsworth, 7 M.J. 184 (C.M.A. 1979); United States v. Rivera, 4 M.J. 215 (C.M.A. 1978); United States v. Stringer, 37 M.J. 120 (C.M.A. 1993).

b. Mil.R.Evid. 314(c) allows commanders of U.S. bases and ships overseas to conduct searches of those exiting the base or ship for the purposes of ensuring "security, military fitness, or good order and discipline of the command." However, such searches may not be conducted for the primary purpose of developing evidence for use in a disciplinary proceeding. Id. Mil.R.Evid. 314(c) states that the military commander of an installation, aircraft, or vessel abroad may authorize appropriate personnel to search persons and their property entering or exiting the installation, aircraft, or vessel, to ensure the security, military fitness, or good order and discipline of the command. Such searches do not require probable cause or reasonable suspicion, since, like Mil.R.Evid. 313 contraband inspections, the primary purpose must be prophylactic and not disciplinary. However, like border searches and unlike Mil.R.Evid. 313 contraband inspections, the government should not bear a special burden of proof if a search was conducted immediately after report of a specific offense, was not prescheduled, or treated some individuals differently than others (see Drafters' Analysis, page A 22-24 of MCM). Unlike the limitations on a domestic gate or brow search, the person conducting a properly authorized Mil.R.Evid. 314(c) search may exercise discretion in determining whom to search. See United States v. Alleyne, 13 M.J. 331 (C.M.A. 1982) (citing United States v. Martinez-Fuerte, 428 U.S. 543 (1976)).

c. While such searches should comply with U.S. treaties, the violation of a treaty will not render evidence found in such a search inadmissible.

4. Searches away from gate

a. United States v. Unrue, 26 C.M.A 552, 47 C.M.R. 556 (C.M.A. 1973) (search pursuant to roadblocks set up away from gate upheld on showing of military necessity).

b. United States v. Neloms, 48 C.M.R. 702 (A.C.M.R. 1974) (roadblock was set up within the military installation, and not at the entrance point).

c. Mil.R.Evid. 313 would seem to permit random vehicle inspection at points within the military installation.

E. Border searches

1. Border searches are designed to keep contraband and dutiable merchandise from entering the United States illegally. Because such items normally render the possessor or transporter liable to criminal charges, prosecution may result. Still, because the purpose of border searches is primarily prophylactic, they may be categorized as administrative. See Mil.R.Evid. 314(b).

2. Border searches conducted without warning have been recognized as reasonable per se. United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606 (1977). However, there may be some constitutional limitations with respect to highly intrusive searches at the border. But see United States v. Montoya de Hernandez, 473 U.S. 531 (1985) (reasonable suspicion was sufficient for customs agent to detain accused at border until she submitted to X-ray or defecated where she was suspected of alimentary canal smuggling).

F. Mail and postal facilities

1. Domestic mail

a. Domestic first-class mail within the U.S. Postal System may not be opened except pursuant to a search warrant or by an employee of the U.S. Postal Service to determine the delivery address or by authorization of the addressee. See 39 U.S.C. § 3623(d) (1994). See also United States v. Van Leeuwen, 397 U.S. 249 (1970) (proper to detain mail for approximately one day in order to secure search warrant).

b. Domestic mail other than first class may be opened and inspected without a warrant where U.S. Postal Regulations permit. United States v. Nazarian, 48 C.M.R. 633 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974), aff'd in part, 28 C.M.A. 509, 49 C.M.R. 817 (1975).

2. First-class mail of foreign origin may be opened without a warrant and with less than probable cause. United States v. Ramsey, 431 U.S. 606 (1977) (reasonable suspicion to search international mail as "border exception"). The Army Court has held that such mail can be inspected even without reasonable cause to suspect that it contains contraband. United States v. Ayala, 37 M.J. 632 (A.C.M.R. 1993). Some state courts have condoned custom agents putting beepers in parcels mailed from foreign countries (after drug detector dog alert) to effect a "controlled delivery." United States v. Ayala, 43 M.J. 296 (1995). Customs agents did not require "reasonable cause" to open a package mailed from Saudi Arabia to the United States (border search).

3. Overseas mail within military postal system

a. Prior to 20 November 1982, overseas commanders were not empowered to authorize searches or inspections of mail within military postal systems abroad. This was changed by agreement between the U.S. Postal Service and the Department of Defense, whereby responsibility for the security of the MPS overseas was transferred to the Department of Defense.

b. OPNAVINST 5112.4 now governs searches / inspections of military mail overseas.

(1) First class mail may be opened only:

- (a) With consent of the sender or addressee;
- (b) pursuant to the cognizant commander's search authorization based upon probable cause;
- (c) pursuant to a foreign customs inspection (see border searches, infra); or
- (d) when mail is reasonably suspected of being dangerous (letter bombs).

(2) Cognizant commanders (overseas) are now authorized:

(a) To conduct random inspections of mail parcels using fluoroscopes, metal detectors, detector dogs, etc. (but may not open first class mail without probable cause);

(b) to authorize the search and seizure of individual mail items based upon probable cause;

(c) to use mail covers when authorized by designated military officials to assist in investigations (very few officials are designated to authorize mail covers); and

(d) to permit customs inspections by foreign officials if mail is not exempted by status of forces agreements.

4. Searches in postal facilities. United States v. Carter, 1 M.J. 318 (C.M.A. 1976). The postal facility NCOIC, upon examining a suspicious bag left by the accused on a coat rack, discovered stolen mail. He seized the bag and contents when the accused subsequently carried them out of the facility. The court held that the search was illegal because no statutory or regulatory scheme authorized such searches in a mail facility, and the NCO lacked authority to search on his own. See also United States v. Head, 546 F.2d 6 (2d Cir. 1976).

G. Jails and restricted areas. Mil.R.Evid. 314(h). Bell v. Wolfish, 441 U.S. 520 (1979). The Court upheld body cavity searches within a prison. It concluded that such searches were reasonable under the Fourth Amendment after "[b]alancing the significant and legitimate security interests of the institution against the privacy interests of the inmates."

3. Prison censorship of mail

a. United States v. Ronholt, 42 C.M.R. 933 (N.C.M.R. 1970). The accused mailed a package to his home address before being placed in confinement; however, the package was returned to the accused as unclaimed. At the brig, the accused was required to open the package pursuant to a provision of the Department of the Navy Corrections Manual requiring that outgoing and incoming mail shall be subject to inspection. The court held that the "contents of the package were not within the Fourth Amendment proscription against unreasonable searches and seizures and that under the circumstances of this case the marijuana cigarettes were lawfully seized." Id. at 936.

b. In United States v. Kato, 50 C.M.R. 19 (N.C.M.R. 1974), the court stated that the standards enunciated in Procunier v. Martinez, 416 U.S. 396 (1974), for the inspection of prisoner mail apply to the military. In order for there to be such an inspection: (1) the inspection must further an important and substantial governmental interest in security, order, and the rehabilitation of inmates; and (2) the inspection must be no greater than is essential to the protection of these legitimate government interests. See also Thornburgh v. Abbott, 490 U.S. 401 (1989).

1316 BODY INTRUSIONS (Key Numbers 1049-1054)

A. General. Mil.R.Evid. 312. Certain searches, such as searches of body cavities, or searches involving removal of evidence from within the body, are so intrusive that the probable cause / reasonableness considerations normally applied to searches and seizures may not provide all the protection society desires. Thus, additional safeguards, often described under the broad theory of "due process," may apply. Rochin v. California, 342 U.S. 165 (1952). Normally, the individual's interests in privacy, security, and dignity must be balanced against society's interests in obtaining evidence. Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966). In Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753 (1985), the Court performed this balancing test and determined that the government should not remove a bullet from a robbery suspect's chest.

B. Basic principles

1. The Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination generally affords no protection against the taking of physical evidence from the body. Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966) (blood specimen drawn from a driver who had been arrested for drunk driving, but had refused voluntary blood test, was admissible); United States v. Lloyd, 10 M.J. 172 (C.M.A. 1981); United States v. Armstrong, 9 M.J. 374 (C.M.A. 1980); Murray v. Haldeman, 16 M.J. 74 (C.M.A. 1983).

2. Fourth Amendment standards do apply to the taking of evidence from the body because of the application of reasonable expectation of privacy concepts. Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966). The Fourth Amendment may govern not only the invasion of the body to secure the evidence, but also the seizure of the person in order to make the invasion. See Chambers v. Mississippi, 410 U.S. 284 (1973); Schmerber v. California, 384 U.S. 757 (1966).

3. Heightened Justification. Under Mil.R.Evid. 312(b), a suspect may be compelled to display his / her unclothed body, including body cavities, if such a display is properly authorized and "conducted in reasonable fashion." A nonconsensual physical intrusion into cavities other than the mouth, nose, and ears requires heightened justification. The individual conducting such an intrusion must have "appropriate medical qualifications." Involuntary extraction of bodily fluids must also be done in a "reasonable fashion by a person with appropriate medical qualifications." The term "extraction" in Mil.R.Evid. 312(d) does not encompass compelling someone to provide a urine sample. Instead, "extraction" refers to such procedures as authorization or drawing blood with a needle. Murray v. Haldeman, 16 M.J. 74 (C.M.A. 1983).

4. "[A] person who is neither a suspect nor an accused may not be compelled to submit to an intrusive search of the body for the sole purpose of obtaining evidence of crime." Mil.R.Evid. 312(e).

C. Illustrative cases

1. United States v. Pyburn, 47 C.M.R. 896 (A.F.C.M.R. 1973) (pubic hair samples from the defendant's body could be seized incident to his apprehension).

2. United States v. Woods, 3 M.J. 645 (N.C.M.R. 1977) (heroin-filled balloon retrieved from excrement which was passed by accused did not constitute search, but was matter "abandoned" by him).

3. Compare United States v. Himmelwright, 551 F.2d 991 (5th Cir. 1977) (upholds visual vaginal search) with Mil.R.Evid. 312(c)(2).

4. United States v. Holtz, 479 F.2d 89 (9th Cir. 1973) (strip search of female at border).

5. United States v. Harvey, 701 F.2d 800 (9th Cir. 1983) (formal arrest required to take a blood sample).

6. United States v. Repp, 23 M.J. 589 (A.F.C.M.R. 1986) (Repp told to remove flight suit so that his arms could be examined for needle marks). The court claimed that Repp had no expectation of privacy in the view of his arms, but the justification for the search might better be expressed as being one incident to apprehension.

D. Surgery over patient's objections. May a doctor provide treatment (maybe surgery) over an active duty patient's objection? Paragraph 2-18 of the Manual of the Medical Department provides for such treatment to preserve life, protect the mentally incompetent, handle quarantine problems, and accomplish some minor routine matters. In a situation in which a member cannot perform his / her duties and a doctor claims that treatment would make him fit for duty, paragraph 18-15 indicates that the matter is decided by the Physical Evaluation Board, considering factors such as age, religious objection, and nature of the medical treatment.

1317 LITIGATING FOURTH AMENDMENT ISSUES IN COURTS-MARTIAL (Key Numbers 1081 et seq)

A. Prearrest disclosure. Prior to arraignment, the government must disclose to the defense all evidence seized from the accused which it intends to introduce. Mil.R.Evid. 311(d)(1).

B. Raising the issue. A motion to suppress evidence due to an illegal search or seizure should be made prior to submission of a plea. Failure to do so constitutes waiver. Mil.R.Evid. 311(d)(2). However, the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has ruled that this provision of the Military Rules of Evidence should be liberally construed in favor of permitting an accused the right to be fully heard in his defense. United States v. Coffin, 25 M.J. 32 (C.M.A. 1987). The accused does not, by testifying on a motion, become subject to cross examination on other issues in the case. M.R.E. 104(d). Absent good cause, a military judge will ordinarily rule on such motion before a plea is entered. The military judge may not defer the ruling if the party's right to appeal the ruling is affected adversely by a plea of guilty. Mil.R.Evid. 311(d)(4).

C. Burdens

1. The burden of going forward with raising the issue of an illegal search and / or seizure is on the defense. Technically, however, the question of what properly raises the issue has not been answered. In practice, a simple claim of violation normally shifts the burden to the government to demonstrate the admissibility of the evidence. To support the defense's contention, the defense counsel may consider having the accused testify for a limited purpose. Mil.R.Evid. 311(f). Normally, this will not be necessary to raise the issue. The defense must also show adequate interest by a preponderance of the evidence. United States v. Miller, 13 M.J. 75 (C.M.A. 1982).

2. The burden of proof is on the government to prove the legality (or otherwise demonstrate admissibility) of the evidence obtained from the challenged search or seizure.

3. Generally, the standard of proof which the government must meet is a preponderance of the evidence.

a. See Lego v. Twomey, 404 U.S. 477 (1972).

b. See Mil.R.Evid. 311(e); R.C.M. 905(c)(1).

c. The standard of proof with respect to consent is proof by "clear and convincing evidence." Mil.R.Evid. 314(e).

4. The government need only carry its burden on the grounds advanced by the defense in making its motion or objection. Mil.R.Evid. 311(e)(3).

D. Findings. The military judge is required to state the essential findings on the record. Mil.R.Evid. 311(d)(4); R.C.M. 905(d); United States v. Postle, 20 M.J. 632 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985).

E. Waiver

1. Failure to raise or specify search and seizure issues waives such issues. See Mil.R.Evid. 311(d)(3) and (e)(3).

a. Obviously, if the defense never moves to suppress, or objects to a given piece of evidence, the item will be admitted and, barring a determination of ineffective assistance of counsel, see United States v. Rivas, 3 M.J. 282 (C.M.A. 1977), or "plain error," any question of the legality of the search and seizure of the item will be waived.

b. In addition, even if the defense does raise the issue of admissibility, it must take care to specify any and all grounds on which its challenge rests. United States v. Wade, 1 M.J. 600 (A.C.M.R. 1975); Mil.R. Evid. 311(d)(2).

(1) A motion or objection which specifies some grounds of alleged illegalities, but which fails to mention others, will normally be deemed to have waived those grounds not stated. United States v. Walters, 22 C.M.A. 516, 48 C.M.R. 1 (1973); Mil.R.Evid. 311(d)(2).

(2) But see United States v. Rollins, 3 M.J. 680 (N.C.M.R. 1977). Cf. United States v. Rivas, 3 M.J. 282 (C.M.A. 1977) (reviewing court may not find waiver unless defense counsel fails to seek relief obviously available upon proper motion or objection, where no realistic tactical reason appears for the failure; but court may also find denial of effective assistance of counsel in such cases).

2. Guilty plea. Entry of a plea of guilty normally waives any issues as to the admissibility of evidence, including evidence allegedly obtained unlawfully. This is true even where the defense was permitted to litigate a search question through a motion to suppress prior to entering its plea. Mil.R.Evid. 311(i). An accused can preserve a search and seizure issue by entering a conditional plea of guilty pursuant to Rule for Courts-Martial 910(a)(2). Note that the accused is permitted to make a conditional guilty plea only if both the government and the military judge consent.

— Where the accused pleads guilty to a lesser included offense, the accused can waive issues on admissibility of evidence if the evidence admitted goes to the element of the lesser offense and is not needed to support conviction of the greater offense. United States v. Cooper, 32 M.J. 83 (C.M.A. 1991).

F. *Interlocutory appeal

1. Where the ruling is adverse to the government and excludes evidence that is substantial proof of a material fact, the government may appeal the military judge's ruling. UCMJ, Article 62(a); R.C.M. 908. R.C.M. 908 details the procedure for such appeals. Trial counsel who are considering filing an interlocutory appeal should review JAGINST 5810.2, Military Justice Regulations, para. 5a (22 Oct. 1990).

2. Where the ruling is adverse to the accused, the defense may petition for extraordinary relief, but relief is highly unlikely. See generally Marion E. Winter, Putting on the Writs: Extraordinary Relief in a Nutshell, Army Law., May 1988, at 20. Defense counsel who are considering filing a petition for extraordinary relief should review JAGINST 5810.2, Military Justice Regulations, para. 5b (22 Oct. 1990).

CHAPTER XIV

CONFRONTATION, COMPULSORY PROCESS, EYEWITNESS IDENTIFICATION, AND IMMUNITY

PART I - CONFRONTATION

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right ... to be confronted with the witnesses against him. ..."

U.S. Const. Amend. VI

1401 INTRODUCTION

A. History

1. The particular vice that gave impetus to adoption of the confrontation clause of the sixth amendment was the common law practice of trying defendants on evidence which consisted solely of ex parte affidavits or depositions secured by the examining magistrates, thus denying the defendant the opportunity to challenge his accuser in a face-to-face encounter in front of the trier of fact.

2. At the time of the adoption of the Bill of Rights, the colonial constitutions of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, North Carolina, Maryland, and Virginia contained provisions protecting the confrontation rights of the accused.

3. Because the confrontation clause was part of a package of rights adopted in the sixth amendment (along with public trial, right to jury, assistance of counsel, compulsory process, et al.), it was not subjected to a great deal of debate during the Constitutional Convention. Insofar as the basic purpose of the sixth amendment was to "constitutionalize" the adversary process as the most appropriate vehicle for achieving a fair trial, we can assume that the confrontation clause was designed to assist in accomplishing that end.

4. The paucity of historical information concerning the clause has given courts very little insight into its intended scope. As a result, the courts have attempted to give substance and meaning to this broad provision in a series of decisions which have yet to announce a clear cut definition of the term "confrontation."

B. Purpose

1. The essential values furthered by the confrontation clause were recognized by the Supreme Court at an early date, when it stated:

The primary object of this provision . . . [is] to prevent depositions or ex parte affidavits . . . being used against the prisoner in lieu of a personal examination and cross-examination of the witness in which the accused has an opportunity, not only of testing the recollection and sifting the conscience of the witness, but of compelling him to stand face to face with the jury in order that they may look at him, and judge by his demeanor upon the stand and the manner in which he gives his testimony whether he is worthy of belief.

Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237 (1895).

2. The confrontation clause embraces three basic rights:
  - a. The accused's right to be present at trial;
  - b. the accused's right to cross-examine adverse witnesses; and
  - c. the accused's attendant right to have the fact-finder observe the demeanor of adverse witnesses.

1402 THE ACCUSED'S RIGHT TO BE PRESENT AT TRIAL

A. The general rule. An accused is constitutionally entitled to see and hear witnesses and other evidence presented against him at all stages of trial. Lewis v. United States, 146 U.S. 370 (1892); United States v. Staten, 45 CMR 267, 270 (C.M.A. 1972); Art. 39, UCMJ; Rule of Court-Martial 804, MCM, 1984 [hereinafter R.C.M. ____].

B. Removal of accused from courtroom

1. In Illinois v. Allen, 397 U.S. 337 (1970), the Supreme Court concluded that a defendant's right to be present at trial is not absolute, and that at least one governmental interest, the preservation of order in the courtroom, is sufficiently strong to justify an exception to the prohibition of taking evidence in his absence. The defendant in Illinois v. Allen was convicted following a trial during which he had been forcibly removed from the courtroom because of repeated disruptive behavior. In sustaining the conviction, the Court held that a defendant can "lose" his right to be present if he engages in behavior that makes it "difficult or wholly impossible to carry on the trial." Id. at 339.

2. The Court emphasized that removal must be critical to the continuation of the trial, not merely convenient.

3. The Court further held that, before removal may be ordered, there must be a showing that (1) the defendant has been warned by the judge that he will be removed if he continues his disruptive behavior, and (2) he nevertheless insists on conducting himself in a manner so disorderly, disruptive, and disrespectful of the court that his trial cannot be carried on with him in the courtroom.

4. The military has fully embraced the standards of Illinois v. Allen. R.C.M. 804(b)(2).

5. In United States v. Rembert, 43 M.J. 837 (Army Ct.Crim.App. 1996), the accused's conviction was reversed where the judge ordered the accused out of the courtroom where he then observed the prosecutrix's testimony via two-way television. This amounted to a due process violation. The court saved for another day if this amounted to a Sixth Amendment confrontation violation.

C. *Physical restraint of accused at trial

1. Related to the removal of an accused from the courtroom is the issue of his physical restraint at trial. Although courtroom restraint does not constitute a pure confrontation issue, it is important in this regard since the physical restraint of the accused is usually the initial step in a progression toward the ultimate sanction of banishment from the proceeding.

2. R.C.M. 804(c)(3) provides that "physical restraint shall not be imposed upon the accused during open sessions of the court-martial unless prescribed by the military judge."

3. In United States v. Gentile, 1 M.J. 69 (C.M.A. 1975), the Court of Military Appeals elaborated on the law in this area when it considered the case of an accused who had been ordered handcuffed in court because, prior to trial, he had made numerous threats of his intent to remove his clothes once the court members were called.

a. The court held that physical restraint was permissible whenever an individual disrupts or evidences an intention to disrupt the orderly proceedings of the court.

b. Determining whether to restrain the accused and, if so, the degree of restraint necessary to maintain dignity, order, and decorum in the courtroom are matters within the sound discretion of the military judge.

4. If the military judge does order such restraint, he should enter into the record the reason therefore, and should instruct the court members that such restraint is not to be considered in weighing evidence or determining the issue of guilt. See para. 5.3, ABA Standards Relating to the Administration of Criminal Justice (1974).

5. In United States v. Briggs, 42 M.J. 367 (1995), cert. denied, 116 S.Ct. 1362 (1996), CAAF reiterated that although an accused should appear at trial free of restraint, this right is not absolute. In Briggs, the accused was placed in shackles when being transported to and from court and during long recesses. This did not amount to plain error as military judge did not order the restraints and accused was acquitted of only alleged crime of violence.

D. Trial in absentia

1. Except in capital cases, the accused may not defeat the proceedings by voluntarily absenting himself after the trial has been commenced in his presence. Diaz v. United States, 223 U.S. 442 (1911); Taylor v. United States, 414 U.S. 17 (1973).

2. R.C.M. 804(b), patterned on Rule 43 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, provides:

Continued presence not required. The further progress of the trial to and including the return of the findings and, if necessary, determination of a sentence shall not be prevented and the accused shall be considered to have waived the right to be present whenever an accused, initially present:

(1) Is voluntarily absent after arraignment (whether or not informed by the military judge of the obligation to remain during the trial); or

(2) After being warned by the military judge that disruptive conduct will cause the accused to be removed from the courtroom, persists in conduct which is such as to justify exclusion from the courtroom.

3. To proceed in the accused's absence, the absence must be voluntary. The discussion to R.C.M. 804(b)(2) states that for an absence from the court-martial proceedings to be voluntary, "the accused must have known of the scheduled proceedings and intentionally missed them." The courts, although preferring a detailed notification, have given the government some latitude in this area. United States v. Bass, 40 M.J. 220 (C.M.A. 1994) (where properly arraigned accused voluntarily absents himself, the trial may proceed despite the judge never telling the accused the consequences of absenting himself); United States v. Sharp, 38 M.J. 33 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 1188 (1994). (properly arraigned accused may be tried in absentia even though not notified of exact date of trial or that trial might continue in his absence);

The prosecution has the burden to show that the accused's absence from trial is voluntary by a preponderance of the evidence. R.C.M. 804(b)(2) discussion. Voluntariness may not be presumed but may be inferred depending on the circumstances. Id. Once the voluntariness has been inferred, the burden is on the defense to refute the inference of a voluntary absence. Sharp, 38 M.J. at 37. In United States v. Knight, 7 M.J. 671 (A.C.M.R. 1979), the accused was not voluntarily absent when he was confined in a civilian jail on the date of his military trial.

4. Arraignment is the key. The accused can only be tried in absentia if they are absent "after the commencement of the trial." United States v. Bass, 40 M.J. 220 (C.M.A. 1994). Arraignment is the commencement of trial in the military justice context. Id. at 223. Arraignment consists of: (1) reading the accused the charges against him (or waiver of the reading); and (2) calling upon the accused to plead. United States v. Price, 43 M.J. 823 (Army Ct.Crim.App. 1996). In Price, the judge stopped just short at a 39(a) session of asking the accused "how do you plead." The court found that this did not constitute a proper arraignment, but ultimately found waiver when the appellant was tried in absentia. Id.

5. The military judge should instruct court members that they must draw no inference of accused's guilt from his absence. United States v. Powell, 1 M.J. 612 (A.C.M.R. 1975); United States v. Hardin, 14 M.J. 880 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982) (military judge improperly considered accused's absence on findings). See United States v. Minter, 8 M.J. 867 (N.C.M.R. 1980), aff'd, 9 M.J. 397 (C.M.A. 1980), for an appropriate sample instruction. Such an instruction can be waived [United States v. Allison, 47 C.M.R. 968 (A.C.M.R. 1973)]. However, the military judge properly considered the accused's voluntary absence from trial in determining, for sentencing purposes, his prospects for rehabilitation and retention. United States v. Chapman, 20 M.J. 717 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985), aff'd in summary disposition, 23 M.J. 226 (C.M.A. 1986).

E. Ex parte* proceedings

1. Federal. The confrontation clause provides accused with constitutional protection against proceedings ex parte.

a. Lewis v. United States, 146 U.S. 370 (1892) (confrontation clause violated by proceeding with voir dire in defendant's absence in violation of Federal common law right to challenge prospective jurors).

b. Parker v. Gladden, 385 U.S. 363 (1966) (conviction reversed on confrontation grounds where bailiff made out-of-court statements to jury concerning defendant's guilt).

2. Military. Article 39, UCMJ and R.C.M. 804 establish the military accused's right to be present at all stages of the court-martial, except deliberations and voting by the members. All hearings and motions must be made in accused's presence unless he voluntarily waives his presence. R.C.M. 802 provides that the conference may be held without the accused, but the accused can be present if he or she desires.

a. United States v. Thomas, 8 M.J. 661 (A.C.M.R. 1979), petition denied, 9 M.J. 13 (C.M.A. 1980) (accused, who slashed his wrist after making unsworn statement concerning his rape conviction and then chose to leave courtroom prior to sentencing, did so voluntarily).

b. United States v. Dean, 13 M.J. 676 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982). Actions of the military judge in having an ex parte session with a clinical psychologist, deputy SJA, and trial counsel to inquire preliminarily into the accused's competence to stand trial resulted in prejudicial error.

c. Telephonic Article 39(a) session. In United States v. Reynolds, 44 M.J. 726 (Army.Ct.Crim.App. 1996), the initial article 39(a) session up through arraignment was conducted over speaker telephone. The judge was in a courtroom approximately 150 miles away from where the accused and counsel were located during the telephonic 39(a) session. The court found that the accused was not "present" within the meaning of R.C.M. 804(a) and that such sessions are required to be conducted with the military judge, counsel and the accused all at the same location.

1403 THE ACCUSED'S RIGHT TO CROSS-EXAMINE ADVERSE WITNESSES

A. Background

1. Dean Wigmore once described cross-examination as "the greatest legal engine ever invented for the discovery of truth." Indeed, the very essence of the constitutional right of confrontation is the defendant's opportunity to test the conscience, recollection, and bias of adverse witnesses through the vehicle of cross-examination. It is this feature more than any other which distinguishes the Anglo-American adversarial process from the more internationally prevalent inquisitorial system.

2. For nearly two hundred years, the Supreme Court has grappled with the problem of formulating a unified theory pertaining to the issue of cross-examination and determining its place within the framework of the confrontation clause. Although no rule for analyzing this difficult issue has yet emerged, some general principles do exist.

B. Hearsay versus confrontation

1. If read literally, the confrontation clause would require, on objection, the exclusion of any statement made by a declarant not present at trial. As such, this constitutional imperative reflects the basic principle set forth in the traditional evidentiary hearsay rule. Since its inception, however, the hearsay rule has given rise to exceptions that allow for admission of reliable extrajudicial statements when that evidence could be presented in no other form. Because the hearsay rule, and certain exceptions to it, had been in existence for more than a century prior to adoption of the sixth amendment, it has always been assumed that the Constitution did not reject per se the coexistence of the confrontation clause and exceptions to the hearsay rule.

2. Just as the hearsay rule has numerous exceptions, there are many exceptions to the literal application of the confrontation clause. (The hearsay rule and its exceptions are discussed in detail in chapter VIII, supra.) The Dutton v. Evans, 400 U.S. 74 (1970) plurality opinion indicated that the right of confrontation would not be violated if the out-of-court statement admitted was sufficiently reliable. Ohio v. Roberts, 448 U.S. 55 (1980) attempted to clarify the issue by adding a requirement that the out-of-court declarant be unavailable. Of course, Ohio v. Roberts did not clarify the issue, but seemed to create a question regarding several well-recognized hearsay exceptions which are not affected by the availability of the declarant. In practice, courts generally ignored the unavailability prong of Ohio v. Roberts and paid homage to the language about reliability. It is suggested, though, that the real concern was expressed by J. Harlan in his concurring opinion in Dutton v. Evans, where he claimed it was a question of due process fairness. For example, it is fair to admit an out-of-court statement that has traditionally been considered at trial, such as a business record, but our sensibilities are offended by convicting an accused principally by his confederate's out-of-court confession (which might satisfy the statement against interest hearsay exception). United States v. Vietor, 10 M.J. 69 (C.M.A. 1980) is an important but confusing case concerning a defense witness request for a chemist, which also held that the right of confrontation would not bar admissibility of a laboratory report because it was a business record. C.J. Everett extensively covered the reliability criterion and quickly dismissed J. Fletcher's discussion of the unavailability prong of Ohio v. Roberts.

3. United States v. Inadi, 106 U.S. 1121 (1986) effectively limited the Ohio v. Roberts two-prong test to former testimony, for whose admissibility the declarant's unavailability would have to be shown anyway, and returned to the Dutton v. Evans position that the right of confrontation would not be violated if the out-of-court statement admitted was sufficiently reliable. The co-defendant's confession was not sufficiently reliable in Lee v. Illinois, 476 U.S. 530 (1986), where its discrepancies with Lee's confession went to the very issues in dispute at trial (whether murder had been planned in advance).

4. The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces regularly addresses confrontation clause issues and the reliability of out-of-court statements. The important factors that are examined in assessing the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness are: (1) was the prior statement given under oath; (2) how close in time was the statement made to the alleged crime; (3) what are possible motives for the declarant to lie; (4) the spontaneity of the statement; (5) has there been consistent repetition; (6) the declarant's mental state; (7) were leading or suggestive questions used to illicit the statement; (8) the age and maturity of the declarant; and (9) the declarant's physical or emotional condition at the time of the incident. Idaho v. Wright, 110 S.Ct. 3139 (1990); United States v. Ureta, 44 M.J. 290 (1996), cert.denied, 117 S.Ct. 692 (1997); United States v. Morgan, 40 M.J. 405 (C.M.A. 1994), cert.denied, 115 S.Ct. 907 (1995).

a. Idaho v. Wright, 110 S.Ct. 3139 (1990). The Supreme Court held that the government may only rely on the statement itself and the facts surrounding the particular statement when trying to show that the statement has "particular guarantees of trustworthiness."

b. United States v. McGrath, 39 M.J. 158 (C.M.A.), cert.denied, 115 S.Ct. 420 (1994) shows that if the declarant is available and the opposing side either cross-examines or waives cross-examination, outside corroborating evidence may be considered in determining if "equivalent circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness" exist. See also, United States v. Martindale, 40 M.J. 348 (C.M.A. 1994), cert.denied, 115 S.Ct. 907 (1995).

c. United States v. Ureta, 44 M.J. 290 (1996). In this case, the military judge admitted the videotaped interview of the sexually abused child under Mil.R. Evid 804(b)(5). Reviewing the decision of the military judge for an abuse of discretion, the court found that there were "circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness." In making the initial assessment, the military judge considered a prior statement made by the victim to a doctor just hours before the videotaped interview. The defense argued that this was outside corroborating evidence that should not have been considered by the military judge. C.A.A.F. found the statement to the Dr. showed "consistent repetition" and because of the time proximity was part of the "circumstances surrounding the making of the statement."

d. In United States v. Dunlap, 39 M.J. 835 (A.C.M.R. 1994), a six-year-old's pretrial statement to a school nurse was admitted as residual hearsay. The child was not present at trial. The court rejected the judge's conclusion that the evidence was spontaneous and found insufficient evidence of other "indicia of reliability." See also United States v. Pollard, 38 M.J. 41 (C.M.A. 1993).

e. Other cases pertinent in this area of law include: United States v. Groves, 23 M.J. 374 (C.M.A. 1987); and United States v. Broadnax, 23 M.J. 389 (C.M.A. 1987).

C. Waiver of confrontation right

1. A defendant who threatens the life of a witness and thereby convinces him not to testify cannot complain when the witness' grand jury testimony is introduced at trial. In these circumstances, the threat amounts to a waiver of defendant's right of confrontation. United States v. Balano, 618 F.2d 624 (10th Cir. 1979), cert. denied, 449 U.S. 840 (1980). Accord United States v. Carlson, 547 F.2d 1346 (8th Cir. 1976), cert. denied, 431 U.S. 914 (1977).

2. Prior to admitting pretrial testimony into evidence, the trial judge should hold an evidentiary hearing at which the government must establish by a preponderance standard that the defendant's coercion made the witness unavailable. United States v. Balano, supra. Military cases have not addressed this issue.

D. Face-to-face confrontation. Child abuse cases have become increasingly common in military courts-martial. The court must weigh the accused's right to confrontation of adverse witnesses with the harm it may cause the victim. Many courts have tried to allow for confrontation while still protecting the child.

1. In United States v. Williams, 37 M.J. 289 (C.M.A. 1993), the accused's daughter testified from a chair in the center of the courtroom, not the normal witness box. The accused and his counsel were seated to her immediate left so they had a side view of her. Without deciding whether the judge's case specific finding of necessity was required, C.M.A. concluded there was no violation of confrontation.

2. In United States v. Longstreath, 45 M.J. 366 (1996) two child victim's testified outside the accused's presence via closed circuit television. A psychologist had previously testified that it would be detrimental to one victim's mental health if she were forced to testify in the accused's presence. The other victim repeatedly "broke down" on the stand before the judge permitted the testimony to be via closed circuit TV. The court found that this was appropriate. Relying upon the Supreme Court's decision in Maryland v. Craig, 497 U.S. 836 (1990) and later Federal legislation contained at 42 U.S.C. section 13001 and 18 U.S.C. section 3509(b), the court stated that children may testify via closed circuit television when the child will experience emotional trauma and fear during live in-court testimony. The court expressed a preference for a two-way closed circuit TV, although such a procedure is not constitutionally required (one way TV used in this case). But see United States v. Daulton, 45 M.J. 212 (C.A.A.F. 1996). (The court held the accused's right to confrontation violated when the accused was removed from the court room and could only see the child testify via video and had limited access to defense counsel.)

3. In United States v. Helms, 39 M.J. 908 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993), aff'd 41 M.J. 98 (C.M.A. 1994), the child testified from a library across from the courtroom via 2-way television. All other parties remained in the courtroom. The child could see the accused and both counsel and hear everything in the courtroom. Child sex abuse expert testified on the need of the special arrangement. The court found no abuse of discretion.

E. Procedural matters

1. Scope of cross-examination

a. The Military Rules of Evidence prescribe various rules concerning the scope of cross-examination witnesses in general and of an accused in particular (which may be applicable to confrontation in a joint trial).

b. Rule 611(b) provides that "[c]ross-examination should be limited to the subject matter of the direct examination and matters affecting the credibility of the witness. The military judge may, in the exercise of discretion, permit inquiry into additional matters as if on direct examination."

c. Mil.R.Evid. 301(e) provides that:

[w]hen an accused testifies voluntarily as a witness, the accused thereby waives the privilege against self-incrimination with respect to the matters concerning which he or she so testifies. If the accused is on trial for two or more offenses and on direct examination testifies concerning the issue of guilt or innocence as to only one or some of the offenses, the accused may not be cross-examined as to guilt or innocence with respect to the other offense unless the cross-examination is relevant to an offense concerning which the accused has testified. This waiver is subject to rule 608(b).

Mil.R.Evid. 608(b) states that a witness, including the accused, retains the privilege against self-incrimination when examined with respect to matters which relate only to credibility.

d. Mil.R.Evid. 104(d) provides that "[t]he accused does not, by testifying upon a preliminary matter, become subject to cross-examination as to other issues in the case."

2. Limiting cross-examination

a. The military judge, may in his or her discretion, limit the topics or the amount of cross-examination.

b. In United States v. Bins, 43 M.J. 79 (1995), the court found error where the military judge precluded the defense from cross-examining and presenting extrinsic evidence that the victim received a cash settlement from the accused and was also given free housing and meals by the government after reporting the rape. The court held that this was evidence of bias and motive to misrepresent under Mil.R.Evid. 608(c). See also, Davis v. Alaska, 415 U.S. 308 (1974) (Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause requires defendant have a chance to show a prosecution witness' bias).

c. In United States v. Leiker, 37 M.J. 418 (C.M.A. 1993), cert denied, 510 U.S. 1112 (1994) the military judge did not abuse his discretion in limiting defense counsel's cross-examination of OSI agent to technique actually used to interrogate accused. Counsel sought to question the agent about general techniques in interviewing suspects in order to show the agent considered accused a suspect.

d. In United States v. Williams, 40 M.J. 216, cert denied, 115 S.Ct. 737 (1994), (C.M.A.), the court found that the judge erred in precluding defense from cross-examining government witness / accomplice to robbery about their drug use the night of the robbery. See also United States v. Gray, 40 M.J. 77 (C.M.A. 1994), United States v. Diaz, 39 M.J. 1114 (A.F.C.M.R. 1994), United States v. Campbell, 37 M.J. 1049 (N.M.C.M.R. 1049), right to cross-examine witness recalled by members, and United States v. George, 40 M.J. 540 (A.C.M.R. 1994).

3. Remedy for constraints on cross-examination

a. Mil.R.Evid. 301(f)(2) provides that "[i]f a witness asserts the privilege against self-incrimination on cross-examination, the military judge, upon motion, may strike the direct testimony of the witness in whole or in part, unless the matters to which the witness refuses to testify are purely collateral." The rule has been held to apply to both government and defense witnesses. United States v. Richardson, 15 M.J. 41 (C.M.A. 1983). Mil.R.Evid. 301(f)(2) has even been applied to strike the testimony of the accused. United States v. Vandemark, 14 M.J. 690 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982). In United States v. Longstreath, 42 M.J. 806 (N.M.Ct.Crim.App. 1995), the child victim answered some of defense counsel's questions but refused to answer others. The military judge only partially struck the testimony of the witness finding that substantial cross examination did occur with respect to some of the incidents testified to. The court said that the judge must examine if the question answers precluded inquiry into the details of the witness' direct testimony or did it relate purely to collateral matters affecting the witnesses credibility. The court found no abuse of discretion by the military judge in only partially striking the testimony. The court placed great emphasis on the trier of fact being able to observe the witness refusing to answer and being conveniently forgetful as this bolstered the defense position as to her lack of credibility.

b. The analysis to the above rule defines a collateral matter as one of minimal importance which, if sheltered, would create little danger of prejudice to the accused. For example, in United States v. Terrell, 4 M.J. 720 (A.C.M.R. 1977), aff'd, 6 M.J. 13 (C.M.A. 1978), the accused was charged with transfer of heroin and, on cross-examination, a government witness refused to answer the question, "Have you ever used heroin yourself?" In upholding the conviction, the court stated that there was no requirement to strike the direct testimony since the only question the witness refused to answer was directed toward his general credibility and did not relate to the specific offense charged. See also United States v. Moore, 36 M.J. 329 (C.M.A. 1993); United States v. Lawless, 18 M.J.

255 (C.M.A. 1984) (military judge's refusal to strike direct testimony of government witness upheld); United States v. Hill, 18 M.J. 459 (C.M.A. 1984) (testimony of defense witness was appropriately stricken where he refused to answer questions during cross-examination that were material to the subject of his direct).

c. This is in accord with the Federal standard which states that the right to bar direct testimony does not exist when the witness refuses to testify concerning a matter which is either collateral or cumulative and where the cross-examination is directed at the witness' general credibility rather than toward matters relating to specific events of the crime charged. See, e.g., United States v. LaRiche, 549 F.2d 1088 (6th Cir.), cert. denied, 430 U.S. 987 (1977); United States v. Norman, 402 F.2d 73 (9th Cir. 1968); United States v. Cardillo, 316 F.2d 606 (2d Cir. 1963), cert. denied, 375 U.S. 822 (1963).

1404 ACCUSED'S RIGHT TO HAVE FACT-FINDER VIEW ADVERSE WITNESSES AT TRIAL

A. Background. In Mattox v. United States, 156 U.S. 237 (1895), the preference for the physical presence of the witness before the fact-finder was emphasized when the Supreme Court defined the confrontation clause as requiring a personal examination and cross-examination of the witness, in which the accused has an opportunity, not only of testing the recollection and sifting the conscience of the witness, but of compelling him to stand face to face with the jury in order that they may look at him and judge by his demeanor upon the stand and the manner in which he gives his testimony whether he is worthy of belief.

Id. at 239. The right to have the fact-finder view the witness in the flesh, however, has never been considered paramount.

B. Depositions generally. The most common procedure for introducing testimony at trial without affording the factfinder an opportunity to view the witness is through use of a deposition. The use of depositions in the military is controlled by Article 49, UCMJ, but the Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces has placed certain added limitations on their use. (See discussion in chapter II of this text.) In effect, an exemption or exception to the hearsay rule will have to be satisfied [perhaps Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(A) or 804(b)(1)]. A deposition would also be admissible under certain circumstances when the hearsay rule is relaxed. For example, see Mil.R.Evid. 405(c) and use of depositions per R.C.M. 1001(b)(4) and 1001(b)(5).

1. Confrontation requirements. Article 49, UCMJ, authorizes the use of "oral or written depositions." In United States v. Jacoby, 11 C.M.A. 428, 29 C.M.R. 244 (1960), the court held that the accused has a right to be present at the taking of the deposition in order to confront personally the witnesses against him. R.C.M. 702(g)(1)(A)(i)(c) provides that, under certain circumstances, depositions in lieu of production of a witness on the issue of sentencing can be taken without the accused present. In United States v. Weber, 42 M.J. 675 (A.F.Ct.Crim.App. 1995), the accused was to be tried at a court-martial conducted in Greece. An integral witness located in the United States refused to attend. A deposition was arranged that was to be conducted in the United States. The accused and his counsel refused to attend because of the inability to receive per-diem for their travel and because of the arduous flight schedule. The court held that the accused failed to show good cause for his lack of attendance and therefore waived his presence. The court found that the accused and his counsel failed to explore all options and in fact went out of their way to avoid attending the deposition.

a. Deposing prosecution witnesses. In conformity with the requirement of Barber v. Page, 390 U.S. 719 (1968), the military now requires a showing of "actual unavailability" of the deposed witness at the time of trial before his deposition will be admitted into evidence. United States v. McGrath, 39 M.J. 158, cert. denied, 115 S.Ct 420 (1994).

b. Deposing defense witnesses. In United States v. Thornton, 8 C.M.A. 446, 24 C.M.R. 256 (1957), the Court of Military Appeals held that an accused cannot be forced to present the testimony of a material defense witness by way of stipulation or deposition. But see R.C.M. 1001(e), which limits the availability of live testimony on sentencing and may "force" a depositions submission.

2. Unavailability requirement. Before a deposition will be admitted at trial, it must be affirmatively established that the deponent is "unavailable" on the day of trial.

a. Geographical unavailability. Article 49, UCMJ, defines witness unavailability geographically; that is, a witness is unavailable if he or she is located beyond the state, territory, or district in which the court is sitting or more than 100 miles from the place of trial. In spite of the mandate of article 49(d), subsequent case law has limited the effect of the 100-mile rule.

(1) Distance alone never makes a servicemember on active duty "unavailable." United States v. Cruz, 5 M.J. 286 (C.M.A. 1978). In United States v. Vanderwier, 25 M.J. 263 (C.M.A. 1987), the Court of Military Appeals held that the 100-mile rule of article 49(d) is not solely dispositive as to the unavailability of a witness. Rather, it is but one factor to consider in the determination of unavailability.

(2) When the government procures a witness' departure from the trial situs and effects his discharge from the service before the normal expiration of his enlistment, it is prevented from asserting the witness' unavailability even though, at the time of trial, he is a civilian. United States v. Cokeley, 22 M.J. 225 (C.M.A. 1986).

(3) Before a civilian witness will be declared "unavailable," the government must make every effort, both compulsory and voluntary, to secure the presence of the witness. United States v. Seek, 13 M.J. 946 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982).

b. Witness whereabouts unknown. A witness is unavailable if his whereabouts are unknown at the time of trial. The party offering the deposition must show that he has exercised due diligence in attempting to locate the witness. United States v. Miller, 7 C.M.A. 23, 21 C.M.R. 149 (1956) (deposition not admissible over objection of the defense because the only showing as to the nonavailability of the deponent was the trial counsel's attempt to telephone him on the day before trial, at which time he was informed by the operator that no telephone was listed in the deponent's name in the town of his presumed residence).

c. Inability or refusal of witness to appear and / or testify. A witness is unavailable, if, by reason of death, age, sickness, bodily infirmity, military necessity, nonamendability to process, or other reasonable cause, he is unable or refuses to appear and testify. Art. 49(d)(2), UCMJ.

(1) United States v. Hoffman, 29 C.M.R. 795 (A.F.B.R. 1960) (serious heart attack made deponent unavailable).

(2) United States v. Parrish, 7 C.M.A. 337, 22 C.M.R. 127 (1956) (deponent's insanity at the time of trial made him unavailable).

3. Representation by counsel. Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400 (1965), requires that the accused at a deposition hearing be represented by counsel to insure that his right to cross-examine witnesses will be adequately protected. (R.C.M. 702(g)(2)(B) provides that no party has a right to be present at a written deposition, but a written deposition may not be ordered without the consent of the opposing party except when it is ordered solely in lieu of producing a witness for presentencing. R.C.M. 702(c)(3)(B).)

a. The MCM requires that the qualifications of counsel be the same as those prescribed for trial by the type of court-martial before which the deposition is to be used, except for depositions to be used at summary court-martial. R.C.M. 506, noted in R.C.M. 702.

b. The rights to the various types of counsel attach at the deposition hearing. The accused can have appointed military counsel, or requested military counsel and a civilian counsel. R.C.M. 506.

c. Counsel must have been accepted by the accused. The mere publication of an order of appointment does not establish an attorney-client relationship. United States v. Robinson, 11 M.J. 218 (C.M.A. 1981). The accused's acceptance of the counsel, however, need not be formal and express. If he acquiesces in the counsel's appointment, there is an implied acceptance. United States v. Ciarletta, 7 C.M.A. 606, 23 C.M.R. 70 (1957).

d. Counsel need not be sworn at the hearing. The provisions of Article 42, UCMJ do not apply at the deposition hearing. United States v. Parrish, 7 C.M.A. 337, 22 C.M.R. 127 (1956).

e. The counsel who represents the accused at a deposition ordinarily will form an attorney-client relationship with the accused which will continue through a later court-martial. R.C.M. 702(d)(2) discussion.

f. If the accused has formed an attorney-client relationship with military counsel concerning the charges in question, ordinarily that counsel should be appointed to represent the accused. R.C.M. 702(d)(2) discussion.

C. Procedural requirements. R.C.M. 702 sets out in detail the mechanics for obtaining a deposition.

1. Request. After charges are preferred, a written request must be submitted to the convening authority (prior to referral) or to the military judge or convening authority (after referral). Ordinarily, the opposing party will be served a copy of the request and accompanying papers.

2. Approval. The approving authority must personally decide and order the deposition to be taken: This authority may not be delegated to the staff judge advocate. United States v. Jackson, 17 M.J. 915 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984).

3. Notice. Reasonable written notice must be given to the opposing party of the time and place of the deposition hearing and the name of each person to be examined. In determining whether the timing was reasonable, the court will consider travel time, time for preparation, and prior engagements of counsel. United States v. Mathews, 31 C.M.R. 620 (A.F.B.R. 1961). Notice must be made in writing. United States v. Giles, 42 C.M.R. 880 (A.C.M.R. 1970).

4. Taking testimony. Anyone authorized to administer oaths can serve as a deposing officer. Art. 49(c), UCMJ.

5. Authentication. The deposing officer must authenticate the deposition record. R.C.M. 702(f)(8).

6. Use at trial. A deposition is not an exhibit in the ordinary sense of the term, but rather testimonial evidence. As such, it is marked as an exhibit and appended to the record, but only read to the court members. Art. 49(f), UCMJ.

7. Videotaped depositions. Videotaped depositions are specifically authorized. R.C.M. 702(g)(3).

1405 CONFRONTATION RIGHTS AT ARTICLE 32 INVESTIGATIONS

A. Article 32(b), UCMJ, states that the accused at a pretrial investigation will be given a "full opportunity . . . to cross-examine witnesses against him if they are available."

B. In the absence of defense objection, there are many vehicles available to the government to present statements of witnesses at the pretrial investigation. R.C.M. 405(g)(4)(A). The investigating officer can consider:

1. Sworn statements;
2. statements under oath taken by telephone, radio, or similar means if both parties had the opportunity to question the witness and it can be reasonably concluded that the witness' identity is as claimed;
3. prior testimony under oath;
4. depositions;
5. stipulations;
6. unsworn statements; and
7. offers of proof of expected testimony of the witness.

Because there is no defense objection, the availability/nonavailability of the witness is not relevant.

C. If a witness is unavailable, the government can introduce over defense objection:

1. Sworn statements;
2. statements under oath taken by telephone, radio, or similar means if both parties had the opportunity to question the witness and it can be reasonably concluded that the witness' identity is as claimed;

3. prior testimony under oath;
4. depositions of that witness; and
5. in time of war, unsworn statements.

D. If a witness is reasonably available and the defense objects to the use of the substitutes for testimony set forth in C, supra, then that witness shall be produced if the testimony would be relevant and not cumulative. R.C.M. 405(g)(1)(A). A witness is "reasonably available" when the witness is located within 100 miles of the situs of the investigation and the significance of the testimony and personal appearance of the witness outweighs the difficulty, expense, delay, and effect on military operations of obtaining the witness' appearance. Id. Many practitioners erroneously viewed this language as meaning that any witness outside of 100 miles was not reasonably available. In United States v. Marrie, 43 M.J. 35 (1995), C.A.A.F. stated that there is no per se rule that a witness outside 100 miles is unavailable. Rather, a balancing test must be conducted to determine the availability of witnesses outside 100 miles. The Marrie court did state that their holding was based upon the application of the R.C.M. and not based upon a 6th Amendment constitutional violation. See also, United States v. Stockman, 43 M.J. 856 (N.M.Ct.Crim.App. 1996); United States v. Burfitt, 43 M.J. 815 (A.F.Ct.Crim.App. 1996).

E. The current R.C.M. 405 confrontation rights of the accused are based on two key cases. In United States v. Chestnut, 2 M.J. 84 (C.M.A. 1976), the investigating officer did not attempt to invite the civilian rape victim to attend the investigation. The defense requested that the military judge order the investigation to be reopened and have the victim invited or continue the trial to allow the defense to depose the victim. The trial judge refused the request and the court ruled that the accused had been denied his right to examine the victim under oath before trial. R.C.M. 405(g)(2)(B) discussion, indicates that civilians should be invited to attend (and perhaps funded) before they are determined to be unavailable. The second case is United States v. Chuculate, 5 M.J. 143 (C.M.A. 1978), wherein the investigating officer considered the sworn statements of two crucial prosecution witnesses over defense objection. The prosecution witnesses were civilians who were invited, but refused to attend. In upholding the conviction, the court paid homage to all prior enunciated rights of confrontation of the accused at a pretrial investigation but found that, absent a defense motion to depose the requested witness, the accused waived his pretrial right to confrontation. See also United States v. Moore, 32 M.J. 56 (C.M.A. 1991).

F. Note: Articles 46 and 47 allow the government to subpoena witnesses to appear at deposition hearings. No such provision exists to compel attendance at an article 32 investigation.

G. Use at trial. Generally, if an Article 32 transcript is used at trial, it should be read to the members and members should not be permitted to take the transcript into their deliberation room. United States v. Ureta, 44 M.J. 290 (1996), cert. denied, 117 S.Ct. 692 (1997).

PART II - COMPULSORY PROCESS

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor."

1406 INTRODUCTION

– Purpose

1. In Washington v. Texas, 388 U.S. 14 (1967), the Supreme Court breathed new life into compulsory process when it struck down a Texas statute which rendered accomplices incompetent to testify for one another.

a. The Court rejected the argument that compulsory process was limited to the right to subpoena favorable witnesses without the attendant opportunity to have the witnesses take the stand and be heard. Emphasizing this point, the Court said, "The Framers of the Constitution did not intend to commit the futile act of giving to a defendant the right to secure the attendance of witnesses whose testimony he had no right to use." Id. at 23.

b. Instead, in holding that the explicit right to subpoena witnesses carries with it the implicit right to put them on the stand to be heard, the Court enunciated the true purpose of the clause:

The right to offer the testimony of witnesses, and to compel their attendance, if necessary, is in plain terms the right to present a defense, the right to present the defendant's version of the facts as well as the prosecution's to the jury so it may decide where the truth lies. Just as an accused has the right to confront the prosecution's witness for the purpose of challenging their testimony, he has the right to present his own witnesses to establish a defense.

Id. at 19.

2. In United States v. Manos, 17 C.M.A. 10, 37 C.M.R. 274 (1967), the Court of Military Appeals adopted the Supreme Court position and declared this constitutional provision applicable to court-martial proceedings. The court went on to say that, even though the accused's right to secure the attendance of witnesses is not absolute, it is important for all concerned to be impressed with "the undoubted right of the accused to secure the attendance of witnesses in his own behalf, the need for seriously considering the request and [the importance of] taking necessary measures to comply therewith if such can be done without manifest injury to the service." Id. at 19, 37 C.M.R. at 283.

1407            COMPELLING THE GOVERNMENT TO PRODUCE FAVORABLE DEFENSE WITNESSES

A.     Article 46, UCMJ. This article provides the military accused with an expanded right of compulsory process by mandating that the defense have an "equal opportunity" with the government to obtain witnesses, a phrase interpreted by the Court of Military Appeals in United States v. Sweeney, 14 C.M.A. 599, 34 C.M.R. 379 (1964), as eliminating the requirement to show indigency when requesting that the government pay the cost of producing a defense witness.

B.        Procedure for securing witnesses

1.     Article 46 allows the President to establish regulations prescribing the procedures to be used for securing defense witnesses. The President has exercised that authority in R.C.M. 703 and R.C.M. 1001(e), which set forth two different standards for witness requests, depending upon whether the witness is to be called to testify on the merits of the case or at the presentencing stage of the case. In either situation, the request should be in writing and be submitted in a timely manner.

a.     If the request is for a witness on the merits or on interlocutory questions, it should contain:

(1)    Name, telephone number, address, or location of the witness; and

(2)    a synopsis of the expected testimony sufficient to show its relevance and necessity. R.C.M. 703(c)(2)(B)(i).

b.     If the request is for a witness in the presentencing proceeding, it shall contain:

(1)    Name, telephone number, address, or location of the witness;

(2)    a synopsis of the prospective witness' expected testimony; and

(3) the reasons why the personal appearance of the witness is necessary under the standards set forth in R.C.M. 1001(e).

2. Under R.C.M. 1001(e), counsel now have a more difficult standard to meet in attempting to obtain the appearance of witnesses in the presentencing stage of the court-martial. A witness may be produced to testify during presentencing proceedings at government expense only if:

a. The testimony expected to be offered by the witness is necessary for consideration of a matter of substantial significance to a determination of an appropriate sentence, including evidence necessary to resolve an alleged inaccuracy or dispute as to a material fact;

b. the weight or credibility of the testimony is of substantial significance to the determination of an appropriate sentence;

c. the other party is unwilling to enter into a stipulation of fact containing the matters to which the witness is expected to testify, except in an extraordinary case when such a stipulation would be an insufficient substitute for the testimony;

d. other forms of evidence, such as oral depositions, written interrogatories, or former testimony would not be sufficient to meet the needs of the court-martial in the determination of an appropriate sentence; and

e. the significance of the personal appearance of the witness to the determination of an appropriate sentence, when balanced against the practical difficulties of producing the witness, favors production of the witness. Factors to be considered in relation to the balancing test provided in R.C.M. 1001(e)(2)(E) include, but are not limited to, the costs of producing the witness, the timing of the request for production of the witness, the potential delay in the presentencing proceeding that may be caused by the production of the witness, or the likelihood of significant interference with military operational deployment, mission accomplishment, or essential training. Note that, under the language of R.C.M. 1001(e)(2)(A) through (E), the connecting notion "and" joins the five factors, indicating that all must be met before a defense witness will be produced at government expense to testify during presentencing proceedings. The bottom line is that, for all practical purposes, a defense witness will rarely, if ever, be produced at government expense.

3. Prior to trial, the determination of whether to produce the witness rests with the trial counsel. The trial counsel shall arrange for the presence of any witness listed by the defense unless the trial counsel contends that the witness is not required to be produced under R.C.M. 703. If the trial counsel refuses to produce a witness under this rule, the issue may be submitted to the military judge. If the military judge grants a motion for a witness, the proceedings will be abated until the witness is produced. R.C.M. 703(c)(2)(D).

4. A wise trial counsel will always consult with the convening authority, who will be paying for the witnesses, especially if significant or unusual costs are involved. R.C.M. 703(c)(2)(D) discussion.

C. Is R.C.M. 703 consistent with article 46? There has been controversy in the past as to whether the requirements of paragraph 115a, MCM, 1969 (Rev.) (now R.C.M. 703) were consistent with the "equal opportunity" provision of article 46. Defense counsel have argued that the need for synopsis of testimony and averments of necessity place an unreasonable burden on the defense that is not shared by the government. The courts have not accepted that position, but United States v. Vietor, 10 M.J. 69 (C.M.A. 1980) apparently reduced the defense burden when requesting a laboratory chemist. Since it is really the government which is relying on the chemist through his out-of-court laboratory report, the accused is merely seeking to cross-examine a witness against him. While recognizing the legitimate purposes in requiring the defense to advance some justification for the witness request (e.g., some indication that the chemist's testimony may create doubt about his credibility or the reliability of lab procedures), the normal standards would not apply.

D. The materiality standard

1. Production of defense requested witnesses has never been an unlimited right. The Supreme Court has long held that there is no constitutional right to subpoena witnesses whose testimony is not material to the accused's defense.

2. The Supreme Court has never formulated a Federal standard of materiality.

3. The drafters of the Rules for Court-Martial have attempted to embrace various theories of "materiality," "relevance," and "essentiality" expounded by the Court of Military Appeals. The precision of R.C.M. 703(b)(1) is best appreciated when viewed from the cases which gave it birth.

a. In United States v. Hampton, 7 M.J. 284 (C.M.A. 1979), the Court of Military Appeals attempted to clarify this issue by declaring a witness to be "material" when there exists a reasonable likelihood that his testimony will have an affect on the judgment of the fact-finders at trial.

b. The standard appears to have shifted again, however, making the defense counsel's burden more difficult to bear. The Court of Military Appeals signaled the change in footnote 4 of United States v. Bennett, 12 M.J. 463, 465 (C.M.A. 1982), when it said "the word material appears misused. . . . However, the terms may have been confused in earlier cases, the true test is essentiality. If a witness is essential for the presentation of the prosecution's case, he will be present or the case will fail. The defense has a similar right." In United States v. Spindle, 28 MJ 35 (C.M.A. 1989) the court upheld a trial court's denial of defense request for production of witnesses on an issue the court concluded to be collateral to the case at hand.

4. R.C.M. 703(b)(1). Each party is entitled to the production of any witness whose testimony on a matter in issue on the merits or on an interlocutory question would be relevant and necessary. The discussion following R.C.M. 703(b)(1) refers to Mil.R.Evid. 401 concerning relevance and defines necessary relevant testimony as testimony that is not cumulative and contributes to a party's presentation of the case in some positive way on a matter in issue. See United States v. Breeding, 44 M.J. 345 (1996). The analysis to R.C.M. 703(b)(1) indicates that the theories of materiality, relevance, and essentiality in Hampton, Bennett; and Spindle, are expressed in R.C.M. 703(b)(1) and its discussion.

E. Conditions precedent to enforcement of right to compulsory process

1. Materiality must be averred

a. In United States v. Lucas, 5 M.J. 167 (C.M.A. 1978), the Court of Military Appeals held that the government need not produce a requested defense witness until the accused makes some legitimate assertion of materiality which places the military judge on notice that the witness will offer testimony to negate the prosecution evidence or support a defense. See also United States v. Moore, 32 M.J. 56 (C.M.A. 1991);

b. This requirement exists independently of R.C.M. 703(c)(2)(B)(i) and is premised on the military judge's need for reliable information upon which to make his determination of whether to order the witness produced.

c. What constitutes a legitimate averment has never been clearly established, but a fair reading of the cases indicates that the defense should virtually quote the expected testimony and state that the witness is relevant and necessary.

d. In United States v. Lucas, 5 M.J. 167 (C.M.A. 1978), the Court of Military Appeals obliquely addressed this issue in footnote 11 by citing Greenwell v. United States, 317 F.2d 108 (D.C. Cir. 1963), wherein the District of Columbia Circuit Court of Appeals laid down the following rule:

If the accused avers facts which, if true, would be relevant to any issue in the case, the request for subpoenas must be granted, unless the averments are inherently incredible on their face, or unless the government shows, either by introducing evidence or from matters already of record, that the averments are untrue or that the request is otherwise frivolous.

317 F.2d at 110. Greenwell was also favorably cited by the Court of Military Appeals earlier in United States v. Sweeney, 14 C.M.A. 599, 34 C.M.R. 379 (1964).

e. In United States v. Killebrew, 9 M.J. 154 (C.M.A. 1980), the Court of Military Appeals reaffirmed the accused's unconditional right to interview all potential witnesses prior to trial but, in so doing, restated the general proposition that a witness may refuse to answer pretrial questions of defense counsel so long as the government has not induced that refusal. It went on to say, however, that "when there is some reason to believe that a witness has knowledge relevant to criminal charges and he refuses to talk to defense counsel, there usually will be lacking any 'good cause' to forbid his deposition or to refuse to compel his appearance at trial." Id. at 161. Accordingly, the defense counsel in this specific situation should normally be successful in either requesting a deposition or in requiring the appearance of the witness at trial.

f. In United States v. Vietor, 10 M.J. 69 (C.M.A. 1980), the Court of Military Appeals expressed the view that the defense counsel was remiss in not communicating with the laboratory analyst prior to submitting a witness request. Without such communication, defense counsel could not assess the potential benefit of requesting the witness.

g. In United States v. Jefferson, 13 M.J. 1 (C.M.A. 1982), the court stated that a defense counsel's oral averment of a witness' expected testimony based on a summary in a CID report was a sufficient mode of averment where the government did not challenge the legitimacy of the report. In United States v. Eiland, 39 M.J. 566 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993) the military judge abated the proceeding after the defense requested production of two critical witnesses in a rape case; the examining doctor and a witness who saw the victim's demeanor. The court held there was no abuse of discretion in abating the proceedings for two witnesses of such "central importance."

2. Request must be timely

a. R.C.M. 703(c)(2)(C) provides that witness requests must be timely so as to obtain the witness when they would be necessary. Untimely requests are subject to denial.

b. The Court of Military Appeals, in United States v. Hawkins, 6 C.M.A. 135, 142, 19 C.M.R. 261, 268 (1955), said: "[T]he touchstone for untimeliness should be whether the request is delayed unnecessarily until such time as to interfere with the orderly prosecution of the case. Even then, if good cause is shown for the delay, a continuance should be granted to permit the evidence to be produced."

c. In United States v. Nichols, 2 C.M.A. 27, 36, 6 C.M.R. 27, 36 (1952), the court declared that a continuance should ordinarily be granted "if it appears reasonable that it is not made on frivolous grounds or solely for delay." Furthermore, "counsel for accused has the responsibility to make a full and fair disclosure of the necessity for, and the nature, extent and availability of, the desired evidence" which forms the basis of the request. See United States v. Mitchell, 11 M.J. 907 (A.C.M.R. 1981), aff'd, 14 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1982); United States v. Cottle, 14 M.J. 260 (C.M.A. 1982) (addresses dilatory tactics of civilian defense counsel).

F. Modes of evidence presentation; how much must be produced?

1. The question of whether all material witnesses requested by the defense must be physically produced at trial is one which has long plagued the military courts. R.C.M. 1001(e)(2) minimizes the opportunities to require government production of witnesses for presentencing.

2. In United States v. Williams, 3 M.J. 239 (C.M.A. 1977), the court stated that live production of material witnesses is unnecessary when the testimony of such witnesses would be merely cumulative. In this case, the accused had been charged with heroin possession and the defense case rested on the credibility of accused's denial of guilt. Four defense character witnesses on the merits were requested, but the trial judge denied the request as to two of them on the basis that their testimony was merely cumulative. The Court of Military Appeals reversed the conviction because the denied witnesses had known the accused at different periods of time and therefore were not cumulative under those circumstances.

In footnote 8, the court cautioned that the trial judge must be careful to distinguish between cumulative witnesses and corroborative witnesses—the latter being witnesses whose repetitive testimony would have an "important impact" on the factfinder at trial. Such witnesses presumably must be produced if the trial's fairness would be affected by their absence. When the judge rules, for example, that only two of four witnesses must be produced at trial, the defense will select the two to be produced.

In United States v. Breeding, 44 M.J. 345 (1996), the defense requested 25 various character witnesses and the government denied 9. The judge did not abuse his discretion in finding that many of these witnesses were cumulative. Of particular note is the statement that it did not matter that many of these witnesses agreed to appear voluntarily (government did not need to assist in production). The court stated that the judge still serves as a gate-keeper to ensure testimony is relevant and not cumulative, even if the witnesses appear voluntarily. See also, United States v. Harmon, 40 M.J. 107 (C.M.A. 1994)(accused has no constitutional right to witness whose testimony may be cumulative); United States v. Miller, 44 M.J. 549 (A.F.Ct.Crim.App. 1996)(witness found to be cumulative and DC hammered for not interviewing requested witness).

3. In United States v. Scott, 5 M.J. 431 (C.M.A. 1978), the court finally seems to have settled on a standard with regard to this matter when it stated that "although live testimony . . . is normally imperative to the fairness of the process, occasionally some alternative form of testimony will pass muster under the facts and circumstances of a given case." Id. at 432. It further noted that it is within the discretion of the military judge to determine the mode of evidence production, once the witness' materiality has been established; and that, in exercising this discretion, the trial judge must insure that the mode of production does not diminish the fairness of the proceedings. See also United States v. Combs, 20 M.J. 441 (C.M.A. 1985).

4. In United States v. Allen, 31 M.J. 572 (N.M.C.M.R. 1991), aff'd, 33 M.J. 209 (C.M.A. 1991), cert. denied, 112 S.Ct 1473 (1992), the Navy-Marine Corps Court of Review stated that, in exercising discretion whether to require the personal attendance of a material witness, a judge must balance the following factors:

- (a) Issues involved in the case and importance of requested witness to those issues;
- (b) whether witness was desired on the merits or on sentencing;
- (c) whether testimony of witness would be merely cumulative;
- (d) availability of alternatives to personal appearance of witness such as depositions, interrogatories, or previous testimony;
- (e) unavailability of witness;
- (f) whether requested witness is in the armed forces or subject to military orders; and
- (g) whether absence of witness will adversely affect accomplishment of an important military mission or cause manifest injury to the service.

5. The court also went on to describe a three-prong analysis in determining whether a witness is cumulative. The questions to be resolved include:

- (a) Is credibility and demeanor of the requested witness greater than that of the attending witness;
- (b) is testimony of requested witness relevant to the accused with respect to character traits or other material evidence observed during periods of time different than that of attending witness; and
- (c) will any benefit accrue to the accused from an additional witness saying the same thing that other witnesses have already said?

G. Expert witnesses

1. R.C.M. 703(d) states that, when a party considers employment of an expert at government expense to be necessary, that party should notify opposing party and submit a request to the convening authority to authorize employment and fix compensation.

The request must explain why the expert is necessary and estimate the cost. The request should be submitted in a timely manner or it may result in a denial of the request. United States v. Moore, 32 M.J. 56 (C.M.A. 1991).

2. The government can often provide an adequate substitute.

a. The accused's right to a competent expert to assist does not include a constitutional right to choose an expert of their own liking. All that is required is that competent assistance be made available. Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985); United States v. Burnette, 29 M.J. 473 (C.M.A.) cert. denied, 497 U.S. 821 (1990). Ake v. Oklahoma, 470 U.S. 68 (1985) held the government was required to provide access to a psychiatrist if an indigent criminal defendant showed that his sanity was in issue. R.C.M. 706 satisfies any such constitutional requirements.

b. Cost is not the only factor to be considered. In United States v. Robinson, 39 M.J. 88 (C.M.A. 1994) the military judge denied a defense request for a secretor test in a urinalysis case. The court upheld the ruling saying that there was no showing of necessity. The accused must show reasonable probability that expert would assist the defense and that denial of expert assistance would mean a fundamentally unfair trial. Judge Cox dissented saying the test was simple and inexpensive.

c. In United States v. Kelly, 39 M.J. 235 (C.M.A.) cert. denied, 115 S.Ct. 324 (1994). The court held that the military judge's denial of expert assistance in a urinalysis case was not an abuse of discretion since the defense did not show a necessity for the expert in light of the defense counsel's prior experience in litigating such cases, familiarity with published articles on the subject and phone consultation with the expert. See also, United States v. Gonzalez, 39 M.J. 459 (C.M.A.), cert. denied, 115 S.Ct. 429 (1994) and United States v. Tharp, 38 M.J. 8 (C.M.A. 1993).

d. United States v. Horn, 26 M.J. 434 (C.M.A. 1988) held that the denial of an accused's request for employment of an expert witness, who could have testified that government chemists had not followed proper procedures in analyzing the accused's urine for cocaine metabolites, constituted reversible error.

1408 THE SUBPOENA PROCESS

A. Military witnesses. R.C.M. 703(e)(1) sets out the procedures for securing the presence of witnesses who are on active duty.

1. Attendance of such witnesses is obtained by the trial counsel's notifying the witness' commanding officer and requesting that the witness be ordered to attend the trial.

2. In United States v. Davis, 19 C.M.A. 217, 41 C.M.R. 217 (1970), the Court of Military Appeals held that distance alone never makes a servicemember on active duty unavailable to appear personally as a witness in a court-martial.

B. Domestic civilian witnesses required to appear in a court-martial held in the United States. Article 46, UCMJ, provides that a process issued in a court-martial shall be similar to that issued by United States district courts and shall run to any part of the United States, its territories, commonwealths, or possessions. See JAGMAN, § 0146.

– R.C.M. 703(e)(2) sets out the specific mechanics for issuing a subpoena upon a civilian.

a. The trial counsel is authorized to subpoena civilian witnesses at government expense.

b. A subpoena normally is prepared, signed, and issued in duplicate on DD Form 453. MCM, 1984, app. 7. If a subpoena requires the witness to bring with him a document or an exhibit to be used in evidence, each document or exhibit will be described in sufficient detail to enable the witness to identify it readily. If trial counsel needs to subpoena bank records, care should be taken to comply with the Right to Financial Privacy Act of 1978, 12 U.S.C. §§ 3401 et seq. (1994). Generally a subpoena for the accused's records will fall under an exception to the notice requirements of the Act. 12 U.S.C. § 3413(e) (1994); See United States v. Wooten, 34 M.J. 141 (C.M.A. 1992). But see SECNAVINST 5500.33 (23 Jun 80), which may impose a stricter notice requirement on the government. For a useful discussion of these issues, see Donald W. Hitzeman, Due Diligence in Obtaining Financial Records, ARMY LAW., Jul. 1990, at 39.

c. If practicable, a subpoena will be issued in time to permit service to be made or accepted at least 24 hours before the time the witness will have to start from home in order to comply with the subpoena.

d. Informal service. Unless trial counsel believes that formal service is advisable, the trial counsel will mail the subpoena to the witness in duplicate, enclosing a postage-paid envelope bearing a return address, with the request that the witness sign the acceptance of service on the copy and return it in the postage-paid envelope. The return envelope should be addressed to the trial counsel of the court. The trial counsel may, and ordinarily should, include with the request a statement to the effect that the rights of the witness to fees and mileage will not be prejudiced by voluntary compliance with the request and that a voucher for fees and for mileage going to and returning from the place of the sitting of the court will be delivered to him promptly on being discharged from attendance at the proceedings.

e. Formal service. Formal service is accomplished by personally serving the subpoena on the witness. If the witness is near the place where the court is convened, the trial counsel, or someone detailed or designated by the commanding officer of the installation, may serve the subpoena. If the witness is near some other military installation, the duplicate subpoenas may be enclosed with a suitable letter to the commanding officer of that installation, or the duplicate subpoenas may be enclosed with a suitable letter to the commander of an army, naval, or air command, or other comparable command within which the witness resides or may be found. The commanders will take appropriate action to complete prompt service of the subpoena by the most economically available means. Service ordinarily will be made by persons subject to the code, but may legally be made by others. The second copy of DD Form 453, with proof of service made as indicated on the form, will be returned to the trial counsel. If the service cannot be made, trial counsel should be notified immediately. When use for it is probable, a return postage-paid envelope addressed to the trial counsel of the court may be sent to the person who is to serve the subpoena.

C. Civilian witnesses in a foreign country required to appear in a court-martial held in the United States. Title 28 U.S.C. § 1783 (1976), made applicable to the armed forces through Article 46, UCMJ, allows courts of the United States or bodies designated by them to subpoena American nationals or residents who are in a foreign country to return to the United States for trial. Such subpoenas must be served in accordance with the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure relating to service of process on a person in a foreign country. The person serving the subpoena must tender to the person subpoenaed his estimated travel and attendance expenses. See United States v. Ortiz, 35 M.J. 391 (C.M.A. 1992)

D. Civilian witnesses in a foreign country required to appear in a court-martial held in a foreign country. In a foreign territory, the attendance of civilian witnesses may be obtained in accordance with existing agreements or, in the absence thereof, within the principles of international law.

E. Civilian witnesses in the United States required to appear in a court-martial held in a foreign country. Military courts do not have the power to compel civilians to leave the United States to attend a court-martial in a foreign country. United States v. Bennett, 12 M.J. 463 (C.M.A. 1982). However, the government could tender fees and travel to the civilian witness who would testify voluntarily. It is not an abuse of discretion for the military judge to order a trial to proceed where the civilian witness refuses invitational travel orders and the government is willing to enter into a stipulation of expected testimony. United States v. Santiago-Davila, 26 M.J. 380 (C.M.A. 1988) (civilian wife of accused, who had been expelled from base housing in Germany after drugs were found there, would testify that the drugs were hers and accused had no knowledge of their presence).

F. Enforcement of domestic subpoenas. Two options exist regarding persons who fail to respond to a subpoena. A warrant of attachment may issue from the court-martial or a criminal charge may be brought in Federal district court.

1. Warrant of attachment. R.C.M. 703(e)(2)(G) provides that a military judge or convening authority may issue a warrant for the arrest of any person who refuses to appear pursuant to a properly issued subpoena. It further recommends that such a warrant be executed through a civil officer of the United States (e.g., a U.S. Marshal). JAGMAN, § 0147, requires prior approval by the Judge Advocate General. Naval Service attorneys should contact OJAG Code 20 for assistance in this area. In United States v. Ortiz, 35 M.J. 391 (C.M.A. 1992) the court reversed the military judge's decision not to file a warrant of attachment for a witness. The court held that failure of the military judge to issue the warrant, even in a foreign country (to a U.S. citizen) was reversible error when such an attachment may have compelled the material witness. A warrant of attachment may only be issued to a witness who has been properly served with the initial subpoena. RCM 703(e)(2)(G). See also, United States v. Davis, 29 M.J. 357 (C.M.A. 1990).

2. Criminal charge. Article 47, UCMJ, states that a person who willfully neglects or refuses to appear as a witness, after having been properly subpoenaed to do so, is guilty of a Federal offense and "shall be fined or imprisoned, or both, at the courts discretion." Enforcement of article 47 in Federal court can be pursued only by a U.S. Attorney.

In order to maintain a prosecution under article 47, a person must not only be duly subpoenaed but must be paid or tendered fees, including the fee for one day of actual attendance and mileage both ways, at the rates allowed to witnesses attending the courts of the United States. Article 47, UCMJ; JAGMAN, § 0146.

PART III - IMMUNITY

1409 INTRODUCTION

A. The concept of immunity. Because the privilege against self-incrimination protects an individual against the consequences of a criminal conviction or its equivalent, it follows that, if the possibility of a conviction can be nullified (through a grant of immunity), the right to refuse to testify becomes moot. The only difficulty with this reasoning is that compelled, though immunized, testimony may well lead to loss of employment and significant public stigma.

B. Forms of immunity

1. Testimonial and transactional immunity

a. Testimonial immunity, sometimes termed either "use" immunity or "use plus fruits" immunity, immunizes a witness against the subsequent use of his or her testimony and any derivative use. In theory, testimonial immunity allows prosecution of the witness for the offenses testified to if independent evidence is used. United States v. McGeeney, 44 M.J. 418 (1996), cert. denied, 117 S.Ct. 692 (1997) (demonstrates painstaking measures government took to avoid appearance that immunized statements were used); United States v. Lucas, 25 M.J. 9 (C.M.A. 1987). There is, however, a heavy burden on the government to prove that none of the evidence against the accused was derived directly or indirectly from his immunized testimony. United States v. Kimble, 33 M.J. 284 (C.M.A. 1991).

b. Transactional immunity immunizes the witness against prosecution for any offenses concerning which the witness testified.

2. Minimum constitutional requirement. The minimum requirement is "use" or testimonial immunity. Kastigar v. United States, 406 U.S. 441 (1972). This form of immunity protects a witness or accused from the use of the immunized testimony or its fruits, but it does not guarantee that the witness or accused will be free from prosecution of the offense suspected or revealed if other evidence, independent of the immunized testimony, is available. Additionally, if the accused gratuitously offers information on crimes far beyond the protected area of the grant of immunity, no protection from the use of these statements exists. United States v. Christian, 43 M.J. 763 (N.M.Ct.Crim.App.), rev. denied, 43 M.J. 475 (1995) (discussion on unrelated sodomy not protected by testimonial immunity grant).

3. Immunity in the military. The minimum form of immunity required by article 31 is "use" or testimonial immunity. See United States v. Rivera, 49 C.M.R. 259 (A.C.M.R. 1974), rev'd on other grounds, 1 M.J. 107 (C.M.A. 1975); Mil.R.Evid. 301(c)(1); R.C.M. 704(a) discussion.

1410 AUTHORITY TO GRANT IMMUNITY

A. Military personnel accused of offenses cognizable by court-martial may be granted immunity by the appropriate GCM convening authority. United States v. Kirsch, 15 C.M.A. 84, 35 C.M.R. 56 (C.M.A. 1964); R.C.M. 704(c). The decision to grant immunity is an executive decision, not subject to review by the military courts. As a general rule, an accused has no standing to contest the propriety of grants of immunity to prosecution witnesses. United States v. Martinez, 19 M.J. 744 (A.C.M.R. 1984), petition denied, 21 M.J. 27 (C.M.A. 1985). Note that approval of grants of immunity for military personnel subject to trial by court-martial will also require approval by the Attorney General of the United States if the case could possibly have Department of Justice interest. Concurrent Federal civilian and military jurisdiction is possible. See R.C.M. 704(c); Grants of Immunity, The Army Lawyer 22-25 (December 1973).

B. To what extent can a subordinate's actions (for example a staff judge advocate) bind a GCM convening authority in effectively granting immunity?

1. In Cook v. Orser, 12 M.J. 335 (C.M.A. 1982), the petitioner, an Air Force officer charged with failing to report visits to and contact with the Soviet Embassy, sought extraordinary relief in the form of a writ of mandamus directing the military judge to dismiss the charges in the case. In requesting this relief, he relied on two arguments. First, he claimed that his prosecution for these offenses was barred by a promise of immunity made by competent authority. Second, in the alternative, he maintained that due process of law required that his agreement with military authorities be enforced, and that the charges should be dismissed. The court granted the requested relief in a 2-to-1 decision. Judge Fletcher, writing the opinion of the court, concluded that the SJA as "prosecutor" made promises concerning nonprosecution to the petitioner, and that due process required appellate enforcement of the promise. Chief Judge Everett, in a concurring opinion, agreed with Judge Fletcher's due process analysis and also held that the GCM convening authority had delegated his authority to his SJA to negotiate a binding immunity agreement, which was subsequently ratified by the convening authority, thereby barring prosecution. Chief Judge Everett wrote: "Thus, if a subordinate acting for that commander—especially if it is his staff judge advocate—offers immunity and at a later time the commander ratifies the offer, then, once the accused meets its conditions, he cannot be prosecuted." Id. at 354.

2. In United States v. Brown, 13 M.J. 253 (C.M.A. 1982), the court judicially enforced a promise from an SJA to the accused to the effect that a discharge would be provided in exchange for "good information on drug activity." Chief Judge Everett reasoned that "fair play" requires enforcement of such an agreement. Judge Fletcher held that an SJA, as a prosecutor, can bind the convening authority.

3. In Samples v. Vest, 38 M.J. 482 (C.M.A. 1994), the accused contended that his grant of testimonial immunity was actually a grant of transactional immunity because of what he was told by the trial counsel and other JAG officers. Although the court ruled in the Government's favor, it chastised the Government for not involving the defense counsel in the immunity grant process and for not having the accused's counsel explain the meaning and effect of the testimonial immunity to him.

4. See JAGMAN, § 0138, for the procedural considerations involved in granting immunity. In general, a written recommendation for immunity is forwarded to the general court-martial convening authority. That officer will act upon the request after referring it to his staff judge advocate for advice. In cases involving espionage, subversion, aiding the enemy, sabotage, spying, violation of rules or statutes concerning classified information or the foreign relations of the United States, or other national security matters, the approval of the Attorney General is required. Approval of the Attorney General or his designee may also be required in cases involving any "major federal crimes." See "Memorandum of Understanding Between the Department of Defense and Justice," reprinted in MCM, 1984, app. 3.

B. Persons not triable by court-martial must be granted immunity by the Attorney General of the United States or by the GCM convening authority who has obtained approval from the Attorney General for such a grant. Title II, Organized Crime Control Act of 1970, 18 U.S.C. § 6004 (1970); R.C.M. 704(c)(2); JAGMAN, § 0138c.

1411 SCOPE OF MILITARY IMMUNITY—POWER TO IMMUNIZE FOR NONMILITARY PROSECUTORS. To what extent could an immunized military witness be subject to a subsequent prosecution in a nonmilitary forum? This question is addressed in the following sections.

A. Federal prosecution. Military grants of immunity are binding on the Department of Justice (same sovereign). See also Art. 76, UCMJ.

B. State prosecution. State prosecutions are prohibited from using any immunized testimony or derivative evidence. Murphy v. Waterfront Comm'n, 378 U.S. 52 (1964).

C. Foreign prosecution

1. The application of the fifth amendment right to matters involving possible foreign prosecution was left open by the Supreme Court in Zicarelli v. Commission of Investigation, 406 U.S. 472 (1974). At least three circuits have held that the possibility of grand jury testimony reaching the foreign country is so minimal that the fifth amendment privilege against self-incrimination is not raised. In re Tierney, 465 F.2d 806, 811-12 (5th Cir. 1972); In re Parker, 411 F.2d 1067, 1069-70 (10th Cir. 1969), vacated, 397 U.S. 96 (1970); In re Weir, 377 F. Supp. 919 (S.D. Cal.), aff'd, 495 F.2d 879 (9th Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 1038 (1974). See also In re Cahalane (also reported as United States v. Doe), 361

F. Supp. 226 (E.D. Pa.), aff'd, 485 F.2d 682 (3d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 989 (1974). Similarly, in United States v. Yanagita, 552 F.2d 940 (2d Cir. 1977), the court found the privilege inapplicable to a witness at trial who refused to answer for fear of prosecution by Japan. On the other hand, the District Court for Connecticut held otherwise in a well-written and persuasive opinion. In re Cardass, 351 F. Supp. 1080 (D. Conn. 1972).

2. The only military case to discuss the issue fully held that article 31 applied only to offenses triable in United States courts. United States v. Murphy, 7 C.M.A. 32, 21 C.M.R. 158 (1956). This case was decided, however, before Murphy v. Waterfront, supra, and was based in part on cases which would not have had the same significance in light of the Waterfront decision. Thus, this issue is not clearly resolved. What the Murphy case does make clear is that the accused cannot assert the right of a witness to refuse to answer. The privilege is one that is personal with the witness.

D. Possibility of incrimination must be real. For a witness to claim the right, and for immunity to be necessary, the possibility of incrimination must be "real and appreciable" rather than "imaginary and unsubstantial." McCormick, supra, at 263, citing Brown v. Walker, 161 U.S. 591 (1896); Marchetti v. United States, 390 U.S. 39, 48 (1968). In United States v. Ratliff, 42 M.J. 797 (N.M.Ct.Crim.App. 1995), the military judge refused to grant the defense appropriate relief based upon the denial of their request for immunity for two defense witnesses. The court held that the military judge did not abuse his discretion in finding that these two potential alibi witnesses' testimony would not tend to incriminate them and therefore immunity was not warranted.

E. Effects of granting immunity

1. On the witness

a. The witness is required to testify, on pain of trial for refusal to testify, and possibly contempt, if the grant was broad enough. United States v. Croley, 50 C.M.R. 899 (A.F.C.M.R. 1975). Fear for one's safety is not a defense in a case for refusal to testify. United States v. Quarles, No. 74-0537 (N.C.M.R. 28 March 1976) (unpublished). Note that the grant of immunity usually constitutes an order to testify. If the order is legal, the witness could be prosecuted under Article 90 or 92, UCMJ.

2. On the convening authority, supervisory authority, and the staff judge advocate. In some cases, the grant of immunity may preclude these officers from taking post-trial review action if they or their subordinates recommend or grant either immunity or clemency for a witness in a case. But cf. United States v. Newman, 14 M.J. 474 (C.M.A. 1983) (since granting use immunity does not equate to expression of convening authority's views as to credibility of witness, such convening authority not necessarily disqualified from taking post-trial action on case).

F. Obtaining a grant of immunity. See generally JAGMAN, § 0138.

G. Immunity at trial

1. Notice. Mil.R.Evid. 301(c)(2) requires that grants of immunity (or lesser promises of leniency in exchange for testimony) be in writing and served on the accused prior to arraignment (or within a reasonable time before the witness testifies). Otherwise, the witness involved may be disqualified from testifying. This notice requirement was adopted from United States v. Webster, 1 M.J. 216 (C.M.A. 1976). United States v. Carrol, 4 M.J. 674 (N.C.M.R.), aff'd, 4 M.J. 89 (C.M.A. 1977) (notice requirement may be waived).

2. Motion to dismiss. If an immunized witness is improperly brought to trial despite the terms of the grant or promise involved, the defense should raise the matter by a motion to dismiss pursuant to R.C.M. 704.

3. Burden of proof. If the government is prosecuting an accused who had testified earlier pursuant to a grant of immunity, the government bears a heavy burden of showing in an article 39(a) session that it will be using independent, legitimate evidence against the accused. United States v. McGeeney, 44 M.J. 418 (1996), cert. denied, 117 S.Ct. 692 (1997); United States v. Olivero, 39 M.J. 246 (C.M.A. 1994) (government has burden to show by a preponderance that the decision to prosecute is untainted by immunized testimony). United States v. Garrett, 24 M.J. 413 (C.M.A. 1987). The government will be required to prove, not merely represent, that no use was made of the immunized testimony. Thus, it may be appropriate, where prosecution of the immunized witness is contemplated, to make a record of evidence available against the witness prior to issuance of the grant. See also United States v. England, 33 M.J. 37 (C.M.A. 1991) (list of factors to determine if government has discharged its burden of proving its evidence was not derived from immunized testimony).

H. De facto immunity. While the issuance of grants of immunity is a formal and highly controlled process, it is possible to obtain the same effects via the exclusionary rule. Thus, a violation of someone's fifth amendment or article 31 rights will exclude any resulting or derivative evidence. A promise of clemency that is relied upon may be ineffective insofar as it may not prevent trial per se, but it will result in the exclusion of the witness' pretrial testimony given pursuant to the promise. See United States v. Whipple, 4 M.J. 773 (C.G.C.M.R. 1978) (promise that nothing would happen if the accused turned himself in held binding).

1412 COMPELLING THE GOVERNMENT TO GRANT "USE IMMUNITY" TO DEFENSE WITNESSES

A. In section 1411 of this chapter, the concept of immunity for government witnesses is discussed. In recent years, commentators have increasingly urged that a criminal defendant should have the right, in limited circumstances, to obtain immunity from prosecution for a potential defense witness. This right is based on one of two constitutional theories: due process or compulsory process.

B. The decision to grant a defense request to immunize a witness is a matter within the sole discretion of the appropriate general court-martial convening authority. R.C.M. 704(e). However, if a defense request to immunize a witness has been denied, the military judge may grant appropriate relief directing either that the CA grant testimonial immunity (note the military judge cannot grant immunity), or to the affected charges and specifications, the proceedings against the accused be abated. Id. To take such actions, the military judge must find:

1. The witness intends to invoke the right against self-incrimination to the extent permitted by law if called to testify; and

2. The Government has engaged in discriminatory use of immunity to obtain a tactical advantage, or the Government, through its own overreaching, has forced the witness to invoke the privilege against self incrimination; and

3. The witness' testimony is material, clearly exculpatory, not cumulative, not obtainable from any other source and does more than merely affect the credibility of other witnesses.

R.C.M. 704(e). It is important to note that this standard came into effect with the amendment to R.C.M. 704(e) in 1993 so earlier case law may have applied a different standard.

C. R.C.M. 704(e) is now consistent with the majority view in Federal courts in recognizing that an accused has no Sixth Amendment right to immunized testimony of defense witnesses and, absent prosecutorial misconduct which is intended to disrupt the judicial fact-finding process, an accused is not denied Fifth Amendment due process by the Government's failure to immunize a witness. Analysis to R.C.M. 704(e); United States v. Monroe, 42 M.J. 398 (1995)(No bad faith by the Government in not granting immunity). If the military judge finds that the witness is a target for prosecution, there can be no claim of Government overreaching or discrimination if the grant of immunity is denied. United States v. Shandell, 800 F.2d 322 (2d Cir. 1986).

1413 LIMITED IMMUNITY FOR SUBSTANCE ABUSE SELF-REFERRAL. Statements regarding past drug use or possession, which are made to appropriate persons in the course of voluntary self-referral and are made for treatment or rehabilitation purposes, may not be used for disciplinary purposes. Such statements generally cannot be used to characterize an administrative discharge (not facing OTH). However, a recent change to the MILPERSMAN has taken away OTH protection if the self-referred sailor is found to not be drug dependent. They may be used for impeachment or rebuttal, though, and the members' commanding officer has access to the statements. This limited use immunity does not prohibit disciplinary action or other adverse action based on independently derived evidence. See OPNAVINST 5350.4B and MCO P5300.12.

1414 VOLUNTARY SELF-REFERRAL TO FAMILY ADVOCACY

DOD policy does not prevent one who voluntarily self refers as a "child abuser" from being prosecuted. United States v. Corcoran, 40 M.J. 478 (C.M.A. 1994). The Family Advocacy Program was not intended to create rights enforceable by any accused, and does not create immunity from prosecution for the participant. United States v. Brown, 40 M.J. 625 (N.M.C.M.R. 1994). See also OPNAVINST 1752.2A dtd 17 July 1996.

PART IV EYEWITNESS IDENTIFICATION

1415 BACKGROUND. In order to mitigate the grave danger of mistake resulting from eyewitness identification testimony, the Supreme Court has established two constitutional safeguards applicable in criminal proceedings. First, the Court has established a sixth amendment right to counsel at post-indictment identifications at which the defendant is present. Second, the Court has recognized a due process right to exclude unreliable identification testimony that results from procedures which are both unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable misidentification. See generally United States v. Rhodes, 42 M.J. 287 (1995); United States v. Webb, 38 M.J. 62 (C.M.A. 1993) cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 1201 (1994), United States v. Quick, 3 M.J. 70 (C.M.A. 1977). Mil.R.Evid. 321 attempts to codify these Supreme Court standards as well as provide procedures for admitting eyewitness testimony at trial.

1416 RIGHT TO COUNSEL

A. *When does the right attach?

1. In United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218 (1967), the Supreme Court held that:

a. The sixth amendment guaranty of the assistance of counsel applies to "critical stages" of the proceedings.

b. The accused is guaranteed, in addition to counsel's presence at trial, that he need not stand alone against the state at any stage of the prosecution, formal or informal, in or out of court, where counsel's absence might derogate the accused's right to a fair trial.

c. A post-indictment lineup is a "critical stage" of a criminal prosecution at which the accused is entitled to the assistance of counsel unless the right is waived.

2. In Kirby v. Illinois, 406 U.S. 682 (1972), the Supreme Court ruled that the right to counsel does not attach until adversary judicial proceedings are initiated, whether by way of a formal charge, preliminary hearing, indictment, information, or arraignment. In Kirby, the Court specifically held that the right did not attach to an identification made at a police station showup after the accused had been arrested, but before he had been indicted or otherwise formally charged with any criminal offense.

3. In Gilbert v. California, 388 U.S. 263 (1967), the Supreme Court held that, in those situations where counsel rights have attached, violation of these rights results in the automatic exclusion of that identification and all subsequent identifications which are not based on an independent source.

4. In Moore v. Illinois, 434 U.S. 220 (1977), the Supreme Court overturned an accused's conviction where the trial court had permitted the prosecution to introduce the rape victim's testimony that she had previously identified the accused as her assailant at a preliminary hearing. The accused had been neither represented by counsel nor offered appointed counsel during that preliminary hearing. The trial court had ruled that the victim's testimony was admissible because the prosecution had shown an independent basis for the victim's identification of the accused. The Supreme Court specifically ruled that the sixth amendment right to the assistance of counsel at pretrial identification proceedings conducted after the initiation of adversary judicial criminal proceedings against the accused applies:

- a. To one-on-one identification proceedings as well as to lineups;
and
- b. to identification procedures conducted at judicial proceedings, such as a preliminary hearing.

The court further ruled that the identification resulting from the uncounseled confrontation was per se excludable at trial, regardless of whether there was an independent basis for the victim's identification at that proceeding.

5. Rule 321 of the Military Rules of Evidence differentiates between the right to counsel at military and nonmilitary lineups.

- a. A "military lineup" is one conducted by persons subject to the UCMJ or by their agents. At such a lineup, counsel rights attach only after preferral of charges or imposition of pretrial restraint as defined by R.C.M. 304 and 305 (i.e., arrest, restriction in lieu of arrest, or pretrial confinement ≠ not apprehension). The right to counsel at a "military lineup" is limited to appointed article 27(b) counsel. The suspect has no right to individual military counsel by name or to privately retained civilian counsel. Furthermore, the right may be waived if freely, knowingly, and intelligently made.

b. A "nonmilitary lineup" is one conducted by an official or agent of a domestic governmental entity (Federal, state, or local). The time of attachment and scope of counsel rights in such cases is determined by applicable Federal law.

c. No mention is made in the Military Rules of Evidence regarding any counsel rights at lineups conducted by foreign authorities.

B. Special situations

1. Photographic identifications

a. In United States v. Ash, 413 U.S. 300 (1973), the Supreme Court held that there was no right to counsel at a photographic lineup even though the lineup took place after the initiation of judicial adversary proceedings. The Court felt that such a proceeding did not constitute a "critical stage" in the criminal prosecution so as to require the presence of counsel to assist the accused in confronting the government within the adversarial arena. See also, 39 A.L.R. 3d 1000.

b. In United States v. Smith, 44 C.M.R. 904 (A.C.M.R. 1971), the Army Court of Review adopted an approach similar to that of Ash by holding that the right to the presence of counsel applies only to corporal, not photographic, exhibitions of an accused to witnesses. See also, United States v. Williams, 35 M.J. 816 (A.C.M.R. 1992).

2. On-the-scene identifications

a. Both military and civilian courts have generally adopted the position that no counsel rights attach to crime scene identifications.

(1) Russell v. United States, 408 F.2d 1280 (D.C. Cir. 1969), cert. denied, 395 U.S. 928 (1969).

(2) United States v. Batzel, 15 M.J. 640 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982).

b. When considering such confrontations, these courts have held that the delay occasioned by summoning counsel may diminish the reliability of any identification obtained, thus defeating a principal purpose of the counsel requirement.

3. Accidental viewings

a. In Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 (1967), the Supreme Court said that the reason for fashioning the exclusionary rule of Wade and Gilbert was to "deter law enforcement authorities from exhibiting an accused to witnesses before trial for identification purposes without notice to and in the absence of counsel." Id. at 297.

b. Most courts therefore refuse to apply the Wade / Gilbert counsel requirements to inadvertent and unintentional post-indictment confrontations between the accused and a witness because to do so would not further the purposes which the rule is designed to achieve.

– There is an excellent analysis of several cases and their applicability to military cases in this area. In United States v. White, 17 M.J. 953 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984) the court exhaustively cites several civilian and military cases in determining how to determine if a lineup is admissible.

C. Counsel's role at lineup

1. United States v. Webster, 40 C.M.R. 627 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 18 C.M.A. 640, 40 C.M.R. 327 (1969), states that counsel's presence at a lineup does not invest him with any authority to prevent, interfere with, or control the lineup procedure. He may offer suggestions to the individual running the lineup, but that person is not required to acquiesce to such desires or demands.

2. If counsel cannot control the conduct of a lineup, it is clear that he will not be deemed to have waived any suggestive procedures which he cannot change. Considerable difference of opinion exists as to the effect of counsel's failure to object to the government's employment of suggestive procedures when he is given the opportunity to lodge objections.

3. If, in fact, counsel is to serve only as an observer to preserve accused's confrontation right at trial, it would seem that there exists no affirmative duty to lodge objections at the actual lineup proceedings. See ALI Model Code of the Pre-Arrest Procedure, Comment 211 (Ten. Draft No. 6, 1974).

4. A failure to object at the time of the lineup, however, could possibly carry some factual implication that the accused and his counsel acquiesced to the fairness of the identification process to which they later object at trial. Some courts consider counsel's pretrial failure to object as one factor in determining whether the totality of the circumstances resulted in an unfair confrontation. United States v. Webb, 38 M.J. 62 (C.M.A. 1993), cert. denied, 114 S.Ct. 1201 (1994).

1.     In United States v. Wade, 388 U.S. 218, 238 n.27 (1967), the Supreme Court said that "although the right to counsel usually means a right to the suspect's own counsel, provision for a substitute counsel may be justified on the ground that the substitute counsel's presence may eliminate the hazards which render the lineup a critical stage for the presence of the suspect's own counsel."

2.     Some courts have interpreted the Wade language to mean that as long as an impartial attorney is present to observe the lineup, the demands of the sixth amendment have been met even though the attorney does not establish a confidential relationship with the accused in regard to the charges being investigated. Zamora v. Guam, 394 F.2d 815 (9th Cir. 1968).

3.     Although the use of substitute counsel may be appropriate in cases where the accused's counsel refuses to appear or is not able to appear immediately, such a procedure should be discouraged.

4.     When a substitute is employed, efforts to insure impartiality are critical. Furthermore, the observations and opinions of the surrogate with regard to the identification proceeding must be transmitted to accused's actual counsel. See Marshall v. United States, 436 F.2d 155 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

5.     In United States v. Kirby, 427 F.2d 610 (D.C. Cir. 1970), a post-indictment lineup was held in the absence of accused's previously appointed attorney. A substitute counsel from the legal aid agency was present, however, to protect accused's interests. In allowing the testimony of identification obtained at this proceeding, the Federal district court ruled that the use of substitute counsel here was allowable since failure to notify accused's actual counsel was the result of administrative oversight and not governmental misconduct.

1417         DUE PROCESS

A.     *Caselaw

1.     In Stovall v. Denno, 388 U.S. 293 (1967), the Supreme Court first recognized accused's due process right to exclude from evidence testimony of identifications resulting from unnecessarily suggestive procedures conducive to irreparable misidentification. Stovall involved a confrontation between the accused and an assault victim one day after the victim underwent major surgery to save her life. In a one-man showup conducted in the victim's hospital room, the handcuffed accused was presented to the victim and asked whether the accused "was the man." The accused, the only black man in a room containing five white policemen and two white hospital attendants, was identified as the assailant.

a. In rejecting the defense claim that the accused's right to due process had been violated, the Court stated that the applicable test was whether, judged by the totality of the circumstances, the procedures used were unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable misidentification.

b. The Court concluded that the procedures used in Stovall were not unnecessarily suggestive and conducive to irreparable misidentification since the suggestive nature of the confrontation was indeed necessary, and the need to secure an identification from a dying victim was a circumstance that outweighed the highly suggestive procedure employed.

c. Similar circumstances occurred in a military case, United States v. Batzel, 15 M.J. 640 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982), where the court found nothing improper in the showup, minutes after the offense, of the assailant to the victim who already had one eye swollen shut as a result of her injuries and was rapidly losing sight in the other eye. The court reflected that perhaps a showup involving a single handcuffed individual in the custody of police is always suggestive, but quickly recognized that it does not follow that the showup was unnecessary under the circumstances.

The need to analyze the circumstances surrounding the requirement for a showup is emphasized in United States v. White, 17 M.J. 953 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984), wherein the victim of a locker theft chased the thief but lost him. The police apprehended a suspect, matching a very detailed description of the thief himself, and his clothing. Fifteen to twenty minutes later the victim viewed the accused, while the accused was the only black male in the room and the only person not in uniform. The court found the identification to be unreliable because it was unnecessarily suggestive. (However, a subsequent lineup was not the product of the unduly suggestive pretrial showup.)

2. In Simmons v. United States, 390 U.S. 377 (1968), FBI agents showed snapshots of the accused to witnesses of a bank robbery in order to obtain a lead in solving the crime. Identification of the accused as the robber led to his arrest and indictment. At trial, witnesses who had previously viewed the snapshots made in-court identifications of the accused that helped lead to his conviction. On appeal, the accused claimed that the unnecessarily suggestive photo identification fatally tainted the subsequent in-court identifications.

a. In rejecting the accused's argument, the Supreme Court held that the in-court identifications would be suppressed only upon a showing that the photographic identification procedure was so impermissibly suggestive as to raise a very substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification.

b. The identification procedure used in Simmons was not impermissibly suggestive, since the police use of the photographs was proper in light of the requirement for swift action. In addition, the possibility of irreparable misidentification was remote, since the witnesses had ample time and opportunity to view the accused under favorable conditions during the robbery.

3. Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188 (1972), synthesized the prior case law by announcing that evidence of a pretrial identification is not inadmissible simply because the process is unnecessarily suggestive. In addition, the process must be conducive to misidentification. This principle has been affirmed by the Court of Military Appeals in United States v. Quick, 3 M.J. 70 (C.M.A. 1977) and in United States v. Fors, 10 M.J. 367 (C.M.A. 1981).

a. In the Biggers case, the accused was identified as the victim's rapist at a stationhouse showup seven months after the crime. The victim had been in her assailant's presence for some time and had directly observed him both indoors and under a full moon outdoors. She testified that she had "no doubt" that Biggers was her assailant. She previously had given the police a description of the assailant. Furthermore, she had made no identification of others presented at previous lineups or through photographs.

b. In allowing the identification into evidence, the court held that "admission of evidence of a [unnecessarily suggestive] showup without more does not violate due process." Rather, the "central question is whether under the totality of the circumstances the identification was reliable even though the confrontation procedure was suggestive." Id. at 199.

c. In determining whether there is a substantial likelihood of misidentification, the Biggers Court stated that the trial judge must balance the following factors:

- (1) The opportunity of the witness to view the criminal at the time of the crime;
- (2) the witness' degree of attention;
- (3) the accuracy of the witness' prior description of the criminal;
- (4) the level of certainty demonstrated by the witness at the confrontation; and
- (5) the length of time between the crime and the confrontation.

4. In Manson v. Brathwaite, 432 U.S. 98 (1977), the Supreme Court ruled that a one-photo identification did not violate due process when, under the totality of the circumstances as determined by an application of the Biggers' criteria, the identification was reliable.

5. In United States v. Rhodes, 42 M.J. 287 (1995), the accused moved to suppress any in-court identification by the victim because it was tainted by an improper pretrial identification done in violation of the accused's due process rights. In this case the accused was apprehended shortly after the report of the crime. The alleged victim was taken to the place of apprehension and identified the accused after being asked "is that the one." The court stated that while a showup may be "suggestive", the court must examine if it is "unnecessarily suggestive." The court applied the Biggers factors and upheld the decision to allow the in-court identification.

6. In addition to the factors laid out in Biggers, courts have considered the following in determining whether an identification is reliable.

a. The exercise by the witness of unusual care in making the observation. United States v. Green, 436 F.2d 290 (D.C. Cir. 1970).

b. Prompt identification at first confrontation. People v. Covington, 265 N.E. 2d 112 (1970).

c. Fairness of the lineup. United States v. Longoria, 43 C.M.R. 676 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 20 C.M.A. 669, 43 C.M.R. 413 (1971).

d. The presence of distinctive characteristics in defendant. United States v. Zeiler, 447 F.2d 993 (3d Cir. 1971).

e. Prior acquaintance of witness with suspect. People v. Davis, 201 N.E. 2d 314 (1970).

f. Witness' ability and training in identification. United States v. Ganter, 436 F.2d 364 (7th Cir. 1970).

United States v. McLaurin, 22 M.J. 310 (C.M.A. 1986) applied the Biggers test to the military. The court went through the various factors as outlined in Biggers. In McLaurin, the accused was convicted of rape and various other charges. The victims identified the accused through a photo line up one year after the assault. The defense did not request an instruction on identification. The court held that the identification was sufficient and the military judge had no sua sponte duty to give such an instruction.

B. Military Rule of Evidence 321

1. Mil.R.Evid. 321 has adopted the Supreme Court standards of due process pertaining to eyewitness evidence. The rule provides specifically that:

When an objection raises the issue of an unreliable identification, the prosecution must prove by a preponderance of evidence that the identification was reliable under the circumstances; provided, however, that if the military judge finds the evidence of an identification inadmissible under this subdivision, a later identification may be admitted if the prosecution proves by clear and convincing evidence that the later identification is not the result of the inadmissible identification.

Mil.R.Evid. 321(d)(2).

1418      FOURTH AMENDMENT CONSIDERATIONS

A.      May a person be compelled to appear in a lineup?

1. In United States v. Kittell, 49 C.M.R. 225 (A.F.C.M.R. 1974), the Air Force Court of Military Review held that it was not improper to require airmen to appear in formation for the purpose of identifying an unknown suspect to a crime. Such a practice does not constitute a seizure within the meaning of the fourth amendment such that a preliminary showing of reasonableness is required.

2. The procedure in Kittel was a lawful exercise of the commander's inherent responsibility to investigate offenses allegedly committed by members of his command similar in nature to the subpoenas issued to "potential defendants" in United States v. Dionisio, 410 U.S. 1 (1973). In Dionisio, the Supreme Court concluded that compelling a person to appear before a grand jury did not constitute an unreasonable "seizure." Cf. Davis v. Mississippi, 394 U.S. 721 (1969), where accused's rape conviction was overturned because fingerprints linking him to the crime were obtained as the result of an illegal arrest of his person.

B.      What effect does an illegal apprehension have on a subsequent eyewitness identification?

1. If the witness' identity was discovered, or his cooperation secured only as a result of an unlawful search or arrest of the accused, then any subsequent identification will be suppressed unless based on an independent source. Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U.S. 471 (1963); Silverthorne Lumber Co. v. United States, 251 U.S. 385 (1920).

2. In United States v. Crews, 445 U.S. 463 (1980), the accused was illegally arrested and photographed while in custody. These photographs were subsequently shown to the robbery victim who identified the accused as her assailant. At trial, the victim made an in-court identification of the accused. In refusing to suppress evidence of the in-court identification, a majority of the Supreme Court held that the illegal arrest did not taint any of the "three distinct elements" that normally comprise an in-court identification. These "three distinct elements" were described as follows:

a. First, the arrest did not produce the victim's presence at trial, since she had called the police immediately after having been robbed and well before the accused's illegal arrest.

b. Second, the arrest did not taint the victim's ability to give accurate in-court identification testimony. Applying the criteria set forth in Neil v. Biggers, 409 U.S. 188 (1972), the Court concluded that the victim's courtroom identification was based on her independent recollection of the event, not on the suppressible pretrial photo array.

c. Third, the accused's physical presence at trial is not challengeable on the grounds of an illegal arrest. Frisbie v. Collins, 342 U.S. 519 (1952), stands for the proposition that an illegal arrest, without more, cannot bar subsequent prosecution, nor is it a defense in a trial which is based on evidence wholly untainted by police misconduct.

3. See chapter XIII, SEARCH AND SEIZURE, supra, for a more detailed discussion on the effect of an improper seizure on derivative evidence. The issue has been raised in a number of cases, and what constitutes a "seizure" in the military setting remains inexact.

1419 RELATED ISSUES

A. *Article 31 warnings not required

1. In Holt v. United States, 218 U.S. 245 (1910), Justice Holmes observed that "[t]he prohibition of compelling a man in a criminal court to be a witness against himself is a prohibition of the use of physical or moral compulsion to extort communications from him, not an exclusion of his body as evidence when it is material."

2. In United States v. Webster, 40 C.M.R. 627 (A.C.M.R.), petition denied, 18 C.M.A. 640, 40 C.M.R. 327 (1969), an Army Court of Military Review held that it is not necessary that a suspect be advised under article 31 before placing him in a lineup. Furthermore, the use of reasonable coercion is permissible when requiring a suspect to participate in a lineup.

B. *Countering obstructionist defense tactics

1. Occasionally, suspects, by drastically altering their physical appearance prior to a confrontation (e.g., cutting hair, growing beard, etc.), will attempt to frustrate efforts by the government to conduct a meaningful lineup.

2. In United States v. Rosato, 3 C.M.A. 143, 11 C.M.R. 143 (1953), and again in United States v. Eggers, 3 C.M.A. 191, 11 C.M.R. 191 (1953), the Court of Military Appeals laid down standards which recognize that acts requiring only the passive cooperation of the accused can be compelled without violating the privilege against self-incrimination. Thus, it allows the compulsion of such acts as forcibly shaving a man, or trimming his hair, requiring him to grow a beard, or to wear a wig. See also United States v. Cain, 5 M.J. 844 (A.C.M.R. 1973) (required act of showing a tooth to the court was not incriminating communication within the meaning of article 31 or the fifth amendment); United States v. Akgun, 19 M.J. 770 (A.C.M.R. 1984) (compelling a suspect to produce a voice exemplar does not violate the privilege against self-incrimination).

3. United States v. Jackson, 476 F.2d 249 (7th Cir. 1973) (allows prosecution to present evidence of accused's recent alteration of appearance and to argue its relevance on the issue of guilt or innocence).

C. *Expert testimony

1. An interesting issue relates to whether the defense can present expert testimony to show that eyewitness identifications are inherently unreliable and therefore not worthy of belief. Applying the liberal standard of Mil.R.Evid. 702, the C.A.A.F. held in United States v. Garcia, 44 M.J. 27 (1996), cert. denied, 117 S.Ct. 174 (1996) that it was error for the judge to exclude expert testimony on memory transference and transportation with respect to pretrial identifications (court however found no prejudice in this particular case). The military judge did appropriately allow the expert to testify as to the effects of stress on the memory and pressure from authoritative figures.

2. Additionally, in United States v. Brown, 45 M.J. 514 (Army Ct.Crim.App., Dec. 18, 1996), the court held that such expert testimony on eyewitness identification was counter-intuitive and flew in the face of common beliefs about eye/brain interaction and was precisely the type of scientific and specialized knowledge that would assist the trier of fact.

D. *Defense right to compel a lineup

1. The majority position is that an accused has no right to force the government to conduct a lineup to test the reliability of a previously held photographic array or to otherwise test a witness' powers of perception. United States v. Zane, 495 F.2d 683 (2d Cir.), cert. denied, 419 U.S. 895 (1974); United States v. McGhee, 488 F.2d 781 (5th Cir. 1974); United States v. White, 482 F.2d 485 (4th Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 415 U.S. 949 (1974); United States v. Furtney, 454 F.2d 1 (3d Cir. 1972).

2. Whether an in-court lineup may be held, or the accused allowed to sit with spectators at trial, is a matter within the trial judge's discretion. United States v. Archibald, 734 F.2d 938 (2d Cir. 1984); United States v. Hamilton, 469 F.2d 880 (9th Cir. 1972); United States v. Williams, 436 F.2d 1166 (9th Cir. 1970), cert. denied, 402 U.S. 912 (1971).

E. Cautionary instruction

1. There exists no specific requirement in the military that a special instruction concerning eyewitness testimony be given. The trial judge need only instruct on the witness' credibility and the government's burden of proof.

2. In United States v. Telfaire, 469 F.2d 552 (D.C. Cir. 1972), the court recognized the need for an instruction on eyewitness identification that would specifically alert the jury to the vagaries of such testimony and provided a sample instruction to that effect. It held that trial judges should, as a matter of routine, include such an instruction in cases where identification is a major issue, even absent a defense request, though failure to give such an instruction in this case was held not to be prejudicial in the absence of a defense request. United States v. McLaurin, 22 M.J. 310 (C.M.A. 1986) held that the military judge need not give a Telfaire instruction sua sponte. However, the opinion did suggest that military judges give a Telfaire instruction when requested. However, in United States v. Scott, 24 M.J. 186 (C.M.A. 1987), the court reversed a case in which an instruction on interracial identifications was not requested nor given. The court reversed the case for ineffective assistance of counsel but said in such cases with interracial identifications, instructions are "particularly appropriate."

3. In United States v. Cannon, 26 M.J. 674 (A.F.C.M.R. 1988), the accused was found guilty of stealing some money from the credit union account of another servicemember by using the victim's ATM card to withdraw the money without his permission. At trial, the government produced two witnesses against the accused who were able to testify that they saw the accused making a withdrawal from the ATM in question at about the same time as the illegal withdrawals were known to have occurred. Prior to trial, the witnesses were also able to pick the accused out of a photo lineup. The accused was African-American. One of the government witnesses was white and the other one was Asian-Indian. The defense counsel requested an instruction regarding the potential for misidentification in cases of interracial identification, but the military judge declined to give it. The court found this to be error, reasoning that, in cases of interracial identification, an instruction along the lines of United States v. Telfaire, 469 F.2d 552 (D.C. Cir. 1972) must be given when defense counsel requests it. The Court of Military Appeals expanded on the Cannon decision in United States v. Thompson, 31 M.J. 125 (C.M.A. 1990). In Thompson, the court opined that a cross-racial identification instruction is required when requested by the defense and when cross-racial identification is a primary issue in a case. The court highlighted that, just because the accused and the witness are of a different race, this alone is not enough to mandate issuance of the instruction.

1420 INTRODUCTION OF EYEWITNESS TESTIMONY

A. Admissibility of eyewitness testimony

1. Mil.R.Evid. 801(d)(1)(C) defines as not hearsay any identification made "after perceiving" the person if the identifying witness is testifying in court, under oath, and subject to cross-examination. There is no prerequisite for an in-court identification by the witness before reference can be made to an extrajudicial identification. The rule permits a witness to refer to such extrajudicial identifications even though they do not fit within any of the hearsay exceptions. If, however, the eyewitness does not testify, another witness' testimony about the eyewitness' out-of-court identification would have to satisfy the criteria for a hearsay exception.

2. Mil.R.Evid. 321(a)(1) provides that testimony concerning a relevant extrajudicial identification by any person is admissible if such testimony is otherwise admissible under the Mil.R.Evid. This allows use of an extrajudicial identification to bolster one given in court, even though the witness' credibility has not been attacked.

3. In United States v. Lewis, 565 F.2d 1248 (2d Cir. 1977), an eyewitness was unsuccessful in identifying the accused at trial, even though she had identified his photograph shortly after the bank robbery. An FBI agent was allowed to testify about the out-of-court identification. Lewis held that the agent's testimony was included in the Rule 801(d)(1)(C) hearsay exemption because the eyewitness declarant testified at trial subject to cross-examination. Lewis also held that Rule 801(d)(1)(C) language about "identification of a person after perceiving him" includes photograph identification.

It must be noted, however, that the eyewitness must testify prior to such testimony being admissible under either Mil.R.Evid. 321(a)(1) or 801(d)(1)(C). United States v. Evans, 27 M.J. 34 (C.M.A. 1988).

4. In United States v. Owens, 484 U.S. 554, 108 S.Ct. 838, 98 L.Ed.2d 951 (1988), a prisoner brutally assaulted a guard with intent to murder. The victim knew Owens and identified him by name after the assault, but suffered extensive memory loss and could not answer questions at trial regarding the assault or the identification. The 9th Circuit held that the Rule 801(d)(1)(C) language about "identification of a person after perceiving him" includes identification of a person already known to the declarant without having to see him again after the incident. It held that another person with personal knowledge of the identification could testify under Rule 801(d)(1), as long as the eyewitness who made the identification was subject to cross-examination concerning it. However, it held that Rule 801(d)(1) was not satisfied in Owens. This was not a case in which the eyewitness simply could no longer make an in-court identification due to the passage of time or the defendant's change in appearance (as in Lewis), but one in which the eyewitness—though testifying—was not really subject to cross-examination because of his memory loss. The United States Supreme Court reversed, holding that the confrontation clause only requires that the accused be permitted an opportunity to conduct effective cross-examination, not cross-examination that is effective in whatever way, and to whatever extent, the defense might wish. Therefore, the accused's sixth amendment right to confront his accuser was protected by a procedure which allowed him to cross-examine the victim even though the victim was unable to recall seeing the accused during the assault. The victim's identification of the accused was admissible under Fed.R.Evid. 801(d), since the victim was present to testify in court under oath and was subject to cross-examination. He did not cease to be subject to cross-examination simply because of his inability to recall seeing the accused at the time of the assault.

B. Identification after prior inadmissible identification. If a military judge finds the evidence of an identification inadmissible, a later identification may be admitted if the prosecution proves by clear and convincing evidence that the later identification was not the result of the inadmissible identification. Mil.R.Evid. 321(d)(2). See United States v. White, 17 M.J. 953 (A.F.C.M.R. 1984).

C. Other relevant out-of-court identifications. Other relevant out-of-court identifications are analyzed under the same principles that apply to having the suspect showup or lineup, except there is no right to have counsel present. See United States v. Tyler, 17 M.J. 381 (C.M.A. 1984) (Mil.R.Evid. 321(a)(1) applies to setting up a display of several different compounds to see if informants could identify cocaine); United States v. Chandler, 17 M.J. 678 petition denied, 18 M.J. 132 (C.M.A. 1984) (A.C.M.R. 1983), petition denied, 18 M.J. 132 (C.M.A. 1984) (voice identification procedures are governed by legal principles concerning suggestiveness applicable to eyewitness lineups); United States v. Akgun, 19 M.J. 770 (A.C.M.R. 1984) aff'd, 24 M.J. 434 (C.M.A. 1987) (no right to counsel exists at voice exemplar spread).

D. Requirement for an objection. Mil.R.Evid. 321(c)(2) requires the defense counsel to object at the appropriate time, usually prior to pleas, assuming that trial counsel has disclosed prior identification information as required. Failure to object constitutes a waiver of the issue. United States v. Gordon, 18 M.J. 463 (C.M.A. 1984), United States v. Jones, 24 M.J. 827 (A.C.M.R. 1987).

CHAPTER XV

OPENING STATEMENT AND ARGUMENTS

1501 INTRODUCTION. Experts agree that properly crafted and presented opening statements and arguments are the key to effective courtroom advocacy. These provide counsel opportunities to talk directly with the court, characterize facts in a light most favorable to their position, and to sell themselves as confident and trustworthy professionals. This chapter will discuss the various times during a trial when opening statements and argument are appropriate and the restrictions on the content of counsel's comments.

First addressed are the procedural aspects of opening statements and the most common errors relating to them; next are the procedural aspects of arguments, including the references governing each type of argument; then the general rules as to the contents of argument; and, finally, a discussion of errors applicable only to specialized argument such as argument as to appropriate punishment at the conclusion of the presentencing hearing.

1502 STRATEGIC ASPECTS OF ADDRESSING THE COURT. Lengthy discussion of the style, tactics, and strategy involved in the presentation of opening statements and argument is beyond the scope of this chapter. Generally, the key to effective argument is to plan in advance of trial the points you wish to argue (given the facts of the case), then, working backward, ensure these points will be supported by facts in evidence. In this way, planning each presentation helps counsel shape the entire case such that essential objectives are met and surplusage avoided during the presentation of evidence. More specific strategic, tactical, and stylistic aspects of opening statements and argument are covered in the trial advocacy portion of the course.

1503 OPENING STATEMENTS

A. Purpose. The opening statement is a brief account of the issues to be tried and the evidence to be introduced. The fundamental purpose of an opening statement is to prepare the court to listen to the evidence, not to argue the case. Counsel may also use an opening statement to "educate" the court or to develop rapport. To achieve these ends, most trial lawyers use the format of a simple story, setting forth the basic facts in chronological order. This alerts the court to important items of evidence to watch for during the trial.

Trial counsel may make an opening statement before the government's case-in-chief. The defense counsel may make an opening statement either before the government's case-in-chief or before the defense presents its evidence. As a matter of discretion, the military judge may permit counsel to address the court at other stages of the proceedings. R.C.M. 913(b).

B. *Errors relating to opening statements

1. Opening statements are not argument. The purpose of the opening statement is not to argue the evidence, but to alert the trier of fact to the evidence about to be presented. Therefore, the opening statement must not become argumentative, nor may legal authorities be cited.

2. Counsel must avoid matters as to which no admissible evidence is available or intended to be offered. See discussion to R.C.M. 913(b). In United States v. Matthews, 13 M.J. 501, 515 (A.C.M.R. 1982), the trial counsel asserted that he would prove that the accused had "repeatedly expressed a desire to brutally rape a woman." The trial counsel's assertion was found to be in good faith, but his proof fell short when his reluctant witness, a friend of the accused, related only that, on one occasion, the accused had stated he would like to rape a woman. The court found error, citing ABA Standard 3-5.5 (2d ed. 1980) and MCM, 1969 (Rev.), para. 44g(2), but declined to rule that there was an abuse of discretion in the denial of the defense-requested mistrial:

In view of the trial counsel's apparent good faith and the repeated admonitions by the military judge that statements of counsel are not evidence, we are satisfied that the military judge's curative instructions were an adequate remedy for the trial counsel's overstatement of his case, and that the military judge did not abuse his discretion by declining to invoke the drastic remedy of a mistrial.

1504 OPPORTUNITIES FOR ARGUMENT (Key Numbers 1253-1259). Argument is counsel's opportunity to speak directly to the members or to the military judge without presenting any new evidence. There are basically four instances during the trial that counsel has an opportunity to present argument. These include argument on motions, on evidentiary objections, on findings, and on sentence.

A. Motions. Before action is taken on a contested motion, each side has the opportunity to present evidence and make an argument. R.C.M. 905(h), MCM, 1984 [hereinafter R.C.M.]. Restricting arguments or arbitrarily refusing to hear arguments on an interlocutory question may constitute error. The military judge may, within his or her discretion, limit or refuse to hear arguments which are trivial, mere repetition, or designed as a delaying tactic. Traditionally, the party who must carry the burden of proof on any contested motion will have the opportunity to argue first and make a rebuttal argument. For examples of the various possible motions, and upon which side the burden of proof rests, see the table in the NJS Procedure Study Guide, chapter XVI. It appears to be within the discretion of the military judge to vary the traditional approach (e.g., by restricting counsel to one argument each). See discussion to R.C.M. 801(a)(3). Generally, however, when the military judge states (to no one in particular): "The court will hear argument on the motion," he or she will expect the party bearing the burden on the issue to argue first.

B. *Evidentiary objections and any other questions or matters presented to the court for decision during the course of the courts-martial. Generally, the military judge may permit comment by counsel on any point under litigation. When objecting to the admissibility of items of evidence, counsel must be guided by Rule 29 of the Uniform Rules of Practice Before Navy and Marine Corps Courts-Martial:

Counsel initially shall state only the nature and basis of an objection, without further elaboration. Counsel shall not present argument on an objection without the permission of the military judge. Argument on objections shall be direct and succinct. Citation of specific authority is desired. An objection or argument for the purpose of making a speech, recapitulating testimony, or attempting to guide a witness, is prohibited. After the military judge rules on an objection, counsel may only make comment or further argument with the express permission of the military judge.

This should also include argument on proposed instructions and argument on challenges for cause. See R.C.M. 920(b) and 1005(b) regarding instructions and United States v. Michaud, 48 C.M.R. 379 (N.C.M.R. 1973) for challenges.

C. *Argument on findings (Key Numbers 1253-1254). The Manual for Courts-Martial, 1984 [hereinafter MCM], sets forth the general procedure to be followed by counsel in presenting argument on findings. R.C.M. 919. The MCM provides that, after both sides have rested, counsel for both sides are permitted to make argument. Trial counsel may make the first argument and defense the second. Trial counsel may then make the last argument, but their remarks are limited to a discussion of those matters raised by the defense counsel in counsel's argument. If trial counsel is permitted to introduce new matter in his or her last argument, defense counsel is then entitled to a second argument. However, if no new matters are raised by trial counsel, a second argument by defense is within the discretion of the military judge. Finally, if defense counsel is allowed to make a second argument, trial counsel still has the right to present the last argument. See Discussion R.C.M. 919.

D. *Argument as to appropriate sentence (Key Number 1316). After the introduction of all evidentiary matters during the presentencing hearing, counsel for both sides may make arguments relating to their respective views as to what sentence, if any, is appropriate under the facts and circumstances of the case. Traditionally, most judges limit the government and defense to one argument each. Rebuttal argument by the trial counsel is the discretionary call of the military judge. Therefore, trial counsel should request of the military judge an opportunity to make a rebuttal argument, if desired, or at least permission to argue after the defense counsel. In United States v. Martin, 39 M.J. 481 (C.M.A. 1994), the military judge gave the trial counsel the option of arguing first or last. The defense objected when the trial counsel chose to argue last. The court stated that when you deviate from standard practice, you need to put on the record the "good cause" reason for the deviation. In United States v. Tilly, 44 M.J. 851 (N.M.Ct.Crim.App. 1996), the military judge allowed the Government to reopen its sentencing case after arguments and post the commencement of deliberations. The court found that the military judge did not abuse his discretion in allowing this.

1505 IMPROPER ARGUMENT

A. Errors common to all arguments. Proper content in argument may simply be defined as what counsel may say without risking error. Since the nature and type of argument that may be within or without this definition is limited only by the imagination of counsel, it is impossible to evaluate and comment upon every conceivable type of remark. Thus, this section will deal with the most common areas where errors occur.

1. Criticizing or denouncing the accused. As long as the argument concerns the issues, facts, and circumstances of the case, it will not be held improper because it may incidentally criticize or denounce the accused or stir the sympathies or prejudices of the court members. Two decisions of the Court of Military Appeals illustrate the extent to which the propriety of arguments depends upon the issues, facts, and circumstances of the case.

In the first case, United States v. Doctor, 7 C.M.A. 126, 21 C.M.R. 252 (1956), the Court of Military Appeals considered argument of trial counsel to the effect that the accused was a psychopathic liar and a schemer who would falsify to anyone. Additionally, trial counsel stated that he did not cross-examine the accused because he disliked listening to lies from the witness stand. The court held the comments proper since they accurately described the crime charged and their use was supported by testimony. The crime charged was false swearing, which supported the statement that the accused would falsify to anyone, and there was a conflict between the testimony of the government's witnesses and that of the accused, which supported the comment concerning lies from the witness stand.

In the second case, United States v. Pettigrew, 19 C.M.A. 191, 41 C.M.R. 191 (1969), the court evaluated a statement by trial counsel that the accused perjured himself when he testified. The charge was a violation of an order, and the accused testified that he did not hear the order. No witness testified to the contrary, and there was no evidence in the record that the accused was lying. Finding that the comment by trial counsel was not based upon evidence in the record and that the comments were so inflammatory as to prejudice the accused, the court reversed the conviction.

The distinction between what might appear to be virtually identical comments by the trial counsel is the general principle that argument must be supported by the facts of the case. In Doctor, the evidence supported the comments that the accused was lying, but this was not the case in Pettigrew, in which there was no evidence contradicting the accused's testimony that he simply did not hear the order given. See also United States v. Fuentes, 18 M.J. 41, 52 (C.M.A. 1984) (the trial counsel's characterization of the accused's testimony as "improbable, contradictory, and . . . fabricated" was properly based upon evidence that had been received) and United States v. Knickerbocker, 2 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1977) (the trial counsel had very extensive remarks disparaging the credibility of the accused as a witness).

The Court of Military Appeals has further defined the limits on sentencing arguments by trial counsel that the accused has testified falsely. In United States v. Warren, 13 M.J. 278 (C.M.A. 1982), the court applied the rationale of United States v. Grayson, 438 U.S. 41 (1978), and held that, when the accused testifies on the merits and is subsequently convicted, trial counsel may argue that the court consider the fact that the accused lied under oath in deciding the accused's potential for rehabilitation in arriving at an appropriate sentence. Upon request of the accused, however, the military judge must instruct the members that they may consider the accused's false testimony only so far as it bears upon the likelihood that the accused can be rehabilitated (not merely to punish the accused for lying) and only if the members conclude that the accused did lie under oath and that such lies were willful and material. See also United States v. Cabebe, 13 M.J. 303 (C.M.A. 1982); United States v. Beaty, 14 M.J. 155 (C.M.A. 1982); United States v. Fisher, 17 M.J. 768 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983) (no abuse of discretion for MJ to give Warren instruction where warranted, even over DC's objection).

2. Citation of legal authorities to court members (Key Number 1254). The Court of Military Appeals and the MCM specifically provide that counsel may not cite legal authorities or the facts of other cases when arguing to members on findings. See United States v. Clifton, 15 M.J. 26 (C.M.A. 1983) and the discussion to R.C.M. 919(b). The rationale for this rule is twofold, as there is a distinction between the prohibition against reading the facts of other cases and reading the law set forth in other cases. The prohibition against reading the facts of other cases is simply an application of the general rule confining arguments to the facts of the case being heard. In regard to reading principles of law set forth in other cases, the practice would violate not only the rule that argument is to be confined to reasonable comment upon the evidence but, additionally, the rule that the law of the case is to be provided by the military judge. R.C.M. 920.

This rule against reading legal authorities during argument to the court members does not preclude a discussion of the applicability of the facts to the law of the case before the court. It would be impossible for counsel to present a persuasive argument on the matters before the court without reference to the law of the case. Counsel risk error, however, if their discussion sets forth an erroneous principle of law. United States v. Fethers, 38 C.M.R. 815 (1967) (erroneous statement that intent to desert could be inferred from the length of the absence alone).

3. Misstatements of facts in evidence (Key Numbers 1254 and 1318).

Closely related to erroneous statements of law in argument are erroneous statements of fact by counsel. In a long and complicated trial, counsel have a tendency to misstate facts brought out in testimony or to argue facts that were not in evidence. Misstatements of fact have a propensity for error because the court members may tend to be influenced by counsel's recollection of the evidence as related to them in argument. United States v. Hampton, 40 M.J. 457 (C.M.A. 1994) (trial counsel misstated the evidence when he argued that the witness said the "accused should not stay in the Army" when the witness actually testified that the accused had "no rehabilitative potential." United States v. Gifford, 41 C.M.R. 537 (A.C.M.R. 1969); United States v. Shows, 5 M.J. 892 (A.F.C.M.R. 1978). In many cases, such error, if committed, can be cured by the trial judge through the typical instruction that it is the court members' recollection of the evidence, not that of counsel, which is controlling. Since objection is nearly always required to avoid waiving the issue, the trial judge will necessarily be placed on notice of the perceived problem and will virtually always act to cure any potential error.

4. Arguing facts not in evidence (Key Number 1257). All comments by counsel must be supported by some evidence in the record. This is consistent with the principle, as the military judge instructs the members, that counsel's arguments are not evidence. In United States v. Clifton, 15 M.J. 26, 29 (C.M.A. 1973), the court stated, "The reasons are obvious: arguments are not given under oath, are not subject to objection based upon the rules of evidence, and are not subject to the testing process of cross-examination. If the rule were contrary, an accused's right of confrontation would be abridged, and the opportunity to impeach the source denied." See also United States v. Adkinson, 40 C.M.R. 341 (A.B.R. 1968) (trial counsel erred in arguing that the Army was having more disciplinary problems with E-5's than any other single group, there being no foundation in the record to support that claim); United States v. Eck, 10 M.J. 501 (A.F.C.M.R. 1980) (trial counsel argued that the accused was "no novice to the drug trade" but was "an experienced dealer" based upon the accused's conviction for a one-time sale of 405 grams of marijuana).

This principle does not prevent the counsel from making comments regarding the inferences which may be drawn from the evidence presented. United States v. McCarthy, 37 M.J. 595 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993), United States v. White, 36 M.J. 306 (C.M.A. 1993). In United States v. Robinson, 43 M.J. 501 (A.F.Ct.Crim.App.), rev. denied, 43 M.J. 241 (1995), the accused was convicted of abusing his two stepdaughters. The trial counsel argued on sentencing that the accused was a danger to his natural daughter based on what he had done to his stepdaughters. The court found that the trial counsel properly argued a reasonable inference. In United States v. Soto, 30 C.M.R. 859 (A.F.B.R. 1960), the court held that trial counsel did not commit error by arguing that a larceny victim had not given the accused permission to take the property, despite a lack of such evidence in the victim's testimony. The court reasoned that the court members had heard the testimony in question and would reach their own conclusions as aided by rebuttal arguments and the military judge's instructions. If counsel is going to draw inferences from the evidence, these inferences must be reasonable ones. In United States v. Falcon, 16 M.J. 528, 530 (A.C.M.R. 1983), the court found error where the trial counsel insinuated that there was evidence, not before the court, of uncharged assaults committed by the accused. In rebuttal argument on the issue of the accused's peaceable character, the trial counsel commented, "Consider also something too, this peacefulness business. There's always a first time. Probably wasn't his first time actually, but there's always a first time for a record anyway and that was it." (Emphasis added.)

Additionally, counsel may comment on facts of contemporary history although they are not in evidence. United States v. Priest, 46 C.M.R. 368 (N.M.C.M.R. 1971) (comments on contemporary assassinations and civil strife after disloyal statements convictions). Generally, comments on matters of common knowledge within the community are permissible. United States v. Long, 17 C.M.A. 323, 38 C.M.R. 121 (1967) (comments on commonly known military facts). However, the courts will not permit counsel, in sentencing, to make reference to the policy of the services on drug abuse. The courts have found this to be plain error, especially if the military judge did not give a curative instruction. United States v. Schomaker, 17 M.J. 1122 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984) and United States v. Brown, 19 M.J. 826 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984).

However, in United States v. Kropf, 39 M.J. 107 (C.M.A. 1994), the Court of Military Appeals looked at the issue again. The TC in a drug case made reference to the Navy's zero tolerance policy. The court held that the reference did not clearly infect the members' deliberations or affect a substantial right of the accused. The court also held that since the defense counsel did not object to the argument, any error was waived. The court held there was no plain error, but cautioned trial counsel to "tread lightly" in this area. The best advice is that trial counsel should avoid arguing policy in closing argument or risk reversal.

Two types of argument are analogous to counsel stating a fact upon which the court has no evidence. The first of these occurs when counsel states that they had additional witnesses available to bolster their case or when government counsel suggests that an inference of recent fabrication can be made because the defense did not produce the names of possible exculpatory witnesses. United States v. Tackett, 16 C.M.A. 226, 36 C.M.R. 382 (1966) and United States v. Swoape, 21 M.J. 414 (C.M.A. 1986), respectively. In United States v. Adams, 44 M.J. 251 (1996), the accused was ultimately convicted of forgery. The accused took the stand and the prosecutor asked the accused if the defense had hired experts to examine the alleged forged documents. The accused answered yes. No further questioning in this area was conducted. The trial counsel in argument questioned why if the defense had experts examine these documents did not they not come into court and testify as to their conclusions. The court found this argument to be inappropriate. The second situation occurs when counsel refer to the effect of the case upon relations between the military and civilian communities. In United States v. Cook, 11 C.M.A. 99, 28 C.M.R. 323 (1959), the Court of Military Appeals reversed a conviction for murder of a Filipino because the trial counsel argued to the court members that their decision would have a great impact on life in the Philippines for American forces, and they must show everyone that justice could be done. The court's holding was based upon the rationale that such argument incorporates theories or facts not supported by the evidence. See also United States v. Ernst, 17 M.J. 835 (C.G.C.M.R. 1984) (unsupported comments by trial counsel on effect of offenses on relations between Coast Guard and civilian law enforcement agencies).

5. Personal opinion (Key Number 1255). The rule in this area is that counsel may not express to the court a personal opinion of the guilt, innocence, or veracity of the accused. The Court of Military Appeals has held that to do so is not only impermissible, it is unprofessional. See, e.g., United States v. Fuentes, 18 M.J. 26 (C.M.A. 1983); United States v. Knickerbocker, 2 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1977). In United States v. Horn, 9 M.J. 429 (C.M.A. 1980), the Court of Military Appeals held that the prosecutor's use of the phrase, "I think" some twenty-eight times in opening and closing arguments was an improper expression of his personal belief. The court cited the then-existing ABA Code of Professional Responsibility, Disciplinary Rule 7-106(C)(4) declaring:

While a prosecutor may argue all reasonable inferences from evidence in the record it is unprofessional for him to express his personal belief or opinion as to the truth or falsity of any testimony or evidence. Such beliefs or opinions are merely a form of unsworn, unchecked testimony and tend to exploit the influence of his office and undermine the objective detachment which should separate a lawyer from the cause for which he argues.

9 M.J. at 430 (emphasis added).

While it is the safer practice to avoid the use of the pronoun "I" in argument, there is nothing wrong, per se, in its use by the prosecution. In United States v. Zeigler, 14 M.J. 860 (A.C.M.R. 1982), the court held that the use of the word "I" by the trial counsel in argument was not error, as the word was not used to express a personal belief or opinion as to the truth or veracity of any testimony or evidence or the guilt of the accused. The court did, however, describe what use of "I" was improper:

What is condemned is a statement of personal belief or opinion. "It is unprofessional conduct for the prosecutor to express his or her personal belief or opinion as to the truth or falsity of any testimony or evidence or the guilt of the defendant". Standards for Criminal Justice, § 3-5.8(b) (1979). To illustrate, it is error for a prosecutor repeatedly to use the term "I think" in his argument, United States v. Horn, 9 M.J. 429 (C.M.A. 1980), and to say that he has no doubt as to the guilt of the defendant. United States v. Knickerbocker, 2 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1977). But we have none of that here, for not once did the prosecutor couple use of the word "I" with an expression of personal belief or opinion.

Id. at 864.

Another example of the improper expression of personal opinion occurred in United States v. Barnack, 10 M.J. 799 (A.F.C.M.R. 1981), where an Air Force appellate court found that a trial counsel's comments during sentencing argument "exceeded acceptable bounds of fair advocacy and affronted the spirit, if not the letter, of the ABA Standards, The Prosecution Function § 5.8(b)(c), 5.9 and 6.1(a)." Id. at 799-800. The trial counsel's offensive comments included: "The accused . . . has the most deplorably, despicable, military record that has ever been seen, at least by this trial counsel in a military court. . . . Any period of confinement less than four years would be an absolute mockery and a joke. . . ." Id. at 800 (emphasis added).

The court was particularly displeased with trial counsel's conduct when defense counsel was responding to the trial counsel's suggestion that the court "should lock [the accused] up and throw away the key":

IDC: . . . It's not going to make [the accused's] parents happy, it's certainly not going to make him happy. It's not going to make the people in this courtroom watching happy. . . .

TC (interrupting): Actually, it will make me happy, your honor.

Id. at 800.

The trial counsel can argue matters of common sense. In United States v. Thomas, 43 M.J. 550 (N.M.Ct.Crim.App. 1995), the trial counsel in a murder case argued that it was implausible the victim committed suicide by driving off a cliff at a slow rate of speed. The court found that this was merely the trial counsel arguing common sense and was not an inappropriate expression of personal opinion.

6. Commenting upon the silence of the accused. (Key number 1259). Argument upon the silence of the accused tending to raise an inference of guilt is a crucial concern to judges and appellate courts, and counsel tending to so argue will be given little, if any, latitude. Rigorous application of the rule against such argument is necessary because comments upon the silence of the accused infringe upon the accused's right to remain silent under the Constitution and Article 31, Uniform Code of Military Justice. Additionally, such an argument is not based upon evidence before the court and, therefore, is improper as a violation of the general principle relating to arguments.

The general rule in the military concerning argument on the silence of the accused is stated in Mil.R.Evid. 512(a) and R.C.M. 919(b) discussion. The language of the MCM is clear: "trial counsel may not comment on the accused's exercise of the right against self-incrimination." R.C.M. 919(b). The MCM provides an exception to this rule, however, by stating that: "When the accused testifies on the merits regarding an offense charged, trial counsel may comment on the accused's failure in that testimony to deny or explain specific incriminating facts that the evidence for the prosecution tends to establish regarding that offense." See also United States v. Caramans, 9 M.J. 616 (A.C.M.R.), aff'd on other grounds, 10 M.J. 50 (C.M.A. 1980). The military judge is also required to give a protective instruction to the court regarding the accused's failure to testify if requested by the defense. United States v. King, 13 M.J. 863 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982).

These rules are not difficult to apply when there is a direct comment upon the accused's failure to testify. More difficult questions arise when the comment of trial counsel may be interpreted either as an improper comment upon the silence of the accused or as a proper comment upon the evidence before the court. The Court of Military Appeals has announced the following test for determining whether argument is improper comment upon the silence of the accused: "[The test is] whether the language used was manifestly intended or was of such character that the triers of fact could naturally and necessarily take the prosecutor's remarks to be a comment on the failure of the accused to testify." United States v. Gordon, 14 C.M.A. 314, 318, 34 C.M.R. 94, 98 (1963). Thus, the test is: (1) Whether the trial counsel intended the court to take his remarks as comment upon the silence; or (2) whether the court members could have understood the language to be such a comment. Whether either prong of the test has been met must depend upon the type of language used, the manner in which it relates to the testimony or other evidence before the court, and whether there is an objection by defense counsel. The practical application of this test confronted the Army court when it reviewed the propriety of counsel arguing that there had been no evidence presented to impeach, discredit, or rebut the government's witnesses. The court upheld the argument on the ground that it was a fair comment upon the evidence. United States v. Simmons, 44 C.M.R. 804 (A.C.M.R. 1971). It also upheld an argument to the effect that only the victim and the accused knew what happened and the victim could not appear in court to testify; the basis of the court's decision was that the argument was a fair comment on the nonavailability of a murder victim to testify. United States v. Gordon. Trial counsel may comment upon the accused's failure to admit guilt or show remorse if the accused testifies or makes an unsworn statement. United States v. Toro, 37 M.J. 313 (C.M.A. 1993). cert. denied, 510 U.S. 1091 (1994). In determining that the language was not intended or could not be taken as comment upon the accused's silence, the court gave considerable weight to defense counsel's interpretation of the language and its relation to the evidence as shown by defense counsel's failure to object.

The line between proper and improper comment is, however, a fine one. In United States v. Oatney, 41 M.J. 619 (N.M.Ct.Crim.App. 1994), the accused was charged with communicating a threat. The trial counsel argued that only the accused and the prosecution witness heard the threat and that despite the accused pleading not guilty, the Government had proven its case. The court disapproved of this argument, but did not find plain error (defense counsel did not object at trial). In United States v. Goodyear, 14 M.J. 567 (N.M.C.M.R. 1982), the defense had presented no evidence on the merits. Trial counsel argued, "There's absolutely no motive which has been proffered by the defense to show that [the victim] may have told a falsehood to this court." The court ruled that the military judge had properly granted a mistrial, holding that the comments had placed an improper inference and burden upon the accused to present evidence in response to the government's case. It should be noted that the trial counsel's conduct of that case was improper in a number of other areas as well. Trial counsel is best advised to steer clear of commenting upon the failure of the accused to testify. In United States v. Harris, 14 M.J. 728 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982), the accused did not testify after his defense counsel stated in opening argument that he would. In closing argument, the trial counsel reminded the members that the accused promised to testify and that he did not. The trial counsel also went on to state that the only evidence available was from the government. The court held that the trial counsel had committed prejudicial error and reversed the case. After the accused failed to testify in United States v. Dennis, 39 M.J. 623 (N.M.C.M.R. 1993), aff'd, 40 M.J. 305 (1994). The trial counsel argued that no evidence was presented to refute the government's witnesses. While similar to the Harris case, the courts held the error to be harmless after the defense counsel objected and the military judge gave a curative instruction.

Apparently, the same general rule applies to comments by the trial counsel upon the accused's pretrial silence. It has long been the rule that trial counsel can not bring to the attention of the members that the accused has exercised his right to remain silent prior to trial, and the Court of Military Appeals has taken a strong stand in the protection of the accused's ability to assert his rights. In United States v. Clifton, 15 M.J. 26, 30 (C.M.A. 1983), the court said "... [i]t was unconscionable for trial counsel repeatedly to emphasize appellant's assertion of his rights. A servicemember may 'assert his rights' without fear of exploitation. . . . He is not obligated to 'admit to anything,' upon being accused of wrongdoing." See also United States v. Frentz, 21 M.J. 813 (N.M.C.M.R. 1985); United States v. Stegar, 16 C.M.A. 569, 37 C.M.R. 189 (1967); United States v. Tackett, 16 C.M.A. 226, 36 C.M.R. 382 (1966); United States v. Brooks, 12 C.M.A. 423, 31 C.M.R. 9 (1961). The Court of Military Appeals, however, has allowed trial counsel to show, during cross-examination of the accused, the fact that the accused was present at the article 32 investigation and thus knew well in advance of trial what the prosecution's evidence would be, while the prosecution had enjoyed no similar opportunity to learn from the accused his version of the events. United States v. Fitzpatrick, 14 M.J. 394 (C.M.A. 1983); United States v. Reiner, 15 M.J. 38 (C.M.A. 1983).

B. Errors relating primarily to sentencing arguments (Key Numbers 1254 - 1257 and 1316 - 1320). As will be seen, R.C.M. 1001(g) resolves two troublesome areas with regard to argument on sentencing. It is quoted here preceding discussion of several of its sections.

Argument. After introduction of matters relating to sentence under this rule, counsel for the prosecution and defense may argue for an appropriate sentence. Trial counsel may not in argument purport to speak for the convening authority or any higher authority, or refer to the views of such authorities or any policy directive relative to punishment or to any punishment or quantum of punishment greater than that court-martial may adjudge. Trial counsel may, however, recommend a specific lawful sentence and may also refer to generally accepted sentencing philosophies, including rehabilitation of the accused, general deterrence, specific deterrence of misconduct by the accused, and social retribution. . . .

R.C.M. 1001(g) (emphasis added).

1. General deterrence. Although both case law and R.C.M. 1001(g) allow general deterrence to be argued, it should be noted that current case law requires that this one factor not be argued to the exclusion of all other sentencing factors. See United States v. Smith, 9 M.J. 187 (C.M.A. 1980); United States v. Thompson, 9 M.J. 166 (C.M.A. 1980); United States v. Geidl, 10 M.J. 168 (C.M.A. 1980).

R.C.M. 1001(g) purports to make clear that any generally accepted sentencing philosophy, including general deterrence, may be referred to during argument on sentence. It makes no mention of the caveat found in the appellate cases that the trial counsel's arguments must also "invite consideration of other sentencing factors." It is not clear if the R.C.M. is an attempt to overrule this line of cases sub silentio, or merely an attempt to incorporate the holding of United States v. Lania, 9 M.J. 100 (C.M.A. 1980), into the MCM. Until this question is resolved, the conservative (and prudent) trial counsel will not stress general deterrence as the sole consideration on sentencing.

2. Arguing for specific sentence. R.C.M. 1001(g) also makes clear that argument may include recommendations for a specific lawful sentence. Counsel may have been considered beyond the scope of proper argument. United States v. Razor, 41 C.M.R. 708. Specific sentences now may be urged by either trial or defense counsel. See United States v. Rich, 12 M.J. 661 (A.C.M.R. 1981). Trial counsel may not refer to a quantum of punishment greater than that court-martial may adjudge, United States v. Boese, 32 C.M.R. 131 (C.M.A. 1962), or suggest that the convening authority already gave the accused a break by referring to SPCM. United States v. Luby, 14 M.J. 619 (A.F.C.M.R. 1982), petition denied, 15 M.J. 172 (C.M.A. 1983). Defense counsel may not argue that an administrative discharge is more appropriate than a punitive discharge or that the accused will be discharged even if the court does not impose one. United States v. Keith, 22 M.J. 46 C.M.R. 59 (C.M.A. 1972).

3. Convening authority and command influence. The trial counsel still may not "purport to speak for the convening authority . . . or refer to the views of such convening authorities," R.C.M. 1001(g), since references to the convening authority's desires improperly impinge upon the court members' discretion. See United States v. Lackey, 8 C.M.A. 718, 25 C.M.R. 222 (1958); United States v. Kiddo, 16 M.J. 775, 776 (A.F.C.M.R. 1983). ("The commanders in this case have decided, by their recommendations, that the punishment is fitting, suitable. This is a suitable punishment, the maximum punishment is suitable.") Trial counsel should avoid naming the convening authority by name and telling the members to "do the right thing," United States v. Sparrow, 33 M.J. 139 (C.M.A. 1991). Nor may the trial counsel argue that a severe sentence is warranted because the convening authority ordered a general court-martial, see United States v. Daley, 35 C.M.R. 718 (A.B.R. 1964), or effectively reduced the punishment by convening a special rather than a general court-martial. See United States v. Crutcher, 11 C.M.A. 483, 29 C.M.R. 299 (1960); United States v. Carpenter, 11 C.M.A. 418, 29 C.M.R. 234 (1960). In United States v. Reese, 22 C.M.R. 612 (A.B.R. 1956), the court held that the trial counsel erroneously argued that, because the members represented the convening authority, they should punish the accused in order to set an example for prospective offenders.

Appellate courts view external command influence in the same light as references to the convening authority. Trial counsel may not incorporate such considerations in their argument because they exceed the proper scope of the court members' deliberations.

One of the most prevalent areas where error occurs is when trial counsel refers to the various service policies against drug abuse in the military. Trial counsel may not refer to the views of either the convening authority, or the convening authority's superiors, or policy directives. See, e.g., United States v. Grady, 15 M.J. 275, 276 (C.M.A. 1983) ("You know what SAC policies are, and I think you are somewhat bound to adhere to these policies in deciding on a sentence"); United States v. Brown, 19 M.J. 826 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984) (trial counsel's impermissible reference in sentencing argument to policy of the Commandant of Marine Corps on drugs—note, however, that the error was cured by military judge's instruction). Some other problem areas where the courts have found error have included references to command policies or directives concerning certain offenses; comments that a record of the adjudged sentence would be posted on the command bulletin board; and arguments incorporating a command policy in regard to troublemakers in certain ranks. See also United States v. Kropf, 39 M.J. 107 (C.M.A. 1994) which may require defense counsel to object to such statements or waive the issue.

4. Reference to other misconduct. Evidence of uncharged misconduct may not be considered for sentencing purposes unless it is properly introduced before findings or admitted during the presentencing proceedings. See United States v. Wingart, 27 M.J. 128 (C.M.A. 1988) and United States v. Pingree, 39 M.J. 884 (A.C.M.R. 1994). As a result, trial counsel may not associate the accused with other offenses if there is no relevant evidence to that effect. In United States v. Edwards, 39 C.M.R. 952 (A.B.R. 1968), the court held that the trial counsel erred by referring to an offense to which a finding of not guilty had been entered. In United States v. Baker, 34 C.M.R. 833 (A.F.B.R. 1964), the court condemned an argument based on a prior offense involving moral turpitude. But see, United States v. Putra, 117 S.Ct. 633 (1997)(judge permitted to consider charge accused acquitted of in determining sentence).

Trial counsel may not argue a greater offense theory when the accused was only convicted of a lesser included offense, United States v. Martinez, 30 M.J. 1194 (A.F.C.M.R. 1990), rev. denied, 38 M.J. 228 (C.M.A. 1993). or a theory of the crime contrary to the accused's unsworn statement unless there is some evidence admitted to support trial counsel's theory. United States v. Rutherford, 29 M.J. 1030 (A.C.M.R. 1990).

5. Placing members in position of victim or relative. An accused is entitled to have the sentence determined by court members who are impartial to the outcome of the case. When the triers of fact are asked to place themselves in the position of the victim, their impartiality is undermined. Consequently, arguments which advocate such comparisons are improper, as are suggestions that members consider what it would be like if a close relative had been victimized by the accused. See United States v. Shamberger, 1 M.J. 377 (C.M.A. 1976) (Improper for trial counsel to argue that court members should put themselves in the position of the rape victim's husband). Cf. United States v. Williams, 23 M.J. 776 (A.C.M.R. 1987) (It is not plain error for trial counsel, in a rape and forcible sodomy GCM, to ask members how long before the accused should again walk among "your daughters"—"our daughters". Any remaining error was waived by defense counsel's failure to object at trial.) and United States v. Wood, 18 C.M.A. 291, 40 C.M.R. 3 (1969) (Improper for trial counsel to argue that court members should imagine their sons as the victims of accused's, a Boy Scoutmaster, indecent liberties).

Trial counsel may comment on matters of public knowledge. The court in United States v. Meeks, 41 M.J. 150 (C.M.A. 1994) held that when trial counsel asked members to "think about [accused's] co-workers who did deploy last October" (referring to the accused's charge of UA during Operation Desert Storm) it was not an improper argument or request to place the members in the shoes of those who deployed.

6. Inflammatory and prejudicial arguments. The United States Supreme Court has criticized prosecutorial arguments which are "undignified and intemperate [and] contain improper insinuations and assertions calculated to mislead the jury." Berger v. United States, 295 U.S. 78, 85 (1935). The military appellate courts have similarly held that the trial counsel may not use "vituperative and denunciatory language, or appeal to, or make reference to religious beliefs, or other matters, where such language and appeal is calculated only to unduly excite or arouse the emotions, passions, and prejudice of the court to the detriment of the accused." United States v. Weller, 18 C.M.R. 473, 478 (A.F.B.R. 1954). In United States v. Nellum, 21 M.J. 700, 701 (A.C.M.R. 1985), the court indicated that trial counsel had "exceeded the bounds of propriety when he asked the military judge whether he would like appellant to walk the streets in his community or neighborhood." This was a trial by military judge alone, yet the court still found error because the court felt that such argument asked the military judge to use his personal interest in adjudging a sentence instead of his impartial interest as a military judge. In similar reasoning, the court found error in a urinalysis case when the trial counsel argued that if members accepted the accused's innocent ingestion defense, they would "hear it a million times again" in their units. The court held that such an argument improperly inflamed the members with fear that the urinalysis program would break down. United States v. Causey, 37 M.J. 308 (C.M.A. 1993).

An inconclusive line of cases, however, suggests that such inflammatory and prejudicial arguments are not per se improper. See United States v. Arnold, 6 M.J. 520 (A.C.M.R. 1978) (trial counsel called the accused a liar); United States v. Fields, 40 C.M.R. 396 (A.B.R. 1968); United States v. Vilches, 17 M.J. 851, 855 (N.M.C.M.R. 1984) (although "inartful" and "pedestrian," it was fair comment and not error for trial counsel on the merits to characterize the accused, a lieutenant commander charged with sodomizing a junior enlisted man, as a "closet homosexual," "pervert," and "chickenhawk"). These cases indicate that an apparently inflammatory argument may be proper if it amounts to fair comment on evidence in the record.

Many of the previously discussed improprieties, such as attempts to place court members in the place of the victim, are also inflammatory. The most common type of inflammatory argument is a denunciatory reference to the accused. In United States v. Nelson, 1 M.J. 235 (C.M.A. 1975), the trial counsel compared the accused to Adolph Hitler, an analogy which the Court of Military Appeals easily identified as inflammatory. Other comments which courts have held to be inflammatory include references to the socialist and Marxist background of the accused and his family, see United States v. Garza, 20 C.M.A. 536, 43 C.M.R. 376 (1971), and characterizations of the accused as a moral leper who needs to be put where moral lepers belong, see United States v. Douglas, 13 C.M.R. 529 (N.B.R. 1953).

Occasionally, an argument will be held inflammatory because of references to other parties to the trial. In United States v. Begley, 38 C.M.R. 488 (A.B.R. 1966), for example, the trial counsel appealed to the court members' emotions. The accused was a noncommissioned officer. The trial counsel addressed the noncommissioned officer members by name, and invited them to consider how the accused had disgraced the noncommissioned officer corps. Another example of the inflammatory argument arose when the trial counsel insinuated that the defense counsel had made an unsworn statement on behalf of the accused with the hope of financial gain from the accused's $800,000 inheritance. United States v. Vogt, 30 C.M.R. 746 (C.G.B.R. 1960). Although there was evidence of an inheritance, the statements exceeded the bounds of fair comment. When the trial counsel exposes the members to embarrassment or contempt if they do not return a stiff sentence, their potential emotional reaction renders the argument inflammatory. For example, the trial counsel may not assert that the members are "selfish, self-centered and are not fulfilling [their] responsibility to . . . society" if the adjudged sentence does not include a discharge and confinement. United States v. Wood, 18 C.M.A. 291, 296, 40 C.M.R. 3, 8 (1969).

Prejudicial arguments, like inflammatory ones, usually are also improper on other grounds. In United States v. Johnson, 1 M.J. 213, 215 (C.M.A. 1975), the trial counsel argued that whereas two accomplices, by their pleas of guilty, had taken the first step toward rehabilitation, the accused, by pleading not guilty, had not taken this first step. The court found this argument to be improper comment on the accused's right to plead not guilty. See also United States v. Weinmann, 37 M.J. 724 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993), rev. denied, 40 M.J. 41 (C.M.A. 1994). In United States v. Ryan, 21 C.M.A. 9, 44 C.M.R. 63 (1971), the trial counsel asserted that higher ranking witnesses were more credible than their subordinates. Although this is obviously improper and incorrect, the prejudicial impact stemmed from the fact that most of the higher ranking witnesses had testified for the prosecution. See also United States v. Ruggiero, 1 M.J. 1089 (N.C.M.R. 1977), petition denied, 3 M.J. 117 (C.M.A. 1977). Trial counsel may not attempt to unfairly influence the members by presenting irrelevant and unnecessary arguments. In United States v. Simpson, 10 C.M.A. 229, 27 C.M.R. 303 (1959), the trial counsel urged the members to adjudge a dishonorable discharge by noting that a bad-conduct discharge could eventually be removed from the accused's record administratively. In another case, the trial counsel erred by introducing evidence of credit card theft in order to establish identity in a court-martial for larceny of a wallet because the former was a much more serious offense than that charged, and there was no issue of identity. United States v. Brown, 8 M.J. 749 (A.F.C.M.R. 1980). Cf. Mil.R.Evid. 403 (relevant evidence may be excluded if danger of unfair prejudice exceeds probative value). The trial counsel erred by commenting that the making and uttering of checks was tantamount to stealing since that argument injected an irrelevant specific intent into the court members' consideration and ignored the fact that stealing is a much more serious offense. United States v. Bethea, 3 M.J. 526 (A.F.C.M.R. 1977). See, e.g., United States v. Clifton, 15 M.J. 26 (C.M.A. 1983) (trial counsel's comparison of the charged offense of adultery with the more serious offense of heroin possession was prejudicial).

In United States v. Pinkney, 22 C.M.A. 595, 48 C.M.R. 219 (1974), the Court of Military Appeals held that undue prejudice resulted from the trial counsel's reference to the accused's request for an administrative discharge. Since such a request is not incriminatory or an admission of guilt, it should not have been used against the accused. Similarly, since an accused has a right to plead not guilty to a given offense, any comment to the effect that his not guilty plea should be held against him improperly impeded his exercise of that right. See United States v. Johnson, 1 M.J. 213 (C.M.A. 1975). Finally, arguments based on evidence in the record can still be considered prejudicial if the trial counsel oversteps the bounds of fair comment.

Thus, military appellate courts have found comments on the accused's stupidity, see United States v. Ortiz, 33 C.M.R. 536 (A.B.R. 1963), or cowardice, see United States v. Brewer, 39 C.M.R. 388 (A.B.R. 1968), and arguments which focus on a lack of promotions during a 17-year career, see United States v. Larochelle, 41 C.M.R. 915 (A.F.B.R. 1969) to be improper. Obviously, counsel should not make racist statements in argument. Even absent objection by the defense, most courts will overturn cases where racist statements are made in argument. In United States v. Thompson, 37 M.J. 1023 (A.C.M.R. 1993), rev.

denied, 42 M.J. 100 (1995) the trial counsel improperly argued that the accused was predisposed to distribute cocaine because black males equate gold chains and nice cars with the good life. See also United States v. Garland, 39 M.J. 618 (A.C.M.R. 1994).

7. Comments on accused's statements during providency. In United States v. Holt, 27 M.J. 57 (C.M.A. 1988), the trial counsel commented on an inconsistency between the accused's statement during the providency inquiry and testimony of a defense witness on sentencing. The Court of Military Appeals held that trial counsel's argument did not deny the accused's right against self-incrimination under either Article 31, UCMJ, or the fifth amendment. An accused who pleads guilty is on notice that answers during the providency inquiry may be considered for sentencing purposes. The court specifically indicated that the same rule applies regardless of forum since the trial counsel may admit the providency inquiry in aggravation by means of an authenticated transcript or the live testimony of any witness who was present in the courtroom during the providency inquiry. In United States v. Irwin, 42 M.J. 479 (1995), the court allowed the playing of the audio tape of the providency inquiry for the members on sentencing. Counsel should be alert that their may be difficulties in this mode of presentation as there may often be items on the tape which should have been appropriately redacted. It must be noted, however, that the rule only applies to statements of the accused regarding offenses to which the accused is pleading guilty.

8. Miscellaneous considerations

a. Defense counsel may argue for a sentence that is inconsistent with the terms of a pretrial agreement. See, e.g., United States v. Wood, 23 C.M.A. 57, 48 C.M.R. 528 (1974) (a pretrial agreement is with the convening authority and cannot impact the imposition of sentence by members); United States v. Sanders, 23 C.M.A. 75, 48 C.M.R. 546 (1974). Trial counsel may also argue for such a sentence. See, e.g., United States v. Rich, 12 M.J. 661 (A.C.M.R. 1981) (the trial counsel's argument for a sentence which exceeded the terms of the pretrial agreement was not error).

b. Under certain conditions, a defense counsel may argue for a BCD for his/her client. Counsel must carefully analyze the facts before urging the court to give an accused a punitive discharge. An accused has a right to ask the sentencing authority for a particular punishment to the exclusion of other kinds of permissible penalties. Counsel may not, however, ask a court-martial to impose a punitive discharge when the accused's wishes are to the contrary. United States v. Dresen, 40 M.J. 462 (C.M.A. 1994); United States v. Robinson, 25 M.J. 43 (C.M.A. 1987); United States v. Webb, 5 M.J. 406 (C.M.A. 1978). If defense does concede the appropriateness of a punitive discharge in argument, they should make a record that such advocacy is pursuant to the accused's wishes (accused mentions such desire in sworn/unsworn statement). Dresen, 40 M.J. at 465; United States v. Lyons, 36 M.J. 425 (C.M.A. 1993).

c. Defense counsel's failure to object to error before the military judge begins sentencing instruction constitutes a waiver unless it is plain error. Plain error must be obvious and substantial, and it must have had an unfair prejudicial impact. United States v. Fischer, 21 M.J. 327 (C.M.A. 1986).

d. Trial counsel may comment upon the accused's unsworn statement, if made, and contrast that method of placing information before the members with sworn testimony as long as the military judge's instructions concerning unsworn statements are clearly given. United States v. Breese, 11 M.J. 17 (C.M.A. 1981); United States v. Dunavent, 11 M.J. 69 (C.M.A. 1981).

1506 CONCLUSION. In preparation for argument, counsel should review the types of comments courts have found improper in the past. Counsel must avoid making the spontaneous "vigorous" argument which "sounds good at the time," as it is just such comments that make for entertaining reading for others in the appellate case law.

CHAPTER XVI

DRUG ABUSE DETECTION

"Insofar as the 'knowledge' needed to show 'wrongfulness' is concerned, the presence of the controlled substance . . . authorizes a permissive inference of knowledge [by the accused of wrongful use of a controlled substance]."

United States v. Mance, 26 M.J. 244, 254 (C.M.A. 1988).

1601 INTRODUCTION. Drug abuse detection is an extension of the military law on search and seizure. However, due to the expansive parameters and leeway given to military commanders to conduct the urinalysis program, the military urinalysis program is strictly limited by DOD and service instructions and regulations. One must be careful not to confuse the administrative policy guidelines (e.g., "zero tolerance") with the military justice system. In any event, there is no substitute for reading the instructions, particularly enclosure (4) to the Navy's OPNAVINST 5350.4B. This chapter is designed to familiarize one with the Navy's urinalysis collection program, specifically the different types of urinalysis samples, and discusses the instructions and selected caselaw in this area, which continues to be a military justice growth industry.

LAWFULLY OBTAINED URINE SAMPLES

The four primary circumstances whereby the military may compel urinalysis testing, inspection, send and sign, Command-directed, and valid medical purpose, are embodied in DOD Directive 1010.1:

In order to carry out the DoD policy of 'preserv[ing] the health of servicemembers by 'identifying' and treating drug abusers and of permitting commanders to assess and preserve 'security, military fitness, and good order and discipline,' . . . the [DoD] Directive permits '[m]andatory urinalysis testing for drugs.' Such testing may be conducted under four circumstances: (1) During inspections performed under Military Rule of Evidence 313'; (2) During a search or seizure action under Military Rules of Evidence 311-317'; (3) As part of one of three other types of examinations: '(a) A command-directed examination . . . of a specific servicemember to determine' his 'competenc[e] for duty and the need for . . . medical treatment when there is reasonable suspicion of drug abuse'; (b) one 'in conjunction with a servicemember's participation in a DoD treatment and rehabilitation program'; (c) one in connection with a 'mishap or safety investigation undertaken for the purpose of accident analysis'; and (4) '[a]ny other examination ordered by medical personnel for a valid medical purpose under Military Rule of Evidence 312(f).' . . . Results of urinalysis under the third set of circumstances may not be used in courts-martial except for purposes of impeachment or rebuttal.

United States v. Daskam, 31 M.J. 77, 79-80 (C.M.A. 1990). This chapter will analyze each one of these four separate legal bases for collection.

A. Search and Seizure

The [Fourth Amendment] right [against unreasonable searches] includes protection of the 'dignitary interests in personal privacy and bodily integrity.'

United States v. Fitten, 42 M.J. 179, 180 (C.A.A.F. 1995) (quoting Winston v. Lee, 470 U.S. 753, 761 (1985)).

Extraction of body fluids. Nonconsensual extraction of body fluids, including blood and urine, may be made from the body of an individual pursuant to a search warrant or a search authorization under Mil.R.Evid. 315 [probable cause searches].

Mil.R.Evid. 312(f).

(a)(2) Probable cause tests (PC). If a member declines to provide a urine sample, and there is probable cause to believe that the member has committed a drug offense and that a urinalysis test will produce evidence of that offense, the member's commanding officer, or other officer with that authority, should order a probable cause test. Urinalysis tests may be ordered per M.R.E. 312 (d) and 315 whenever there is probable cause to believe that a member has committed a drug offense and that a urinalysis test will produce evidence of such offense. Consultation with a judge advocate on the issue of probable cause is strongly encouraged. If probable cause does not exist, a command-directed test may be ordered as set forth in paragraph 5c(1).

OPNAVINST 5350.4B, Encl. (4), p. 3 (emphasis added). The OPNAV instruction encourages "consent:"

(a)(1) Tests conducted with member's consent (CT). Members suspected of having unlawfully used drugs may be requested to consent to urinalysis testing. [But] [p]rior to requesting consent, the command representative should advise the member that he or she may decline to provide the sample. Where practicable, consent should be obtained in writing.

OPNAVINST 5350.4B, Encl. (4), p. 3.

The law is clear that "a person engaging in the act of urination has a reasonable expectation of privacy for that act and the urine excreted. . . because of this reasonable expectation of privacy, requiring a person to provide a urine sample involves a search or seizure under the Fourth Amendment." United States v. Pond, 36 M.J. 1050, 1054 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993). Consequently, the probable cause analysis and search authorization requirements discussed on Search & Seizure are applicable.

To date no cases have successfully challenged the constitutionality of the military's urinalysis program. However, the Supreme Court upheld an Oregon high school's urinalysis program in Veronia School District v. Acton, U.S. 115 S. Ct. 2386 (1995) (citations omitted) (Supreme Court upheld Oregon high schools Student Athlete Drug Policy, which authorized random urinalysis drug testing of student athletes). Several of the Oregon high school athletes challenged the drug urinalysis program. The high school had experienced an increase in drug use and athletes were leaders in the student drug culture. The high school cited as a basis for its program a concern that drug use increased the risk of sports-related injury. The Supreme Court, Justice Scalia writing for the Court, held the state-compelled collection and testing of urine constituted a "search," but held it to be reasonable and not in violation of the 4th amendment. The Court recognized that the urinalysis testing was 99.94% accurate. The Court stated:

We recognized in Skinner [drug testing of railroad personnel relating to train accidents] that collecting the samples for urinalysis intrudes upon an excretory function traditionally shielded by great privacy. We noted, however, that the degree of intrusion depends upon the manner in which production of the urine sample is monitored. [The] conditions [of observation] are nearly identical to those typically encountered in public restrooms negligible.

See also, Skinner v. Railway Labor Executives, 489 U.S. 656 (1989) (urine tests of train operators involved in accidents are reasonable searches); National Treasury Employees Union v. Von Rabb, 489 U.S. 656 (1989) (urine testing of employees who apply to carry firearms or are involved in drug interdiction does not require a warrant).

For the military, one must read United States v. Daskam, 31 M.J. 77 (C.M.A. 1990), a case involving an inappropriate application of a command urinalysis "inspection" program based upon repeat short unauthorized absences by a Navy chief petty officer. Daskam, discussed in detail later on in this chapter, is THE case to read to understand the pertinent DOD Directive, SECNAVINST, and OPNAVINST, and moreover, the concept of valid urinalysis "inspections." See also Masterson, Recent Developments In Urinalysis Law, Army Lawyer (March 1996), p. 58.

As to consent, the general search and seizure analysis as to the need for voluntariness (vice acquiescence to authority) and the burden of proof (clear and convincing) under Military Rules of Evidence, Rule 315(e), are equally applicable in the urinalysis situation. For recent caselaw on the issue of consent to urinalysis, see United States v. Radvansky, 45 M.J. 226 (C.A.A.F. 1996), where an accused inquired into what his command would do if he did not consent to the urinalysis. The Court analyzed the issue of apparent acquiescence to authority due to the first sergeant's response that "we might have to go in and approach the commander." Court held valid, voluntary consent, based upon a factor analysis (accused's age, education, experience, length of service, rank, right to refuse, and surrounding environment – custodial or coercive?). Interestingly, Judge Sullivan dissented, asserting that the atmosphere in the military especially with the presence of the first sergeant is "inherently coercive." See also United States v. Baker, __ M.J. __, No. ACM 31880 (A.F.Ct.Crim.App., Dec. 13, 1996), wherein the Court held valid consent, based on totality of the circumstances, even though the accused stated "I guess I don't have a choice whether or not to sign the [urinalysis consent form]?"

M.R.E. Rule 312 (d), provides for exigency searches, but because the metabolites stay in the body for a sufficient amount of time, it would be difficult to rely upon an exigency basis. Cf. United States v. Pond, 36 M.J. 1050 (A.F.C.M.R. 1993). In Pond, a San Bernardino Deputy Sheriff pulled over Staff Sergeant Pond. Pond was driving a motorcycle after ingesting some methamphetamines at a bar (he put the rest in his pocket). Pond appeared agitated, had dilated pupils, smelt of alcohol, and had no driver's license or proof of insurance. He passed all three sobriety tests but did them in an unusually rapid manner. He was arrested and taken to a sheriff's station where a urine sample was taken in compliance with the California implied consent law. A breath test was available but the police officer knew urine was needed to detect methamphetamines. He did not tell Pond the implied consent law required him to give the urine. The trial court denied a motion to suppress. The Air Force Court of Military Review reversed and ordered suppression, noting it was a "case of first impression." The Court held no valid "consent", no exigency exception, and no good faith exception applicable under the facts. Id. at 1056-1059. Indeed, the Court distinguished the exigency of alcohol vice drugs: "Unlike the evanescent nature of blood alcohol levels, the presence of methamphetamine in urine can be detected for an extended period." Id. at 1058-1059. Consequently, alcohol and drugs must be analyzed differently, and the Courts are less likely to find application of the exigency exception to a "search" of bodily fluids for drug metabolites. As a general rule, a search authorization from the appropriate commanding officer will be required.

B. Inspection (Mil.R.Evid. 313)

"We reaffirm that it is constitutionally permissible to require servicemembers to submit to urine samples as part of an inspection."

United States v. Gardner, 41 M.J. 189, 190 (C.M.A. 1994).

(a) General rule. Evidence obtained from inspections and inventories in the armed forces conducted in accordance with this rule is admissible at trial when relevant and not otherwise admissible under these rules.

Inspections. An "inspection" is an examination of the whole or part of a unit, organization, installation, vessel, aircraft, or vehicle . . . the primary purpose of which is to determine and ensure the security, military fitness, or good order and discipline of the unit, organization, installation, vessel, aircraft, or vehicle. . . . An inspection also includes an examination to locate and confiscate unlawful weapons and other contraband. An order to produce body fluids, such as urine, is permissible in accordance with this rule. . . . An examination made for the primary purpose of obtaining evidence for use in a trial by court-martial or in other disciplinary proceedings is not an inspection within the meaning of this rule.

Mil.R.Evid. 313. (emphasis added).

a. Inspections under Military Rule of Evidence 313. Urinalysis inspections are designed to ensure the military fitness and the good order and discipline of a unit. Such inspections, conducted as an incident of command, help ensure that assigned personnel are fit and ready for duty and that personnel identified as drug abusers obtain counseling or rehabilitation. Commands shall not order urinalysis inspections for the primary purpose of obtaining evidence for trial by courts-martial or for other disciplinary purposes.

Results of urinalysis inspections may be used for any purpose, including disciplinary action and characterization of service in separation proceedings.

OPNAVINST 5350.4B, Encl. (4), p. 3 (emphasis added).

As in all inspections, the motivation of the commander who ordered the "inspection" will many times be the dispositive issue. Much litigation is centered upon this crucial issue: What was the primary purpose of the inspection? If the commander's motivation does not come within the parameters set forth in M.R.E. 313 (or the OPNAV) cited above, then we have a problem. The OPNAV cites the commander's authority to conduct inspections and the two primary types of urinalysis inspections:

(b)(1) Inspections authorized by Commanders, Commanding Officers, and Officers in Charge. Commands may order urinalysis inspections just as they may order any other inspection to determine and ensure the security, military fitness, and good order and discipline of the command. Commands may use any method of selecting servicemembers or groups of members for urinalysis inspection, including, but not limited to:

(a) Random sample (RS) of individual servicemembers either from the entire unit or from any identifiable segment or class of that unit. An identifiable segment includes department, division, workcenter, watch section, barracks, all non-rated, all officers, or all personnel who have reported for duty in the past month.

(b) Unit sweeps (US): urinalysis testing of an entire unit or the selection, random or otherwise, of an entire sub-unit or identifiable segment of a command. Examples of a sub-unit would include: an entire department, division, or watch section; all personnel within specific paygrades; all newly reporting personnel as they report aboard; or all personnel who surrender or are apprehended after an unauthorized absence. A unit or sub-unit urinalysis inspection should not be conducted as a subterfuge to search a specific servicemember.

OPNAVINST 5350.4B, Encl. (4), p. 3-4

Random Samples and Unit Sweeps are certainly the most common means of obtaining samples. As stated above, a "unit sweep" can be a whole unit or a sub unit. For an excellent analysis of the Navy's inspection urinalysis program, read United States v. Daskam, 31 M.J. 77 (C.M.A. 1990). In Daskam, a Navy Chief Petty Officer with 15 years service, the last 3 as an instructor at Fleet Training Center (FTC) San Diego, was convicted of wrongful use of controlled substances. The Court of Military Appeals held that the three urinalyses involved were not legitimate inspections. On 09 February 1988, the Chief was 50 minutes late; on 26 February 1988, he was 2 hours late; and on 14 March 1988 he was 95 minutes late. Each time he reported to FTC late, he was ordered to submit a urine sample. The first sample was taken pursuant to a standing verbal order of the FTC Commander, given in December 1987, which required ALL returning unauthorized absentees, without any time minimum as to the length of the UA, to submit a urine sample. The 2 later samples were obtained per a written FTC Instruction of February 1988, signed by the same commander, and based upon the same "returned UA" rationale. The Chief did not consent to any of the urinalyses, and it was conceded no probable cause existed. Testimony and evidence on a motion to suppress showed it was "hit or miss" at the command in reference to application of the policy, as not all returning UAs submitted samples. Daskam, 31 M.J. at 78. The Court of Military Appeals overturned the military judge's denial of the motion to suppress, recognizing that:

[M]andatory urinalysis of unauthorized absentees could be upheld only if it were done uniformly. The established policy purported to be all surrendering and apprehended absentees were to be tested; but [the Commander's] guideline was not followed. As appellant contends, this Court has insisted that compulsory urinalysis be conducted pursuant to preestablished guidelines rather than at the discretion of the commander.

Daskam, 31 M.J. at 82. Although the Court disposed of the case on an interesting ruling that the DoD policy and OPNAV instruction were never intended to apply to short 1-2 hour "unauthorized absentees" as the accused "has not truly been beyond military control in any meaningful sense; and has not truly surrendered or been apprehended." (Id.), the real point is the Court's chastisement of the command for a failure to properly and consistently apply the command's urinalysis "inspection" program.

As discussed earlier, many of the principles related to general search & seizure law are applicable in the urinalysis realm. For a urinalysis-specific recent case on the issue of which commander may order a "unit sweep," see United States v. Moore, ___ M. J. ___, No. 32066, 1997 WL 66003 (A.F.C.C.A., Feb. 1997), where the Court analyzed a situation of "concurrent command" of an accused who was attached to the 390th Fighter Squadron, but performed all her duties and reported to the base hospital (366th Medical Group). The accused tested positive for methamphetamines. The Court held the Medical Group Commander did not have actual authority to order a "unit sweep" to include the accused; but because the Medical Group Commander occupied "an appropriate supervisory position as envisioned by the drafters of the rules of evidence" and consequently it was within his authority to order the sweep to include the accused.

C. The problem of the "Subterfuge Search."

If a purpose of an examination is to locate weapons or contraband [e.g., drugs in urine], and if: (1) the examination was directed immediately following a report of a specific offense in the unit, organization, installation, vessel, aircraft, or vehicle and was not previously scheduled; (2) specific individuals are selected for examination; or persons examined are subjected to substantially different intrusions during the same examination, the prosecution must prove by clear and convincing evidence that the examination was an inspection within the meaning of this rule.

Mil.R.Evid. 313(b).

The classic "subterfuge search" issue is the subject of most caselaw, as it is a fine line between an inspection to promote the military's urinalysis program, and a search. Many times it simply comes down to the commander's testimony as to what his or her primary motivation was in ordering the "inspection." In United States v. Campbell, 41 M.J. 177 (C.M.A. 1994), an Army company commander's ordering of a urinalysis based upon his first sergeant's "suspect list," was held to be an impermissible basis for selecting those subject to urinalysis. At a general court-martial at Fort Bragg, the accused pled not guilty to cocaine. The primary factor in the urinalysis selection was the First Sergeant of Alpha Company. He heard rumors of drug use, reviewed the members of each platoon, and hand-picked those he suspected of drug use—primarily based upon a notion of guilt by association. He compiled the list of 15 or so members, and forwarded the list to his Company Commander. The first sergeant testified he believed he had established sufficient probable cause to support the drug testing order. He had questioned some soldiers of the platoons at issue, and would even read them their 31b rights. Clearly a one-man investigation! In fact he deleted one sergeant from the list after he questioned that soldier, and was satisfied with his answers. The military judge held no subterfuge search and that the Government had satisfied its clear and convincing evidence standard under M.R.E. 313. Campbell, 41 M.J. at 181. The Army Court of Military Review affirmed the military judge's ruling. The Court of Military Appeals reversed, as the Government could not show that the selected individuals were chosen except on the invalid "basis of suspicion of criminal activity amounting to less than probable cause." Campbell, 41 M.J. at 182. The Court restated the rule that the testing must be performed on a nondiscriminatory basis pursuant to an established policy or guideline that will eliminate the opportunity for arbitrariness by the person performing the tests." Campbell, 41 M.J. at 182 (quoting United States v. Bickel, 30 M.J. 277, 286 (C.M.A. 1990)).

But compare the result in Campbell with that reached in United States v. Taylor, 41 M.J. 168 (C.M.A. 1994), cert. denied, 115 S. Ct. 1108 (1995). Taylor preceded Campbell (and was cited by the dissent in Campbell). Taylor was a Marine staff sergeant who was convicted of marijuana use. C.O.M.A. held no subterfuge search even though the command SACO and the S-1 section commander of the accused had received information linking the accused to drug use; BUT did not forward this information to the Company Commander who ordered a random urinalysis of the unit right after receipt of the unsubstantiated drug rumors. The Court fashioned the issue and its focus as follows:

The threshold question in this case is whether Capt. Lindsay's [the company commander] decision to order a urinalysis examination was a subterfuge search for contraband rather than a lawful inspection. Our principal focus is on the role of Capt. Lindsay.

United States v. Taylor, 41 M.J. 168, 172 (C.M.A. 1994).

In Taylor, on the same day the accused had his wisdom teeth removed, the command SAGO received an anonymous phone tip on his answering machine that someone in S-1 (the accused's section) had been using drugs. On the following day, Capt. Lindsay, the Company Commander, decided to order a random urinalysis for the next week. Captain Lindsay ordered the random test because (1) his SAGO was detaching; (2) Christmas holiday was approaching so he wanted to deter drug use during the holiday; and (3) he wanted to comply with the USMC directive requiring urinalysis testing. Taylor, 41 M.J. at 172. On 11 December, the SAGO was told by a former member of S-1 that the accused was a drug user. The SAGO told Captain Jackson, the S-1 unit commander, about this information. Captain Jackson then volunteered S-1 for testing to Captain Lindsay, without giving him any information on the suspicions as to the accused. Captain Lindsay asked Sergeant Ramon, the SAGO, if there was any special reason to test S-1, as no one had ever volunteered a section before. Sergeant Ramon simply replied "not at this time." Ironically, on the same day as the urinalysis was to be conducted, the accused was sent home by his NCO due to swelling related to the oral surgery. The dental clinic had issued an SIQ chit the same day and prescribed a painkiller. Sergeant Ramon then received a telephone call from a female friend of the accused, stating the accused used drugs and had requested a diuretic known as "Gold Seals." Captain Jackson, realizing the accused was not present for the urinalysis, had the accused called back to the command from home, at which time he submitted the urine sample, which tested positive for marijuana. C.O.M.A. focused solely on the blissful ignorance of the company commander and affirmed the conviction as there was no indication of a "wink and a nod," and "the primary purpose of ordering the inspection was to deter and to discourage personnel from using drugs." Taylor, 41 M.J. at 172.

Two more cases where urinalyses were allowed due to the proper motivation of the CO who ordered the urinalysis are: United States v. Moore, 41 M.J. 812 (N.M. Ct. Crim. App. 1995) (USMC "Legal Platoon"), and United States v. Gardner, 41 M.J. 189 (C.M.A. 1994) (the old "water for urine" trick). In Moore, a Marine private was convicted of marijuana & methamphetamine use. He was assigned to "Legal Platoon" of Headquarters Company. He was awaiting administrative separation after office hours for methamphetamine use. The Company Commander, due to a high number of positive drug testing results from 3 specific platoons, instituted a more frequent inspection regimen. He decided to have Legal Platoon, Motor Transport Platoon, and Communications Platoon inspected by urinalysis on a weekly basis vice the in-place inspection program of once or twice a month. The military judge suppressed the results of the urinalysis – N.M.C.M.R. reversed holding this action by the HQ Company Company a valid inspection and joined "our brethren in the Air Force and Army" in recognizing that "a commander who does not recognize the possibility of disciplinary actions arising from a positive urinalysis test is either naive or engaging in deliberate ignorance." Moore, 41 M.J. at 816 (citing United States v. Parker, 27 M.J. 522 (A.F.C.M.R. 1988), and United States v. Rodriguez, 23 M.J. 896(A.C.M.R. 1987)). N.M.C.M.R. said the primary purpose of the inspection was not to gain evidence for any disciplinary proceeding, but rather was based upon the commander's noble intent to strictly adhere to the Marine policy of drug deterrence. The Court said the Marine policy was a "facially neutral policy" designed to advance the "special interest of the military in ferreting out illegal drugs and protecting health and fitness of its members." Moore, 41 M.J. at 816 (quoting United States v. Johnston, 24 M.J. 271, 274 (C.M.A. 1987)). Moreover, the fact that positive results will no doubt end up as the primary evidence at a subsequent disciplinary proceeding is irrelevant and merely "ancillary." So once again, the testimony of the commander is the key evidence.

In Gardner, an Army First Sergeant provided tap water, instead of a urine sample, during a random urinalysis. The accused, on appeal, tried to argue a general theory that the whole Army urinalysis program had gone "awry." C.O.M.A. disagreed reaffirming that the "administrative nature of the Army [inspection] urinalysis program is unquestionable. Even trial defense counsel conceded that the Army urinalysis is at least facially administrative in nature and that any criminal prosecution which results from urinalysis testing would appear to be merely ancillary to the inspection rationale of the urinalysis testing." Gardner, 41 M.J. at 191. More recently, C.A.A.F., in United States v. Shover, __ M.J. __, 1996 WL 779686 (C.A.A.F. 1996), citing Taylor, analyzed the Government's clear and convincing burden in an investigation which revealed an attempt to "frame" an Air Force major by planting drugs in her briefcase. The Commander ordered a urinalysis of all persons working in the same office as the major. The Court recognized the applicability of M.R.E. 313's heightened burden of proof to the facts of the case, as the inspection was directed immediately following a report of an offense; but held the Government met its heightened burden as the "primary purpose" of the inspection was not to gather evidence.

D. The valid medical purpose exception [Mil.R.Evid. 312(f)]

Nothing in this rule shall be deemed to interfere with the lawful authority of the armed forces to take whatever action may be necessary to preserve the health of a servicemember. Evidence or contraband obtained from an examination or intrusion conducted for a valid medical purpose may be seized and is not evidence obtained from an unlawful search or seizure within the meaning of Mil.R.Evid. 311.

Mil.R.Evid. 312(f) (emphasis added).

The key, once again, is the issue of primary purpose it must be a medical purpose vice a law enforcement purpose. In United States v. Fitten, 42 M.J. 179 (CAAF 1995), a Navy MS3 was convicted of cocaine and marijuana use. Petty Officer Fitten was admitted to Balboa Naval Hospital. He was loud, disoriented, and combative in the ER. The ER doctor, Dr. Wood, ordered Petty Officer Fitten placed in a restraint because of suspected trauma; she also ordered a CAT scan, and metabolic screen testing for drugs and alcohol in the blood. The tests were performed to ensure no life-threatening injury or trauma existed. (The accused had told a nurse he had a "drug weekend.") He was strapped to the gurney, and because he was either unable or unwilling, the doctor ordered the catheterization. The catheterization was ordered only after ER personnel were unable to obtain a sample for over 1 1/2 hours after his arrival at the ER. Coincidentally, the command, having been notified of Petty Officer Fitten's presence in the ER, sent Senior Chief Burton, Fitten's command urinalysis coordinator, to Balboa to get a urine specimen. The accused refused to give a sample to the Senior Chief. The Senior Chief contacted the Command SJA in order to get a search authorization from Petty Officer Fitten's CO which was granted; but was silent as to whether a catheterization was authorized. In the meantime, and after the authorization was granted, Nurse Broadwell started the catheterization. She testified at trial that her sole purpose was to find out if anything was medically wrong with the patient and the CO's authorization played no role. She obtained one bottle of urine for the hospital, and at the Senior Chief's request another bottle was obtained for the command. The second bottle was sent by the command for drug testing and tested positive for the controlled substances. The Court held the first bottle was obtained pursuant to the "valid medical purpose" and the command's request [for another bottle] resulted in a de minimis impact by prolonging the flow of urine only long enough to fill a second bottle . . . Any "intrusion" was de minimis and does not shock the conscience." Fitten, 42 M.J. at 182. A note on catheterization: M.R.E. 312(d) requires that nonconsensual extraction must be based upon exigency circumstances and that "[I]nvoluntary extraction of body fluids must be done in a reasonable fashion by a person with appropriate medical qualifications."

E. "Fitness for duty" testing

Fitness for duty testing is a specialized, somewhat complex, category of urinalysis testing which has specific limitations on use of the urinalysis results:

(c) Fitness for duty testing. . . Irrespective of whether or not the results of such testing would be admissible under the Military Rules of Evidence, results obtained from [a command-directed fitness for duty] urinalysis may NOT be used for disciplinary purposes nor on the issue of characterization of service in separation proceedings, but may be used for impeachment or rebuttal in any proceeding in which the evidence of drug abuse (or lack thereof) has been first introduced by the member. In addition, such results may not be used as a basis for vacation of the suspension of execution of punishment imposed under Article 15, UCMJ, or as a result of a court-martial. Such results, however, may be used as a basis for separation.

So we must remember that the Navy and Marine Corps, consistent with DOD policy, have specifically limited the use of a fitness for duty urinalysis. (See the chart at the end of this chapter-which is an excerpt from the OPNAVINST). Fitness for duty testing is broken up into several categories: (1) command-directed; (2) aftercare and surveillance; (3) evaluation testing; (4) physician-directed (to be distinguished from medical diagnostic testing under M.R.E. 312(f)); and (5) safety investigation tests. The most prevalent type of "fitness for duty" test is the command-directed urinalysis test:

A urinalysis test should be ordered whenever a member's behavior, conduct, or involvement in an accident or other incident gives rise to a reasonable suspicion of drug abuse and a urinalysis test has not been conducted on a consensual or probable cause basis. Command-directed tests shall be ordered by the member's commander, commanding officer, officer in charge, or other officer who has succeeded to command per U.S. Navy Regulations (1973). The authority to authorize a command-directed urinalysis test may be delegated to an executive officer and/or command duty officer. Reasonable suspicion will frequently be generated by a member's involvement in:

- (a) A serious accident or incident in which unusually careless acts are performed.
A motor vehicle offense involving excessive speed, loss of control of vehicle, reckless driving, or driving under the influence.
- (c) Fights, assaults, disorderly conduct, disrespect to superiors, willful disobedience of orders, and similar incidents of misconduct.
- (d) Bizarre, unusual, or irregular behavior.

OPNAVINST 5350.4B, Encl. (4), p. 4-5.

F. *Service directed testing

Service-directed testing is another type of urinalysis testing and includes the following categories (with the subcategory label from the OPNAV in parentheses):

1. Rehabilitation facility staff testing (RF)
2. Security personnel (OS)
3. Brig Staff (monthly testing) & Prisoners (upon entrance into the Brig and bi-monthly thereafter) (OS)
4. Entrance Testing , e.g., OCS Candidates (AT)
5. Accession pipeline (e.g., en route to "A" school, in officer warfare/staff specialty entry schools)
6. Drug screening lab staff (RF)
7. PCS Overseas screening (OS)

See OPNAVINST 5350.4B, enclosure (4), p. 6-10.

1604 URINALYSIS COLLECTION

A. Selection. The detailed procedures for collection are found at Appendix B to enclosure (4) to OPNAVINST 5350.4B, with change 1 of April 1992.

B. Observation

1. Urinating
2. Placing lid on bottle
3. Delivering to unit coordinator

C. Unit coordinator. "A responsible individual will coordinate the urine collection. The individual will be designated in writing as the Unit Coordinator (UC)." OPNAVINST 5350.4B, Appendix B to enclosure (4), p. B-1. Their duties are laid out in the OPNAV. In a nutshell:

1. Attaches labels to bottle
2. Maintains urinalysis ledger
3. Ensures sample is validated
4. Prepares custody document (a sample Urine Custody Document is found as Appendix E to enclosure (4) to OPNAVINST 5350.4B)

5. Prepares shipping container

D. Practical suggestions

1. Member certification as to sample contents / use of prescription drugs

Individuals selected for key roles in process will fall under serious scrutiny at courts-martial or administrative boards, so commands should choose wisely. Also, due to delay between urinalysis and any resulting court-martial, coordinator and observers should not be anyone who will be leaving command soon. The observer should watch urine leave the body and enter the bottle. If unit coordinator must store samples before mailing them, they should be stored in a cool place where only the unit coordinator has access. The unit coordinator must never participate in a urinalysis that he / she is coordinating (otherwise the defense will argue that the unit coordinator had a potential motive for interfering with the results).

2. Alternatives for member's refusal to comply

What of a refusal or inability to urinate? The OPNAV states:

(h) If a member claims to be unable to submit a sample, or submits less than 60 milliliter minimum, it is permissible to require the member to remain in a control area, under observation, and to drink fluids normally consumed in the course of daily activity (e.g., coffee, water, soda) until such time as the member is able to provide a sample, or the balance of an incomplete sample.

(i) Should a member be unable to provide a sample during the command's prescribed collection period, the member shall be interviewed by a military medical authority to investigate the possibility of physiological or psychological problems in complying with the program.

OPNAVINST, 5350.4B, Appendix B to enclosure (4), p. B-4.

In United States v. Mitchell, 15 M.J. 937 (N.M.C.M.R. 1983), a Navy petty officer challenged this policy. During a random urinalysis inspection chosen by way of social security numbers at Fleet Training Center Norfolk, the accused Petty Officer was on liberty and was directed to report back to FTC for the urinalysis. She returned and was escorted to a female head. She could not provide a sample, so she was escorted to the unit library and directed to consume liquids until she was able to provide the sample. She "popped" for marijuana. The Court said making her drink water was not, as argued by the accused, barbaric, or an unreasonable use of force, or an unreasonable invasion of privacy or incursion into the integrity of the human body. Mitchell, 15 M.J. at 940.

1605 PORTABLE FIELD KITS. Results cannot be used for discipline / characterization of discharge (unless accompanied by confession). A "positive" for any drug, sample is forwarded to Navy Drug Screening Lab. "Positive tests results are considered preliminary until confirmed as positive by a DOD-certified drug laboratory or by the servicemember's admission." OPNAVINST 5350.4B, enclosure (4), p. 11.

1606 NAVY DRUG SCREEN LABS. Field testing-some units, particularly Marines, are field testing samples, and only sending positive field test samples to the drug labs. No disciplinary action can be taken on the basis of a field test without Navy Drug Lab confirmation unless the field test serves to corroborate an admission of drug use. There are now only three Navy Drug Screening Labs (Jacksonville, San Diego and Great Lakes; Oakland and Norfolk have closed). The detailed procedures for laboratory handling of the urine specimens is at p. B-10 of Appendix B to enclosure (4) of OPNAVINST 5350.4b CH-1.

A. Drugs tested. All samples are tested for marijuana, cocaine, amphetamine / methamphetamine, and LSD. Samples are "pulse tested" for codeine, morphine, barbiturates, and PCP. If a command specifically requests that samples be tested for one of these additional drugs, the lab will comply with the request. Enzymeimmunoassay (EIA) is now used as the initial screening test for all drugs but LSD, for which Radioimmunoassay (RIA) is still used.

Approximate retention:	Marijuana:	3-5 days
	Cocaine:	2-3 days
	LSD:	12-24 hours
	Amph/Meth:	2-3 days
	Opiates:	3 days
	PCP:	3 days

Chronic use of marijuana used to be detectable for up to 20 days. The switch from RIA to EIA initially cut down the detection time. Modifications are being made to the test to try to increase the detection time for marijuana.

B. Anabolic steroids? Call Dr. Hatten, UCLA, 310-825-2635. Navy Drug Labs do not test for steroids. Commands that want to test a sample for steroids should send the sample to the UCLA Olympic Drug Lab. The command must pay for the test.

C. Lab procedure

1. Receipt
2. Accessioning
3. Aliquot sample
4. Screening test by radioimmunoassay (RIA)
5. Confirmation by gas chromatography / mass spectrometry (GC/MS) GC: Gas chromatography, MS: Mass spectrometry.
6. Review of documentation by lab officials
7. Message to submitting command
8. Positive sample frozen and retained for 1 year

Must the lab retain urine? In United States v. Manuel, 43 M.J. 282 (C.A.A.F. 1995), an Air Force Staff Sergeant was convicted of wrongful use of cocaine & marijuana. The druglab inadvertently destroyed the urine. The Court found the lab to be "grossly negligent" but no Government bad faith. The Court said to suppress the urinalysis results. The Air Force regulation in place required retention of all positive specimens for 1 year. The Court relied on Art. 46, U.C.M.J., and RCM 703(2), which require expansive due process discovery rights for the accused and equal access to all evidence. The remedy here was to suppress. The Court said the Constitution provides the Constitutional minimum safeguards; but that the DOD Directive 1010.1 provides additional substantial rights! DOD Dir. 1010.1 requires the Government lab to retain positive sample for 120 days if it is to be used at a court-martial. So the lab must follow the regulations or face this drastic remedy.

1607 QUALITY CONTROL. The drug labs run control samples through with the test samples. If one of the negative control samples falsely tests positive, the whole batch is thrown out and the process starts over. The drug lab also has internal maximum permissible deviations from known metabolite levels.

- A. Screening / confirmation by different tests (different scientific principles)
- B. Daily machine calibration

C. Internal testing of known samples with each batch

D. Armed Forces Institute of Pathology (AFIP) sends samples to units for submission. The Armed Forces Institute of Pathology (at Walter Reed) also sends samples to units to mail into drug labs. The drug labs don't know these samples are from AFIP. AFIP will monitor results, and has taken actions against DOD Drug Labs that have provided poor results.
